TO HIS

ROYAL HIGHNESS

W I L L I A M

DUKE of CUMBERLAND.

S I R,

HE following History, collected from Authentic Memoirs, and most humbly Dedicated to YOUR ROYAL HIGHNESS, presents to View the memorable and most important Scenes in the British Annals; the ABDICATION and REVOLUTION, the UNION of the two Kingdoms, and the PROTESTANT SUCCESSION; Events hardly to be equalled in the Records of Time!

A 2

A Mo-

DEDICATION.

A MONARCH invested with more Power and a larger Revenue than by any of his Predecessors had been ever enjoyed, chuses to Abdicate his Throne rather than be obliged to govern by Law, and restrained from introducing Popery and Arbitrary Power.

ON the other Hand, a Prince, the Business of whose Life had been to defend the Liberties of Europe against the overgrown Power of France, being called in by the Nation for the Preservation of their Religion and Laws, is unexpectedly advanced to the Throne, and, instead of the Anarchy and Confusion intended by the Abdication, the Government is settled on more solid and lasting Foundations.

THE secret Springs of Action, in these and other remarkable Events, are clearly discovered in Historical Dissertations on the Rise and Progress of our Civil and Religious Differences, by which so many Persons are swayed, so many things influenced.

HENCE may be seen the Reason of the various Conduct and seemingly inconsistent Behaviour at the Time of the REVOLUTION: Why some, though they had heartily joined to invite over the Prince of ORANGE, yet afterwards became his Opposers, and refused him for their Sovereign, though they had been amongst the most forward to have him for their Deliverer: And why many others, though they had taken the Oaths to King WILLIAM, yet behaved in such a manner, as if they believed their Allegiance due to another.

THESE and the like Proceedings are shown to flow from the absurd Principles and Notions of Government, which after the Restoration had been espoused and industriously propagated, and which, in the following Reigns, were made use of by Discontent, Faction, and Disappointment, to heighten the Divisions.

NOTWITHSTANDING all This and the constant Opposition to his Measures, King WILLIAM surmounted all Difficulties, ties, and fixed our Civil and Religious Liberties on their true Basis.

BUT how great soever was our Deliverance, the REVOLUTION would have been very imperfect and precarious, if by the care and pains of our DELIVERER the Succession to the Crown had not been limited to the PROTESTANT LINE, and settled on the ILLUSTRIOUS HOUSE OF HANOVER, the great Security of our Religion, Laws, and Properties.

BY virtue of this Parliamentary Right, the strongest and best Title to Empire, YOUR ROYAL GRANDFATHER, descended from a Daughter of Great-Britain, became possessed of the Throne, and made a steady Adherence to the Laws of our Constitution and a strict Union with his Parliaments, the grand Characteristicks of his Reign, whose Example without any Deviation has been constantly followed by his PRESENT MAJESTY Your Royal Father.

THE PROTESTANT SUCCESSION had no sooner taken place but the Seeds of Rebellion, which by the revival of the old Notions of Government had been sown in the Nation, sprung up in the North. The UNION of the two Kingdoms, one of the distinguishing Glories of Queen ANNE's Reign, could not prevent the Highlanders of Scotland, in Conjunction with some English Malecontents, from rising in Arms, and attempting without the least Provocation to dethrone their lawful Sovereign: But they were quickly reduced, though the Spirit of Rebellion was far from being quelled.

OF this we have had a late and flagrant Instance, when the Highlanders, encouraged from Abroad openly by France, and at Home secretly by the Enemies of our Constitution, once more rose in Arms, and with a Popish Pretender at their Head penetrated, like a Torrent, into the Heart of the Kingdom.

THEN it was that the Eyes of all were turned towards YOUR ROYAL HIGHNESS for Deliverance from the present Danger, and not in vain! The Expectations of the Publick

DEDICATION.

Publick were answer'd. Terrified at your Presence, the Rebels, with a Rapidity exceeding that wherewith they had advanced, fled back to their Country. Thither, animated by Your Example our Troops pursued them with incredible Toil, and totally routed their Army in the ever Memorable Battle of Culloden: A Victory by the Voice of the Publick wholly ascribed to your Conduct and Valour.

AND NOW that YOUR ROYAL HIGHNESS, with the unanimous Consent of the Allies, is going to Command the Confederate Armies against the common Disturber of Europe, may Your Efforts be attended with greater Success than even the Duke of MARLBOROUGH's glorious Campaigns, and may your Victories be crowned with a General Peace that may repair the Defects of the Treaty of Utrecht, and establish a lasting Tranquillity in Europe.

THIS is the hearty Prayer and sincere Wish of every true Briton, and particularly of him, who with the most profound Respect subscribes himself,

March 25, 1747.

S I R,

Your ROYAL HIGHNESS's

Most humble, most Dutiful,

And most Obedient Servant,

N. TINDAL.

M^R Rapin dying before he had brought down his History to the Period he intended, the Translator has endeavoured to supply the defect, by the addition of the Reigns of King WILLIAM and Queen MARY, Queen ANN, and King GEORGE I, which are carefully collected from the Histories and Treatises, that from time to time have been published since the Revolution, and also from the Manuscripts which have been communicated to the Continuator; and in all affairs of importance, as well where the Authors agree as where they differ, those accounts that appear the best and most impartial are inserted in the History, and the others thrown into the Notes; by which means the Reader will see the different turns given to the same Fact, according to the Principles or Party of the several Writers. Nor is it scrupled to copy or imitate any part of the several Authors when conducive to the usefulness of the Work, or where there is no occasion to alter or abridge.

THAT the springs and motives of action may be the more clearly discerned, an Introduction is prefixed, showing the Rise and Progress of the several Parties at the time of the Revolution, in a short Review of the Reigns of JAMES I, CHARLES I, CHARLES II, and JAMES II, with a true state of our Religious Differences, by which so many Persons and Proceedings have been influenc'd (1). Moreover the situation of Foreign Affairs which very often casts great light on Domestic Transactions, is on proper occasions largely described.

IN a word, nothing is omitted to render the Work as comprehensive and useful as possible, and the Continuator hopes, he has shewn himself unbiaſſed by Party, by a steady adherence to truth, which he has endeavoured to follow without disguise or misrepresentation. Whether he has succeeded in his endeavours, and really acted with the Impartiality he intended, is left to the Publick to judge.

(1) This Dissertation, which, in the first Edition, was printed among the Notes, is now inserted in the Context at the End of the Reign of King William.

THE HISTORY of ENGLAND.

INTRODUCTION.

The Rise and Progress of the several Parties at the Time of the REVOLUTION, in a short Review of the Reigns of JAMES I, CHARLES I, CHARLES II, and JAMES II.

AS an Introduction to the following reign, it will be requisite to premise a short account of the Parties in England at the time of the Revolution, and of the principles on which they were severally formed. Without this it will be difficult to discover the true springs of action, and why the progress of a Revolution, in which at first all parties had readily joined, came on a sudden to be so clogged, that the true ends could not be fully attained, namely, the redress of present, and prevention of future grievances, by settling the Constitution on firm and lasting foundations.

In the reign of King James I, very different notions of the origin and nature of Government, and the extent of the Regal Power, began to be entertained in the nation. It was by some asserted, "Monarchy and lineal succession are of Divine Institution, and consequently sacred and inviolable. The persons as well as the authority of Kings are ordained by God (1). The King is the sole fountain of power. All the liberties and privileges of the people are but so many concessions or extortions from the crown (2). The King is not bound to his people by the coronation-oath, but only before God, to whom alone he is accountable (3). The King's violations of the laws are not to be restrained by force, but subjects ought either actively to obey his commands, or passively submit to his will (4)."

(1) In his speech to his first Parliament, King James I, speaking of the English Throne, says, "Which God by my birth-right and lineal descent had in fulness of time provided for me." He often talked of his undoubted, hereditary, independent Right, inherent in himself.

(2) King James I, in one of his speeches asserts, that the privileges of Parliament are derived from the Grace and Permission of his Ancestors, and liable to be retrenched at the will of the Prince. Upon which the Commons drew up a protestation, declaring, that the liberties, privileges, and jurisdiction of Parliament, are the undoubted Birth-right and Inheritance of the subjects of England. This protestation the King, in full council, the Judges also being present, declared to be invalid and of no effect, and with his own hand took it out of the Journal-book. Rapin, Vol. II. p. 211, 212.

No. I. Vol. III.

(3) A book was published, with the royal Licence, by Dr. Cowel in 1609, wherein, among other things, it is said, the King is not bound by the laws, or by his coronation-oath.

(4) It was often declared from the pulpit, especially by the Court-preachers, "The people have no other refuge left under the most cruel tyranny, but Prayers and Tears." This doctrine was endeavoured to be proved by Texts of Scripture, passages out of the Homilies, and the practice of the Primitive Christians.

On the other hand, it was more generally maintained, " Though all power may be said to be from God, as government is agreeable to his will, made known as well by nature as revelation, yet no particular form of government is of divine appointment, but every nation is left to settle that form which appears most suitable to their genius, and most conducive to the sole end of all government, the happiness of the society. Monarchy, very probably, was first chosen; but as the living, by one man's will was seen to become the cause of all men's misery, other forms of government were introduced; and laws founded on reason, and tending to the publick welfare, were framed by communities, as rules of conduct to the governors, and as measures of obedience to the people (1). Thus in England, coreval with the monarchy, there has always been a Constitution, that is, a system of laws, institutions, and customs, according to which the King is obliged to govern, and the subject to obey (2). The King, in his coronation-oath, as much swears to the people, as the people swear to the King. When the King acts in conformity to the laws, he ought not to be refitted on any pretense; but if he violates the fundamental laws of the " realm, and endeavours to subvert the Constitution, he may be not only refitted, but even deposed. Lineal Succession and Hereditary Right have no foundation in nature, nor were ever appointed by God, but were first introduced by communities, where kingly government prevailed, to prevent confusion and strife. And therefore the succession may be altered and transferred from one branch of a family to another, or to a new family, when the supreme law, the safety of the people, calls for it (3)."

At the same time there were also some, who, far from thinking Regal Power and Hereditary Right of divine appointment, preferred in their minds a republican form of government, even to a limited monarchy. But these sentiments were concealed in this reign under an external zeal for the Constitution and privileges of the people (4).

The first set of principles was espoused by the King, the Court, and great part of the Clergy, and by degrees found reception in the Universities, Hous of Court, and even among the Judges. The King, agreeably to his principles, in his proclamations and speeches, used the language of an absolute monarch (5), and in his conduct, carried the prerogative to a very great height, while his proceedings were supported by the opinions of the Judges,

(1) It is certain, the European kingdoms founded by the Goths, Vandals, &c. as Lombardy, Burgundy, Sweden, Denmark, Hungary, Aragon, France, &c. were originally all limited Monarchies, and had their several constitutions or fundamental laws, by which the regal power was limited. Amongst these limitations were generally the two great articles, That no laws, could be made, nor any money levied, without consent of the States.

(2) To have a clear notion of the English Constitution in general, a man need only consider how the sovereign power is divided, and in what persons the several branches are vested. The sovereign power is compounded of these six parts. I. Legislative power, or authority to make laws. II. Executive power, which consists in creating officers to execute the laws and discharge all the functions of the government, according to law. III. A power of making war and peace. IV. A power of raising money for support of the government. V. The last appeal in all cases of law. VI. The coinage or power over the Mint. Now there are but three of these six parts lodged in the person of the King; namely, the executive power, the power of making war and peace, and the coinage. And of these branches of royal power, the executive (which is the largest) is so limited, that the King cannot employ in civil or military office, any man but what is qualified by laws of the people's making. And though the power of war be veiled in the King, yet the Commons have reserved to themselves the power of raising money, without which no war can be waged. As for the coinage, it is rather an honourable trust than a real power. But as to the Legislature, the greatest branch of sovereign power, it is certain no law can be enacted without the authority of the Commons, who have also the sole power of levying money. The last appeal, in cases of law, is usually made to the House of Lords. The sovereign power being thus divided in England, it is easy to see the extent of the regal power, and the nature of the allegiance due to the King. Hence also may be perceived the happiness of the English in preserving their Antient Constitution, whilst the greatest part of Europe groans under arbitrary power.

(3) By a statute of the 13th year of Queen Elizabeth, it was made high-treason for any person to affirm, that the reigning Prince, with the authority of the Parliament, is not able to limit and bind the Crown, and the descent and inheritance thereof. This plainly shows, the Legislature's opinion of hereditary right in those days. The opposers of the divine right of lineal succession thought it strange, that King James I. should so frequently assert that doctrine, since the race of the Stewarts, after Robert II, had no other title to the crown of Scotland, but what they derived from an act of Parliament, in preclusion of those of the legitimate and right line. For Robert having had three sons and a daughter by Elizabeth Mure his concubine, marries her afterward to one Gifford, himself at the same time espousing Eufimia, daughter of the Earl of Rejs, by whom he had William and David Earls of Athol and Strathern, and a daughter, wife of James Douglas, son to the Earl of Douglas. Robert, upon the death of his wife Eufimia and of Gifford, not only marries his former concubine, but obtains an act of Parliament to settle the crown upon the children begotten upon her in concubinate, and to exclude his legitimate children by his wife Eufimia. State-Tracts, Vol. I. p. 142, 143. Buchanan, B. IX. Murray's Acts of Parli.

(4) It must be observed, that in the reign of Queen Mary, great numbers, on account of religion, fled beyond sea, and were well received by the reformed states of Germany, Switzerland, and Geneva, and allowed churches for their public worship. When these exiles, upon Queen Elizabeth's accession, returned to England, many brought with them not only a dislike to the worship and discipline of the established Church, and the desire of a purer religion, as they termed it, (whence the name Puritan) but also favourable sentiments of the governments they had lived under so peaceably, which, in the end, were turned by the arbitrary proceedings of the following reigns, into republican principles, and proved, under Charles I, the occasion of the downfall of the monarchy, by preventing the breach between the King and Commons from being healed.

(5) In the proclamation for calling his first Parliament, he arbitrarily prescribed as well to the electors as elected, and subjected both to severe penalties, in case any return should be made contrary to his Proclamation. See the Proclamation, Rapin, Vol. II. p. 163. And in a speech to the Parliament expressly tells them, " As it is blasphemy to dispute what God may do, so is it, sedition in subjects to dispute what a King may do in the height of his power." So possessed was the King (says Burnet) of a divine right in all Kings, that he could not bear that even an elective and limited King should be called in question by his subjects, and therefore would never give Prince Frederick, his son-in-law, the title of King, nor lend him any assistance for the support of his new dignity. It was also usual with him, from the same principle, to call the Dutch rebels, for endeavouring to shake off the tyrannical yoke of Spain,

Judges, and passive obedience inculcated on the people from the pulpit and press. Whoever disbelieved the divine, unalienable, hereditary, independent Right of Kings, or offered to bound the royal prerogative, were branded with the name of Puritan (1). By which means the Puritans, who before were inconsiderable, became a strong party, as including all the friends to the Constitution, and the opposers of arbitrary power. In a word, by these means two parties were formed in the kingdom, one of which embracing the principles of the divine Right of Kings, exalted the prerogative above measure, whilst the other espousing the opposite principles, adhered to the Constitution, and zealously asserted the national privileges. Thus were laid in King James the First's reign, the foundation, not only of the civil wars, but of all the party-divisions, which have since existed in the nation.

Under Charles I. King Charles I. mounted the throne, possessed with the same principles of government which his father had so industriously propagated, and under the influence of the same counsels and ministry. Accordingly, in the first fifteen years of his reign, continual breaches were made in the constitution, and the nation's liberties invaded, whilst perhaps the King imagined he was only defending his prerogative (2). Within the space of a year two Parliaments are summoned and dissolved in displeasure, for presuming to meddle with grievances, and call the King's ministers to account (3). In the 4th year of this reign another Parliament is also, for the same reason, dismissed, with a reproachful and threatening speech (4), and such members as had given offence are imprisoned and fined. After this, the King governs without a Parliament twelve years. In which interval the bulwark of the national liberties, the power of raising money, is not only assumed and rigorously exercised by the crown (5), but the methods used to that end are pronounced legal by the Judges (6), and preached as obligatory to the subject's conscience

(1) Hence the distinction of State and Church puritans. The former were the same with those since called Whigs, and the latter came to be included in the general name of Dissenters, whilst the asserters of the Divine Right of Kings, acquired the denomination of Tories.

(2) This opinion that King Charles I. in the invasion of the people's rights, imagined, he was only concerned in the defence of his own, seems not very improbable; for as a modern writer observes, This Prince had sucked in with his milk his father's absurd principles of government, to his own and the Kingdom's misfortune. He found them espoused as true principles both of religion and policy, by a whole party in the nation, whom he esteemed friends to Church and State. He found them opposed by a party, whom he looked upon as enemies to the Church and Monarchy. Can it be wondered that he grew zealous in a cause which he understood to concern him so nearly, and in which he saw so many men who had not the same interest, and might therefore be supposed to act on a principle of conscience, equally zealous? Let any man, who has been deeply and long engaged in the contests of party, ask himself, on cool reflection, whether prejudices concerning men and things, have not grown up and strengthened with him, and obtained an uncontrollable influence over his conduct. With such an habitual bias upon him King Charles came to the Throne. By this opinion, many difficulties in that Prince's conduct may be accounted for, and his public and private character rendered less inconsistent.

(3) The Lord Clarendon observes upon this occasion, that for the King to interpose and shelter an accused servant from answering, does not only seem an obstruction of justice, and lay an imputation upon the Prince, of being privy to the offence, but leaves to great scandal upon the party himself, that he is generally concluded guilty of whatsoever he is charged with — He farther observes, that these unreasonable, unkind, and precipitate (as he calls them) dissolutions of Parliaments, were the most probable source from whence the civil wars flowed. B. I. p. 4, 5.

(4) In this speech the King declares, "that it was merely the undutiful and seditious carriage of the Lower-House that hath made the dissolution of the Parliament." And concludes, "these Vipers (speaking of some of the Members) must look for their reward of punishment." See the speech, Rapin, Vol. II. p. 279. Such asperity of language (says Lord Clarendon) had never before been used from the Throne to the Parliament. And he laments the unhappy effects it had upon the nation. In this Parliament the King (though with reluctance) gave the royal assent to the Petition of Right, whereby he bound himself among other things, not to raise any money by way of loan, gift, benevolence, or tax, without consent of Parliament, nor to imprison any person without certifying the cause; both which articles he violated immediately after the dissolution of this Parliament, and continued to do so for twelve years together. This breach of his Parliamentary word, the most solemn a King can give, was afterwards used as a strong argument that he would break through all his concessions to the Parliament of 1645, as soon as it should be in his power, and thereby proved one occasion of the civil wars. The most natural way to account for this proceeding of King Charles I. must be on the supposition before mentioned, that he imagined he was only pursuing his own rights. Accordingly he said to the Parliament, when he passed the Petition of Right, "You neither mean nor can hurt my prerogative." And as his extraordinary methods received the sanction of the Judges opinion, he probably believed them to belong to the prerogative royal.

(5) Five Subsidies, only mentioned as intended to be granted in the second Parliament, were exacted with the same rigour throughout the Kingdom, as if an Act had passed to that purpose; and divers Gentlemen of prime quality were, for refusing to pay the same, committed to prison. Projects for money of all kinds, many ridiculous, many scandalous, all very grievous, were set on foot. Supplemental Acts of State were made to supply defects of laws, and so Tunnage and Poundage, and other duties were collected by order of Council, which had been positively refused to be settled by act of Parliament, and new and greater impositions laid upon trade. For the better support of these extraordinary ways, and to protect the agents and instruments, and to discountenance and suppress all bold inquiries and opposers, the Council-Table and Star-Chamber enlarge their jurisdictions to a vast extent, "holding (as Thucydides said to the Athenians) for honourable, that which pleased, and for just, that which profited": and being the same persons in several rooms, grew both Courts of Law to determine Right, and Courts of Revenue to bring money into the Treasury; the Council-table by proclamations enjoining the people what was not enjoined by the law, and prohibiting that which was not prohibited; and the Star-Chamber censuring the breach and disobedience to those proclamations by very great fines and imprisonment, so that any disrespect to any Acts of State, or to the persons of State-men, was in no time more penal, and these foundations of right by which men valued their security, to the apprehension and understanding of wise men, were never more in danger of being destroyed. This paragraph is entirely taken from the Lord Clarendon's History, (B. I. p. 67, 68.) who cannot be suspected of aggravating any thing to the disadvantage of King Charles I. and is with some other passages a probable argument against the charge of omissions and interpolations cast upon the edition of that History. For notwithstanding some softening expressions with regard to the King, the illegal proceeding in the first fifteen years of his reign, are in a few pages as strongly represented, as in volumes of the republican writers.

(6) The Lord Clarendon observes, that the damage and science by some of the Clergy (1). During these incroachments on the rights of the People, and the King's tacit renunciation of the Constitution by the disuse of Parliaments, jealousy and discontent spread themselves in the nation, the Puritan party daily increases, and all true lovers of their country earnestly long for an opportunity to rescue the Constitution from entire destruction. Perhaps this opportunity would have been expected in vain, had it not been accidentally given by the King himself. For in the height of his power, he resolves to accomplish the project, begun by his father, of introducing the English Church-discipline into Scotland. By this attempt such a flame is kindled in the nation, that a war at last breaks out between the King and his Scottish subjects, wherein England is no way concerned. The King tho' the occasions of the Government were, by his extraordinary methods of raising money, amply supplied, could not long maintain an army without being forced to come to a treaty of pacification, and to apply to the Parliament, the very mention of which had by a former Proclamation been strictly forbid (2). Accordingly a Parliament, after a twelve years intermission, is summoned to meet on the 13th of April 1640. The King opens the session with desiring a speedy supply; but the Commons are resolved that the Grievances shall first be redressed. Whereupon the King, to the surprize and concern of the whole nation, hastily dissolves the Parliament (3), but at the same time, the Convocation, by his special warrant, is continued, and canons are passed, wherein the divine Right of Kings, and unlimited Obedience, are expressly asserted (4). Immediately after, the war with Scotland is renewed, and by the advice of a Junto of select Counsellors, all expedients for raising men and money are employed (5). Mean while the Scots, by private encouragement from England, advance to their borders, and mischief cannot be expressed that the Crown and State sustained, by the deserved reproach and infamy that attended the Judges, by being made use of in Ship-money and other acts of power. For (says he) men submitted to the prebusses as assuring themselves that they might, when they pleaded, resort to the law for relief. But when they heard Ship-money demanded in a Court of law as a right, and found it, by sworn Judges of the law adjudged so, upon such grounds and reasons as every stander-by was able to swear was not law, and were required to pay it by a logic that left no man any thing which he might call his own, they thought themselves bound, in confidence to the publick justice, not to submit to the imposition. Sir John Finch, Lord Chief-Justice of the Common-Pleas, and a strenuous asserter of Ship-money, being made Lord-Keeper, upon a demurrer put in to a Bill before him, which had no other equity in it than an order of the Lords of the Council, declared, "Whilst he was Keeper, no man should be so fawcy as to dispute those orders, but the wisdom of that Board should be always ground enough for him to make a decree in Chancery." Which, adds the Lord Clarendon, was so great an aggravation of the excess of that Table, that it received more prejudice from that Act of unreasonable respect, than from all the contempt could possibly have been offered to it. Clar. B. I. p. 69, 74.

(1) "It cannot (says Lord Clarendon) be denied, "but there was sometimes preached at Whitehall matter very unfit for the place, and very scandalous for the persons, who presumed often to determine things out of the verge of their own profession". Sibthorp, in a Sermon said, "The Prince is the head, and makes his Court and Council, it is his duty to direct and make laws." Dr. Mauwaring spoke more plainly in one of his Sermons: "The King (says he) is not bound to observe the laws of the Realm concerning the subjects rights and liberties, but his royal will and command in imposing taxes and loans, without common consent in Parliament, doth oblige the subjects' conscience upon pain of eternal damnation." This man, after having been fined and imprisoned by the Lords, was pardoned by the King and made a Bishop. And Archbishop Abbot was suspended, for refusing to license Sibthorp's Sermon. See Rapin, Vol. II. p. 259.

(2) The dissolution of the third Parliament was followed with a declaration, that "since for several ill ends the calling again of a Parliament was divulged; however, his Majesty had showed, by his frequent meeting his people, his love to the use of Parliaments, yet the late abuse having, for the present, driven his Majesty unwillingly out of that course, he shall account it presumption for any to prescribe any time to his Majesty for Parliaments." Which words (says Lord Clarendon) were generally interpreted, as if no more assemblies of that nature were to be expected, and that all men were prohibited, upon the penalty of censure, so much as to speak of a Parliament. Clar. B. I. p. 4

(3) After a Session of three weeks. In all probability, if the King had suffered this Parliament to sit, the Grievances of the nation had been redressed in a regular manner, and the civil wars entirely prevented. For it is universally agreed, that the House of Commons consisted in general of sober and dispassionate men, whose sole aim was to restrain the prerogative within due bounds, and secure the just liberties of the people. Accordingly, the Lord Clarendon observes, that "there could not a greater damp have seized upon the spirits of the whole nation than this dissolution caused, and men had much of the misery in view which shortly after fell out." He was himself a member of this Parliament. The King was quickly sensible of his error, and very desirous to repair it, and the same, or the next day, consulted whether he might by proclamation recall the Commons, to meet together again. Clar. B. I. p. 139, 140.

(4) By the first canon all Parish-Priests were ordered to read in the church one Sunday in every quarter the following explanation of regal power. "That the most high and sacred order of Kings is of divine Right, being the ordinance of God himself, founded in the prime laws of Nature and Revelation, by which the supreme power over all persons, civil and ecclesiastical is given to them.—And for subjects to bear arms against their King, either offensive or defensive, upon any pretence whatsoever, is at least to resist the powers ordained of God; and though they do not invade but only resist, St. Paul says, they shall receive damnation." See Nelson, p. 545. This, and the other canons were by the next Parliament condemned as contrary to the fundamental laws of the Realm, the King's prerogative, property of the Subject, and the rights of Parliament." Whit. Mem. p. 37. The proceedings of this convocation (says Lord Clarendon) drew the same prejudice upon the whole body of the Clergy, to which before only some few Clergymen were exposed. B. II. p. 148. It is observable, that the Judges, Finch, Littlaton, &c. gave their opinion, that "The Convocation called by the King's writ was not to dissolve but by the King's writ, notwithstanding the dissolution of the Parliament." Whit. Mem. p. 32.

(5) The King's most intimate counsellors at this time were, Laurel, Stratford, and Cottingham, by whom, it seems, he was told, that being refused by the Commons, he might use any methods to raise money. Accordingly, (says Whitlock) all the wheels of the Prerogative were set in motion to provide money, as Leases, Knighthoods, Monopolies, &c. Whit. Mem. p. 35, &c. It is remarkable that, the first footsteps we have of a Cabinet-Council in any European Government were in the time of Charles IX. King of France, when refusing to massacre the Protestants he durst not trust his Council with it, but chose a few men whom he called his Cabinet-Council. Formerly, it seems, all matters where debated and resolved in the Privy-Council, where every man

ders (1), and routing a party of English, become masters of Newcastle. The King is quickly reduced to great straits, and petitioned to call a Parliament and treat with the Scots. Want of money, and a manifest aversion in the English, and particularly in the army to fight against the Scots, oblige the King to comply. Commissioners are appointed on both sides to treat, first at Rippon and afterwards at London, and a Parliament summoned to sit the 3d of November 1640. So universal was the dislike of the principles and proceedings of the Court, that notwithstanding all their endeavours, few of that party could obtain a seat in this Parliament (2). The Counties, Cities, and Burroughs, were almost unanimous in chusing State-Puritans, or (in the modern phrase) Whigs, that is, men, who without believing the divine right of Kings, were attached to the Constitution as well in Church as State, and enemies only to the abuse of power in both. Of such men the majority of the Commons consisted, whose sole intention was to redress the civil and ecclesiastical Grievances, and severely punish the authors (3). Had the House been entirely filled with these and the small number of the Court-party, the wounds in the Constitution would doubtless have been closed, and the liberties of the people secured from future invasion, without the extirpation of the Monarchy, or even Episcopacy. But unhappily there were also elected some, whose views were carried much farther, and who, not content with reforming abuses, were for removing foundations (4). These men, more considerable for their abilities than number, concealed their intentions at first, by pretending to confine their desires, with the friends of the Constitution, to the redress of Grievances.

To the Parliament, thus composed, the King in his first speech declares his resolution to put himself freely upon the affection of his subjects, and heartily subscribed his opinion, and was answerable for it. This part of the Constitution was broken by King Charles I, but more notoriously by King Charles II, who settled a Cabal or Cabinet-Council, where all matters of consequence were resolved, and then brought to the Privy-Council to be confirmed. See Pref. to the Hist. of Standing Armies.

(1) As the King (says Whitlock) had his private Junta, so the Agents of the Seals-Covenanters and their friends in London had their private meeting and counsels, with those who were discontented at the present management of affairs at Court, and who had suffered by the late proceedings; and from hence no small encouragement and promise of assistance was given to the Covenanters. Whit. Mem. p. 33.

(2) The Court (says Whitlock) laboured to bring in their friends; but those who were most favoured at Court, had least respect in the Country, and it was not a little strange to see what a spirit of opposition to the Court-proceedings, was in the hearts and actions of most of the people, so that very few of that party had the favour to be chosen members of this Parliament. Whit. Mem. p. 35.

(3) If the assertions of the Lord Clarendon and other writers on the King's side be impartially considered, it can hardly be doubted that the intention of much the greatest part of the Commons, at the time of their assembling, was not to alter the Constitution but reform abuses. And that even the views of those who were for alterations in Church and State, did not extend beyond abridging the temporal power of the Bishops and ecclesiastical courts, and bounding the prerogative so, as to prevent any future invasions of the rights of the subject. For though there were some who privately desired the abolition of Episcopacy, and others who secretly wished both that and the extirpation of the Monarchy, yet it is not possible they (especially the Republicans) should entertain the least hopes of seeing their desires accomplished, contrary to the principles and intentions of both Houses, and the general bent and genius of the nation. The subversion therefore of the civil and ecclesiastical constitution, which afterwards happened, was not owing to any settled design at the first, but to certain accidents and conjunctures not to be foreseen by the most acute understanding. The Lord Clarendon, speaking of the temper and constitution of both Houses, expressly says, "In the House of Commons were many persons of wisdom and gravity, who being possessed of great and plentiful fortunes, though they were undevoted enough to the Court, had all imaginable duty to the King, and affection to the Government established by law or ancient custom; and without doubt, the major part of that body consisted of men who had no mind to break the peace of the kingdom, or to make any considerable alteration in the government of Church or State."

B. I. p. 184. Agreeably to this representation was the order of the Commons of Novemb. 20. 1640, seventeen days after their first meeting, That none should sit in their House but such as would receive the Communion according to the usage of the Church of England. As for the Peers, the Lord Clarendon observes, that when the bill for taking away the votes of the Bishops in Parliament was brought into the House, there were only two Lords (Say and Brook) that appeared as enemies to the whole fabric of the Church, and to desire a dissolution of the episcopal Government. He likewise describes the principal members of the House of Commons to be well-affected, or at least not averse to the government of the Church, as Pym, Hollis, Whitlock, Selden, &c.; and of Hamden himself he says, "Most people believed, his dislike was rather to some Churchmen, than to the ecclesiastical government of the Church." It seems therefore unjust to charge in general the members of this Parliament with having from the beginning, designs of subverting the Constitution, or to blame their opposition to the proceedings of the Court, since frequency of Parliaments, redress of Grievances, and calling the King's arbitrary ministers to account, were the ends proposed by the major part of both Houses, to accomplish which, it was by some judged necessary to set bounds to the Prerogative Royal, and diminish the power of the Bishops, without the least thought of destroying the Civil or Ecclesiastical Government. It was not (says Welwood) a few of either House, but all the great patriots that concurred at first to make inquiry into the grievances of this reign. Sir Edward Hyde (afterwards Lord Clarendon) the Lord Digby, the Lord Falkland, the Lord Capel, Mr. Grimstone, (Speaker of that House of Commons, that brought in King Charles II), Mr. Holles, (since Lord Holles) all which suffered afterwards on the King's side; and in general most of those that took the King's part in the war, were the men that appeared with the greatest zeal for the redress of grievances, and their intentions were certainly noble and just, and tended to the equal advantage of King and People. Welw. Mem. p. 43.

(4) It must be observed, the Puritans had sometime been distinguished by the names of Doctrinal-Puritans, and Discipline-Puritans. The Doctrinal-Puritans were conformists to the Church of England, and well pleased with Episcopacy, but understood the articles of Justification, Free-will, Predestination, &c. in the literal or Calvinistical sense, and therefore were very averse to the persons of such Bishops, as espoused and propagated the opposite or Arminian interpretation of the same points. Most of the members of the House of Commons were, as to religion, Doctrinal-Puritans. The Discipline-Puritans, equally possessed with the divine Institution of Presbytery, as the rigid Churchmen with the divine right of Episcopacy, were enemies to the whole Hierarchy, and wished for the establishment of the Presbyterian Government. Of these there were but few at first in the Parliament, and still fewer Republicans, who afterwards, under the name of Independents, opposed as well the Presbyterian as Episcopacy, and by that means proved one occasion of the Restoration of King Charles II.

heartily to concur in the redress of their just Grievances. According to this declaration, the King consents to the abolition of Ship-Money (1), Knighthood-money, Monopolies, the Courts of Star-Chamber (2), and High-Commission (3), those great fountains of Grievances, and for a future security of his governing by law, passes a Bill for Triennial Parliaments (4). He also, though with reluctance, sacrifices one of his most intimate counsellors the Lord Strafford, to the repentment of the Commons; and as a demonstration of the sincerity of his intentions, gives the Commons power to sit till they should dissolve themselves.

After receiving the thanks of both Houses for these Acts, the King takes a journey to Scotland, and the pacification being concluded, the two armies are ordered to be disbanded. In Scotland the King, who had not long since attempted to introduce there the English Church-worship and discipline, resolves now, if possible, to regain the affection of his countrymen, or at least to keep them quiet, and to this end ratifies in Parliament all their late proceedings, and gives his consent to the Acts of the Glasgow Assembly; by one of which "the government of the Church by Archbishops and Bishops is declared to be against the word of God and propagation of religion, and Episcopacy utterly abolished" (5).

The Grievances of both nations being thus redressed, and the causes in great measure removed, the King was in hopes he should be no farther pressed. But he soon found he was mistaken. For during his absence in Scotland, the Leaders in the House of Commons had found means to infuse into many members a belief, that the King's concessions were no sufficient security against future encroachments of the Crown, and therefore it was necessary to obtain a farther limitation of the Prerogative, as well as a retrenchment of the Episcopal power. When they thought they had gained a majority to their opinion, upon news that the King was coming from Scotland, the famous Remonstrance of the state of the Kingdom was brought into the House and put to the vote. Hitherto the Commons had been unanimous in the reformation of abuses, but in this affair, after a long and violent debate, the House was divided, and the Remonstrance carried but by nine voices (6).

Eight

(1) By this Act, all the proceedings in the business of Ship-money were adjudged void, and the judgments, enrolments, and entries thereupon, vacated and cancelled. Besides, some clauses in the statute assert the subject's liberty and property beyond what was done by the Petition of Right, which (says the Lord Clarendon) needed an additional establishment.

(2) The exorbitances (says Lord Clarendon) of this Court had been such, that there were very few persons of quality who had not suffered or been perplexed by the weight or fear of those censures and judgments. For having extended their jurisdiction from riots, perjury, and the most notorious misdemeanors, to an asserting all Proclamations and orders of State; to the vindicating illegal Commissions and grants of Monopolies, (all which were the chief ground-works of their late proceedings) no man could hope to be longer free from the inquisition of that Court, than he resolved to submit to those and the like extraordinary courses. B. III. p. 284.

(3) The High-Commission Court was erected by a statute in the first year of Queen Elizabeth, instead of a jurisdiction which had been exercised under the Pope's authority, then abolished. Of late (says the Lord Clarendon) it cannot be denied, that by the great power of some Bishops at court, it had much over-bowed the banks which should have contained it. Then, it was grown from an ecclesiastical Court, for reformation of manners, to a Court of Revenue; and imposed great fines upon those who were culpable before them; sometimes above the degree of the offence, had the jurisdiction of fining been unquestionable: which it was not. The Act for abolishing the High-Commission repeals that branch of the statute of the first of Queen Elizabeth, upon which this Court was founded, and then enacts, "That no Archbishops, Bishops, Vicars General, Chancellor, or Official, nor their Commissaries, or any other ecclesiastical officer, shall, by any grant, &c. from the King, after the first of August 1641, award, impose, or inflict any pain, penalty, fine, amercement, imprisonment, or other corporal punishment, upon any of the King's subjects, for any contempt, misdemeanor, crime, matter, or thing, whatsoever, belonging to ecclesiastical jurisdiction; or shall, ex officio, administer to any person, any corporal oath, to make any presentment of any crime, or to confess or accuse himself of any crime or misdemeanor, whereby he or she may be liable to any punishment, under the penalty of treble charges, and a hundred pound to him who shall demand the same. Nor shall any new Court be erected with like power, as the High-Commission had or pretended to have, but all such Commissions from the King and his successors, and all Acts made by virtue thereof shall be "utterly void." By this Act (as the Lord Clarendon observes) all coercive power, and in a manner, all ecclesiastical jurisdiction, were taken from the spiritual Courts. B. III. p. 284.

(4) Whitelock observes, that the Committee for this Bill took a great deal of pains in framing it, p. 39. There are in it many strong clauses in favour of the subjects, in case the crown should omit the sending out the writs; particularly, "the giving the people authority to assemble together, if the King failed to call them." However, (says the Lord Clarendon) since it was evident that great inconveniences had befallen the Kingdom by the long intermission of Parliaments, and this intermission could not have happened, if there had not been some neglect of what had been settled by former laws; therefore there was some colour of reason for these clauses, by which the crown could in no case suffer, but by its own default. B. III. p. 282. This and the two foregoing notes plainly show, the Commons in these, as well as in other Acts passed about the same time, against Monopolies, Knighthood-money, encroachments in the Stannery Courts, and for the certainty of bounds of Forests, (all which had been occasions of great oppressions) had just reasons for their proceedings, by the confession even of the Lord Clarendon himself, who says also concerning Forest, That the people had been so vexed by the Justice in Eyre's seat, that few men could assure themselves their estates and houses might not be brought within the jurisdiction of some Forest, which if they were, it cost them great fines. B. III. p. 286. These Acts have been the more fully explained, as they are but just mentioned by Rapin, at the time of their being passed. Vol. II. p. 355.

(5) This concession to the Scots (says Lord Clarendon) gave unspeakable encouragement to the enemies of the Church of England, whose number from thenceforth wonderfully increased. They presumed their work was more than half done, when the King himself declared, (as they said, by his assent to that Act) that Episcopal Government was against the word of God, and many concluding the King would at last yield to any thing, put themselves in company of the boldest and most positive actors. B. IV. p. 310. The true reason, doubtless, of these concessions to the Scots, was the King's knowledge how subservient they had been to the designs of the English Parliament, and to prevent their interfering for the future. But in this he was disappointed; for when, in the course of the war, the Parliament was obliged to apply to them for their assistance, it was readily granted.

(6) When the leading men in the House of Commons (who suspected the King's sincerity) saw, that many members, and great part of the nation appeared satisfied

Eight days after his return, this Remonstrance, with a petition for removing evil counsellors, and for his concurrence in the farther abridging the temporal power of the Clergy, was presented to the King, after which it was printed and published to the people.

From thenceforward two parties arose, as well in the nation as in the Houses of Parliament. The one, satisfied with the redress of the Grievances, thought the Remonstrance needless, and the people's rights amply secured by the King's sincerity, and the Act for Triennial Parliaments. The other believed these fences too weak, and insisted upon stronger securities in the abridgment of the royal power.

Agreeably to their petition, and pursuant to their design of a farther reformation, the Commons brought in a bill to take away the Bishops' votes in Parliament, and to disable Clergymen from having any temporal jurisdiction. As the Bishops had all along promoted the principles and proceedings of the Court, and with great severity to the opposers introduced innovations into the Church, the bill was passed in the Lower-House, even by those who were no enemies to the episcopal order (1). But it would have found greater opposition in the House of Lords, had not the Bishops unadvisedly given the Commons an opportunity of causing twelve of their bench to be confined (2). By this means the Bill at length was also passed by the Peers. The royal assent would have been still more difficult to obtain, had not the King, while the Bill was depending, committed the fatal error of accusing of high-treason the Lord Kimbolton, with five Commoners, and going in person to the House with a numerous retinue to demand them (3). This proceeding alarmed not only the Parliament but the whole Nation. The party which had lately begun to appear in the King's favour were now filled with distrust, and inclined to believe the necessity of abridging the prerogative (4). In the midst of the tumults, fears, and jealousies raised on this occasion, the King, to his farther disadvantage, retired from the Parliament, first to Hampton-court, and from thence to Windsor.

Mean while the leaders in the House of Commons, convinced by the King's late conduct, that satisfied with the redress of Grievances and the Triennial Act, and that the King, now in Scotland, in order to pacify the Covenanters, readily assented to whatever was desired by the parliament of that Kingdom, they renewed their endeavours to make it believed that the King would break through all his concessions, as in the case of the Petition of Right, whenever it should be in his power. To this end it was insinuated, the King still retained his old principles; was under the absolute influence of the Queen; had redressed the chief Grievances with reluctance, and therefore the Triennial Act would be but a weak barrier against future oppressions; if stronger bounds were not set to the Prerogative. Perhaps these insinuations might not so easily have had the desired effect, had they not been strengthened by several accidents during the King's stay in Scotland, as the design at Edinburgh to murder Hamilton and Argyle, which some were persuaded to believe was intended to reach farther than to those Lords; but more especially the Irish rebellion and massacre, which happened in this interval, served to increase the King's enemies in the Parliament and Nation. "For (says Lord Clarendon) all occasions being taken to insinuate that this rebellion was contrived and fomented by the King, or at least by the Queen; and that the rebels declared, they had the King's authority for all they did: this calumny made more impression upon the minds of sober and moderate men (who till that time had much disliked the passionate proceedings of the Parliament) than could be then imagined, or can be yet believed. So great a prejudice was universally contracted against the Court, especially the Queen, whose power and activity was thought too great." (B. IV. p. 301.) At this juncture the Remonstrance of the state of the Kingdom was ordered to be prepared, wherein are described all the illegalities and faults in Government since the King's accession to the crown, with an intimation of the necessity of a farther reformation. This Remonstrance not being directed to the King but the Publick, was a sort of appeal to the people for bounding the Prerogative, and may justly be considered as the first step towards the breach between King and Parliament. See the Remonstrance and the King's Answer. Rapin, Vol. II. p. 388.

(1) The Lord Clarendon says, one great cause of this bill was the contempt the Bishops had shewn of the common law, in a wrong notion, that the straitening and confining that profession, would naturally extend the jurisdiction of the Church. Thence arose (says he) their bold and unwarrantable opposing and protesting against Prohibitions and other proceedings at law, on the behalf of Ecclesiastical Courts, and procuring some privileges from the King on behalf of the Civil, even with an exclusion of the common Lawyers: as "that half the masters of Chancery should be always civil Lawyers." And "that no others, of what condition soever, should serve as masters of Request." By these and many other provocations, the professors of the common law were excited entirely to root up and demolish the jurisdiction of the Church. Clar. B. III. p. 283. IV. p. 305. This might be one reason why the common Lawyers joined in this Bill; but the true ground of it was, because the Commons plainly saw the Bishops' votes in the House of Lords would greatly retard, if not wholly prevent, their design of a farther reformation. For twenty-six votes, when there were not above a hundred members, could almost at any time turn the scale which way they pleased.

(2) The Bishops, on account of some insults from the populace, having absented themselves from the House, a Protestation is rashly signed by twelve of them, against all Acts and Votes in their absence as null and void. This protestation the Lord-Keeper Littleton, by the King's command, read next morning in the House of Lords. It was immediately communicated to the Commons, who, within half an hour, accuse the twelve Bishops of high-treason, for endeavouring to subvert the being of Parliaments. Whereupon ten are committed to the Towers, and two, by reason of their age, to the Black-Rod.

(3) This sudden action (says Whitlock) was the first visible and apparent ground of the following miseries; p. 51. And therefore (says Walswood) the advisers of it are justly chargeable with all the blood that was afterwards spilt, p. 58. It was believed, if the King had found the members in the House, and called in his guards to seize them, the House would have endeavoured their defence, which might have proved a very unhappy business. Whit. p. 51. The Lord Clarendon ascribes it to Lord Digby; others to the Queen. However this be, so notorious a breach could not but be of infinite disadvantage to the King in the present juncture, being looked upon as equal to a dissolution of the Parliament, since he might, (they said) upon the same grounds, as well seize five hundred as five members. Wherefore it not only produced an union in both Houses, but was a plain indication that the King would assuredly be revenged of such members as had given him offence, whenever it should be in his power; which consideration determined the leading men to tie up his hands for the future, by abridging the prerogative.

(4) The minds of men (says Lord Clarendon) throughout the Kingdom, were now prepared to receive all the dictates of the Commons with reverence, to obey all their orders, and to believe all their safety depended upon their authority; and there were few in the House that there was no safety for them without retrenching his power, fail not in this time of universal distrust to push their design. For their own, therefore, as well as the nation's security against all future attempts of the crown, petitions are sent to the King, first by the Commons alone, and then by both Houses, to put the power of the Militia, and command of the Tower, and other fortresses into the hands of the Parliament, as the only means to remove their jealousies and fears (1). The King being determined to divest himself of no power he could legally claim (2), rejects these petitions, but by the Queen's persuasions, passes the Bill for depriving the Bishops of their votes, and Clergymen of all temporal jurisdiction, in hopes of softening the Houses (3).

Not satisfied with this, the Parliament finding their petitions ineffectual, settle the Militia by an Ordinance, which is offered to the King for the royal assent. The King refuses it, and by degrees retires to York. Here a Bill, after passing both Houses, is presented to him for settling the Militia in the Parliament for a limited time, which is also rejected (4). Whereupon the Parliament nominate Lieutenants for the several counties, and require them to put the Ordinance of the Militia in execution. To this the King forbids obedience, summons the gentry of the northern counties to York, and raises a guard of horse and foot. About the same time several members of both Houses withdraw, and particularly nine Peers resort to the King. Mean time, the Parliament, according to a former desire of the King, send him all their demands, digested into nineteen Propositions, which are rejected by the King, as inconsistent with his rights (5). Soon July 10. after, the King sends forth his commissions of array, the Parliament vote the raising an army, July 12. and the King, at last, erects his standard at Aug. 22. Nottingham. Thus, the civil war was kindled; and now arose the distinctions of Royalists and Parliamentarians, Cavaliers and Roundheads.

It must not be thought that the members of each of these parties were united in principles and opinions. The Royalists, or those that declared for the King, lifted in his service upon different motives. State of Parties at the breaking out of the Civil Wars.

who had courage to oppose and contradict them. B. IV. p. 385.

(1) When this Bill (according to the Lord Clarendon) was first brought into the House, few imagined it would ever be countenanced beyond the first reading: but now (adds he) "there were few who did not believe it to be a very necessary provision for the peace and safety of the Kingdom. So great an impression had the late proceedings made upon them." B. IV. p. 388.

(2) The truth is, I speak it knowingly (says Lord Clarendon) at that time the King's resolution was to shelter himself wholly under the law: to grant any thing that by the law he was obliged to grant: and to deny what by the law was in his own power; and which he found inconvenient to assent to. B. V. p. 466. This resolution was doubtless the cause of his ruin, for by a too-long continuance in it, he gave the enemies of the Constitution an opportunity of subverting it, by preventing an accommodation between him and the Parliament.

(3) The King was persuaded to pass this Bill even by some cordial friends to the church of England, who told him, that the passing this Bill was the only way to preserve the Church; for by it many persons in both Houses would be fully satisfied, and not join in any further alteration, who otherwise would violently endeavour an extirpation of Bishops; and besides, by granting this, perhaps he would not be misled in the Militia Bill. However, these arguments did not prevail with him: so much as the Queen's persuasions, who was afraid her voyage to Holland would be crossed by the Parliament. It had been, it seems, concerted at Wind-sor, that the Queen should go with the Princess her daughter (betrothed to the Prince of Orange) into Holland, and carry with her the Crown-Jewels to be pawned for the King's use, if there should be occasion. The Lord Clarendon insinuates here, that in this and some other acts of no less moment, an opinion that the violence and force used in procuring them, rendered them absolutely void, influenced the King to confirm them. Clar. B. IV. p. 427, 439. Whit. p. 52. This insinuation seems to give strength to the suspicions of the leading men in the House of Commons, that the King, if not prevented, would revoke his concessions, whenever it should be in his power.

(4) The King had desired that the Ordinance might be digested into an Act of Parliament, and the powers to be granted not left to an indefinite time. Whereupon the Commons prepared a Bill, and limited the time to less than two years. The affair of the Militia was the immediate cause of the rupture between the King and Parliament. This point had never before been maturely considered, and therefore it is no wonder the Lawyers were divided in opinion about it. Pal- mer, Hyde, Bridgeman, with some other eminent Lawyers and Gentlemen, affirmed, the power of the Militia to be wholly in the King, and on the passing of the Ordinance withdrew from the House. Solicitor St. John, Maynard, Glyn, Selden, with divers Gentlemen of great parts and interest, believed it to be in the Parliament, and if the King refused to order the same according to the advice of both Houses, they by law might do it without him: And pursuant to this opinion, accepted commissions of Deputy-Lieutenancy. Whit. p. 56.

In a debate, it was said by a member (Whitlock) to this effect: "This great power which commands all men and all things, is by some affirmed to be in the King, by others, in the Parliament: I differ from these opinions, and apprehend, it is neither in the King only, nor in the Parliament. This power is not in the King only, because the power of money, without which the other will be of little force, is not in the King but in the Commons. The King indeed may require forty days service in war of his military tenants, but beyond that they will not stay without pay. The King can compel no man to go out of the Kingdom, and therefore foreign wars are not to be undertaken without the advice of the Parliament; otherwise the King must pay his army himself, for no man can be pressed by law to serve in war but by Act of Parliament. The power of the Militia is exercised against insurrections at home, or invasions from abroad. Against insurrections, the Sheriff has this power in him; against invasions, every man will be ready to give his assistance. It is my opinion, therefore, that this power, which the law has not expressly settled any where, is in the King and Parliament both consenting together, and I think it best it should be there still; and the King petitioned that the Militia may be settled in such hands as you may trust." Whit. p. 53.

The many debates and papers published on this occasion, seem to have been designed for the satisfaction of those who were for laying only legal restraints on the King. For the main point was, not where this power was placed by the law, but whether it was necessary for the publick welfare in the present juncture, to settle it for a time in such hands as the Parliament should approve. This was absolutely refused by the King. For when the Earl of Pembroke asked him, whether he would grant the Militia, as desired by the Parliament, for a time? No, replies the King, by God, not for an hour. These hasty words did the King great injury, they being spoken just after he had in a manner promised to comply, when he should know how long it was to be thus settled. Rush. IV. p. 533.

(5) The King by message to the Parliament, Jan. 20. 1641, advised them "to digest into one body all the Grievances of the Kingdom and send them to him, "promi-motives. Whilst the Parliament confined themselves to the redress of Grievances, their proceedings were opposed by very few members, and approved by the bulk of the nation. At that time therefore, the King could not be said to have any party, either in the two Houses, or in the nation, except the Bishops, good part of the Clergy, the Universities; in a word, such as had embraced the principle of the divine Right of Kings, and the consequent doctrine of Passive Obedience, whose number was not very great. The rest of the nation, however disagreeing in other respects, were unanimous in their approbation of reforming what was amiss, as well in the Church as the State. But when the Acts to this end, passed by the King, were not deemed a sufficient security for the future, and farther limitations were designed, then it was that the King began to have a considerable party both in the Parliament and Nation, by the union of all who being satisfied with the King's concessions, opposed the abridging of the prerogative. Many members of Parliament, who had approved themselves Patriots in zealously promoting the legal redress of abuses, when they saw a farther reformation not only intended but begun in the Militia bill, withdrew to the King, and by these he was chiefly enabled to carry on the war. (1)

The Royalists.

The Royalists therefore partly consisted of such as professed to believe all resistance unlawful, but principally of those who thought the prerogative ought to be restrained within the bounds prescribed by the law; but relying on the King's sincerity and the Triennial Act, were utterly against any farther alterations in the civil or ecclesiastical State. To these may be added the Catholics, who, in return for the indulgence they enjoyed, assisted the King with their persons and purses.

The Parliamentarians, in like manner, were far from being all in the same sentiments. The chief branch consisted of those who really believed, from the King's late proceedings, that he had not altered his principles, but would, if left in possession of his full power, revoke his concessions, and be revenged of his opposers. To limit the prerogative, therefore, was the professed design of the Parliamentarians, and what properly at this time distinguished them from the Royalists (2). With this branch were mixed all the enemies of Episcopacy, and friends of Presbytery; all the Republicans and Independents, whose several wishes and views outwardly seemed at present to extend only to a farther limitation of the prerogative. In a word,

The Royalists, on a supposition of the King's sincerity, drew their swords for the Church, the Laws, and the legal rights of the Crown; and the Parliamentarians took arms in defence of the fountain of all social happiness the liberties of the People, in a belief, that as they had, contrary to the most solemn declarations from the throne, been trampled upon many years, they would again be invaded, unless secured by a temporary limitation of the Prerogative. These were the real grounds of the civil

"promising his favourable assent to those means which should be found most effectual for redress." Whit. p. 52. Accordingly, the following June, the nineteen propositions were presented to him, wherein it was desired, (I.) That the Privy-Counsellors, foreign Ministers, (III.) Great Officers of State, and (XV.) commanders of Forts and Castles, may be appointed with the approbation of the Parliament. (II.) That affairs of publick concern may be transacted only in Parliament, and other matters of State by the Privy-Council, (whose number shall not exceed twenty-five, nor be less than fifteen) and all their publick Acts attested under their hands. (XI.) That the Privy-Counsellors and Judges swear to maintain the Petition of Right, and certain statutes made by this Parliament. (XII.) That the Judges and other Officers appointed with the approbation of both Houses, hold their places quam diu bene se gesserint. (IV.) That the Governours of the King's children may be approved by both Houses, and, in the intervals of Parliament, by the major part of the Council; and (V.) no marriage concluded for them without consent of Parliament. (VI.) That the laws against Jesuits, Priests, and Papists Recusants, may be strictly executed. (VII.) That the votes of Papish Lords may be taken away, and an act passed for educating their children in the Protestant Religion. (VIII.) That such a reformation may be made of the Church Government and Liturgy, as both Houses assisted by an assembly of Divines, shall advise. (IX.) That the ordinance for the Militia may remain, till the same be settled by a Bill. (X.) That the members of this Parliament may be restored to the places they have been removed from. (XIII.) That the justice of Parliament may pass upon Delinquents. (XIV.) That the general pardon may be granted, with such exceptions as shall be advised by the Parliament. (XV.) That all forces about his Majesty may be dismissed. (XVI.) and a more strict alliance made with the Protestant States. (XVII.) That the accused members may be cleared by Act of Parliament. (XIX.) That Peers made hereafter may be restrained from sitting in Parliament, unless admitted with the consent of both Houses. These restrictions, though they seemed to intrench upon the royal prerogative, were, however, agreeable to the nature of the English

Constitution, and such as a King, who sincerely intends the welfare and happiness of his people, would chuse to make the rule of his conduct. But however this be, they were infinitely preferable to the calamities of a civil war, which the refusal of them was sure to produce. Nevertheless, these propositions were rejected by the King, pursuant to his resolution of not divesting himself of any power which he thought legal, and, in a belief, that greater limitations would not be offered him, though he should happen to be vanquished in the war. This resolution, and this belief, proved fatal not only to himself, but also to the State, in the utter subversion of the Constitution.

(1) It is a mistaken notion that King Charles's party were mostly induced to espouse his quarrel, from a belief of the divine Right of Kings, and the doctrine of unlimited Obedience. Most of the great men who engaged and suffered on his side, had been zealous assertors of the national liberties, and had strenuously resisted the incroachments of the Crown, as far as was warrantable by law. Besides, it was not till after the restoration that these notions spread much beyond the Court, the Clergy, the Universities, and such as were under their influence. The alterations in the Constitution beyond what was thought legal, was properly what first raised King Charles an army.

(2) It has been warmly disputed, on which side the war was first begun? Whether the King or the Parliament was the aggressor? But this seems not to be the point that ought chiefly to be considered. All but those who profess the doctrine of Passive Obedience, must, at this day, be determined for, or against the King, in the same manner as the several parties were formed at the time of the rupture. He that believes, the King's concessions were a sufficient guard against any invasions of the national liberties, and that his Majesty really intended for the future to govern by law, must condemn the Parliament for requiring a farther security, and deem the two Houses authors of the war. On the other hand, he that thinks, the King had unwillingly consented to these Acts, and would have revoked them, if ever it had been in his power, must throw the blame of the war on the King, for not agreeing to a farther limitation of his prerogative, at least for a time.

(1) The civil war; for if either the Parliament had seen cause to rely on the royal word, or the King been willing to part with the Militia but for a few years, it would have been out of the power of faction, private views and resentments, to introduce the confusion which followed, or to hinder, in case the King had first relaxed, the settling of the Constitution on lasting foundations. But,

Both sides appealing to the sword, the war is, in the beginning, waged with equal success, but afterwards with disadvantage to the Parliament. Wherefore, as the King had resolved to call in the Irish to his assistance, the Parliament treat with the Scots for their aid. The Scots, believing their Religion and Liberties depended on the success of the Parliamentarians, readily arm in their defence, on condition that uniformity in worship and discipline be endeavoured in the three Kingdoms of England, Scotland, and Ireland. To this end a Covenant (1) is subscribed by both Houses, with the assembly of Divines (2), and afterwards enjoined to be taken by the people, though it is far from appearing that the Presbyterians were the majority in the Parliament (3). By the assistance of the Scots and change of the General (4) the scale is so turned to the Parliament's side, that the King daily loses ground.

Mean time, a great and sudden change is wrought by the Republicans, who still lay concealed. It is so managed by Cromwel and some others, that the army is entirely new-modelled, and by an Ordinance of both Houses, all members of Parliament are rendered incapable of civil or military office. Fairfax is made General; and Cromwel, who had a great influence over him, is, notwithstanding the Ordinance, continued Lieutenant-General of the horse. Thus the Independents, without discovering themselves, or their designs, become at once almost masters of the army. Three months after this Ordinance, the King, by the loss of the battle of Naseby, is unable to keep the field, and shifting some time from place to place, throws himself at last into the Scottish army before Newark.

The Scots upon this retire to Newcastle, and by

(1) The Covenant consisted of six articles; the chief of which were, I. To endeavour to bring the Churches of the three Kingdoms to the nearest uniformity in worship and discipline; and II. To endeavour the extirpation of the Hierarchy. See Rapin, Vol. II. p. 483.

(2) The Ordinance for convening this assembly was to this effect: "Whereas it has been declared by both Houses, that the present Church-Government by Archbishops, Bishops, &c. is prejudicial to the State, they are resolved it shall be taken away, and such a Government settled in the Church, as may be most agreeable to God's holy word, and of near agreement with the Church of Scotland, and other reformed Churches abroad. For the better effecting whereof, and for vindicating and clearing the doctrine of the Church of England from all false calumnies, it is thought fit to call an assembly of learned Divines to consult about the premises, and give their advice to both or either of the Houses when they shall be required". This Assembly was to meet in Henry VII's Chapel, and consisted of three sorts of Clergy, Episcopal, Independent, but mostly Presbyterian, to the number of a hundred and twenty. With these were joined many members of both Houses, with power of debating and voting, the chief were, the Earls of Northumberland, Bedford, Pembroke, Salisbury, Holland, Manchester; the Lord Sey, Conway, Wharton, Howard of Esherick; with Selden, Rous, Prideaux, both the Vanes, Pym, Mognard, Whitlock, and several other Commons.

(3) It must be observed, that not only above a hundred members had deserted or been excluded the House, but also some of the most eminent were dead since the beginning of the war, particularly Hamden and Pym, which caused a great alteration in the Parliament. By the first, the votes against the Hierarchy, and for the taking of the Covenant, met with the less opposition; and by the latter, the designs of Cromwel and the Army were the more easily executed. It is indeed the general opinion of the Historians, and amongst the rest, of Rapin himself, that at this time the majority of the Commons was Presbyterian, but there seem to be very strong arguments to the contrary. It is true, Presbytery had gained ground in the nation, because the Parochial Clergy (who will always have a great influence over the people's religion) were mostly Presbyterians. But it was far from being the same in the House of Commons, for the following reasons. When they voted the abolition of Episcopacy, (which was done to please the Scots) the Bill was not to take place till above a year after, in which time it was hoped the breach with the King would be made up. Again, had they really intended it, what hindered them from establishing the Presbyterian Government and Discipline, when they were supported by a Scottish army which was come for that very end? In almost every page of Whitlock's Memorials we find petitions from the assembly of Divines, from the Scots, from the City of London, for the establishment of Presbytery, and yet the thing was continually deferred. And even at last, when both Houses passed an Ordinance for settling the Presbyterian Government, the settlement was to last but three years, with a reserve of all Ecclesiastical jurisdiction to themselves, which they would never part with. Wherefore the King, in his letter to the Scots, said very rightly: "We are confident (says his Majesty) the most considerable persons (in the Parliament) and those who make the fairest pretensions to you of uniformity, will not sooner embrace a Presbyterian, than you an Episcopal Government." Mem. of Ham. B. IV. p. 107. Of the same opinion was the Lord Gloucester: "Very much the major part of the members that continued in the Parliament House, were (says he) cordially affected to the established Government, at least not affected to any other." Vol. II. p. 117. The case seems to be this. The Commons shewed, upon all occasions, that they did not believe any Church-Government in particular to be jure divino, but that either the Episcopal or Presbyterian might be established, according as the peace and welfare of the publick required it. And as they had a lively sense of what the nation had suffered from the abuses of ecclesiastical power, and had before their eyes an instance of the intolerable yoke of the Presbyterian Discipline in Scotland, they were resolved never to lodge any coercive power in the hands of the Clergy. Hence their early bill, passed by the King, to take away the temporal jurisdiction of all Clergymen. Hence their express prohibition to the assembly of Divines, to exercise any authority. In vain did the assembly offer frequent petitions to have the power of the Keys, of Excommunication, &c. the Commons declare they can never consent to be subject to near ten thousand Judicatures. Nor did the same assembly succeed any better in their assertion of the divine right of Presbytery; the House would not come into their notion: On the contrary, being informed of an intended petition for establishing Presbytery as the discipline of Jesus Christ, they voted it scandalous. Whit. p. 159. In short, the opinion of the House, in these respects, seems to be expressed in three speeches made by Mr. Selden, and two other members, to the assembly of Divines, which the reader will find in Whitlock's Memorials, p. 94, 163. From hence also appears the reason why the Army and Independents came to have so strong a party in the House. For Toleration, and a renouncing of all coercive power, were two professed principles of the Independents, to which the Commons had all along been inclined, and to which the Presbyterians were utterly averse.

(4) The Earl of Essex's scruples to fight against the King's person were of great service to the Parliament, and occasioned his removal.

INTRODUCTION.

by their sollicitation, the Parliament sends propositions to the King. Confirmation of the Covenant, abolition of Episcopacy, and settlement of the Militia in both Houses for twenty years, are the principal articles. The King absolutely rejecting the two first, the Scots deliver him up to the Parliament, and march into their own country.

At this time contests arise between the Army and Parliament. The Army refuse to disband, and resolve to have a share in settling the Government. They begin with seizing the King's person whom they conduct to Hampton-Court. Here the King privately treats with the Scottish Commissioners, and afterwards signs an agreement with them, by which, on certain conditions, they engage speedily to bring an army into the field, and in conjunction with the English Presbyterians and Royalists, free him from the Independents, and restore him to his just rights (1). The King's reliance on this army and the insurrections of his party, prevents his closing with the Parliament's terms (2), and finishes his ruin. For the Scots are routed, and the Royalists dispersed; after which the army suddenly resolve to bring the King to a public trial as the author of the war. The members that oppose this resolution are by violence kept from the House; and the rest, either agreeing in sentiments with the army, or for other private ends, erect a High-Court of Justice, by which the King is condemned and beheaded. Presently after, the same Commons vote the House of Peers useless, abolish the Monarchy, and, though in perfect subjection to the army, declare themselves the supreme authority.

Thus instead of pursuing the ends proposed at first by the majority of both Houses, instead of reforming the excesses of the civil and ecclesiastical powers, and preventing the like Crimes for the future, the Constitution both in Church and State was by a small part of the House of Commons, in conjunction with a standing army, entirely destroyed. During the course of the war, both King and Parliament had continually expressed an inclination to peace; but as the one would not make the least concession with regard to the Militia, and the other would not be satisfied without having it in their hands, at least for a time, it is too plain, the negotiations were intended only for the amusement of the people, and the case still remained the same as in the beginning of the war; namely, the blame was thrown on the King or the Parliament, according as a farther security was, or was not, thought necessary. But when the King, by the chance of war, was fallen into the hands of the Parliament, and offered not only to settle the Militia in both Houses for seven, ten, nay twenty years, but also to appoint the Privy-Counsellors and great officers of State with their approbation, the fear of future invasions of the people's rights, or the apprehensions of danger to particular persons from the crown, could no longer be pleaded as lawful obstacles to a peace, and consequently the King, from that time, stood clear of all blame that the Government was not settled in a regular manner, on the foot of the antient Constitution. The Presbyterians, grown numerous in the nation, and encouraged by the Scots, would not be content with the security of their civil and religious rights, but possessed with their jus divinum, insisted on the total abolition of Episcopacy, and absurdly claimed a more tyrannical power over conscience, than what had ever been complained of in the Bishops. This, and this alone proved the occasion (though contrary to their intention) of the King's death, in giving the Independent Army time to purge the House (as they called it) of such members as refused to come into their measures (3).

By this means not only the Constitution is entirely subverted, but the Presbyterians themselves are

(1) The King promised to confirm the Covenant by Act of Parliament, for the security of those by whom it had been or should be taken, with this proviso, that none should be constrained to take it. He also engaged to confirm, in the same manner, Presbyterian Government, &c. for three years, with an exception of himself and household. And that course should be taken for the suppression of all Sectaries, as Anabaptists, Independents, &c. See Rapin, Vol. II. p. 543. As the King, by this treaty, was to be restored to the power of the Militia, choice of Officers and Privy-Counsellors, which the Parliament refused him, he was doubtless the more easily induced to consent to it. It is observable, on this occasion, that the Scottish as well as English Presbyterians were irreconcilable enemies to Toleration, the suppression of all other persuasions being a point they constantly insisted upon, though they had loudly complained of the Episcopal Clergy for persecution, during the first fifteen years of this reign. The pretended, though not real, ground of this aversion to Toleration, wherever it prevails, is the same; namely, the claim of divine Institution. Thus the rigid Presbyterian looks with the same eye upon other Sects, as the rigid Episcopalian looks upon Dissenters, and as the Papist upon Hereticks, because all Three equally claim an authority jure divino.

(2) Both Houses, notwithstanding the dissent of the Scottish Commissioners, had agreed upon a personal treaty with the King, provided he would pass four bills, for settling the Militia; for recalling Declarations, &c. for disabling the Lords, made after the Great Seal was carried to Oxford, to sit in the House of Peers; and for empowering both Houses to adjourn as they should think fit. Probably the King would have passed these bills, had it not been for his treaty with the Scottish Commissioners, who coming the next day, after the bills were presented to the King, prevailed with him privately to sign their agreement, and refuse the four bills. The bills were brought to him, Nov. 24. 1647. The Scottish Commissioners came the 25th, with the agreement ready drawn, which the King signed the 26th, and sent the same day an unsatisfactory answer to the four bills, with design to have made his escape presently after from the Ile of White, where, by Cromwell's secret management (as it is said) he had withdrawn himself, but was prevented by a closer confinement. Ludlow and others intimate, the King whilst at Hampton-Court, and in treaty with the Scots, received some private overtures from the army, but that Cromwell discovering the King's secret negotiations with the Scots, and intercepting a letter to the Queen of the King's intention to destroy him, when it should be in his power, instantly resolved to bring the King to the scaffold. He found the army very ready to second him, since they would have been cashiered without fail, had the King and Parliament agreed upon any terms.

(3) The King, in the last treaty at Newport, not only offered to settle the Militia in both Houses, but also that Presbytery should be confirmed by Act of Parliament for three years, and a free consultation be had with the assembly of Divines (increased with twenty of the King's nomination) how Church-Government after that time might be settled by his Majesty and both Houses. It is true, the Parliament soon after voted the King's concessions sufficient grounds for settling the peace of the kingdom. But in condescension to the Presbyterians, by whom London was then governed, they had so long insisted on the abolition of Episcopacy, that two days are also disappointed of their aim. Cromwel having gained the battle of Worcester, reduced Scotland and restored the Irish affairs, puts an end at once to the Commonwealth and the remains of the Parliament, by turning the Commons out of their House. Then under the title of Protector he assumes the Government; and though Presbyter is continued in the Church, he allows, to the great mortification of the Presbyterians, Toleration in matters of Religion. After Cromwel's death, and his son's resignation, the Republican members (called in derision the Kump) are restored by the army, and again prevented from sitting. Upon which there arises a division in the army; Monk, with his forces in Scotland, declares against these proceedings, and for the Parliament, which is not only re-assembled, but the secluded members restored to their seats. After which, passing an order for summoning a new Parliament of Lords and Commons to meet the 25th of April 1660, they at last dissolve themselves. The new Parliament, without other terms than the promise of a general pardon and liberty of conscience, unanimously call King Charles II. to the throne.

Thus were lost two signal opportunities of settling the Constitution on lasting foundations; namely, at the end of the civil wars, when the King was ready to comply with any methods for securing the national liberties; and at the Restoration, when King Charles II. would have gladly submitted to such limitations, as should have been thought necessary for the prevention of future abuses of power. But the Presbyterians, out of hatred to the Independents, by whom they had been kept in subjection almost twelve years, so hastily joined with the Royalists, in the restoration of the King, that the siber and confederate persons of the several parties could not be heard amidst the general transport.

Instead therefore of improving the juncture, ^{71 State} and settling the Government on the foundations of liberty; instead of fixing the bounds of the Prerogative, and securing the rights of the People agreeable to the ancient Constitution, the same principles of civil and ecclesiastical power which had been maintained by King James, and pursued by King Charles I. and which had thrown the nation into wars and confusion, not only revived with more strength than ever, but received the sanction of a legal establishment. The very Parliament or Convention by which the Monarchy was restored led the way, and even before the King's arrival, asserted that the Crown, on his father's decease, did immediately descend to him by inherent Birth-right (1). And in their Act for an attainder of the Regicides, they declare, that neither the Parliament nor the whole nation together have any coercive power over the King (2). These foundations being laid, a superstructure was raised to a great height by the next Parliament, which met May 8, 1660. and continued almost eighteen years. Not content with declaring, that the King ought in no case to be resisted, both Houses enjoined all orders of men to swear to a belief of the unlawfulness of taking arms, not only against the King, but even against those that are commissioned by him (3). In ⁷² 1660 it was moved by a member of each House, that the word Law-

days after this vote, above a hundred members were seized by the army, and the King suddenly brought to a trial. It may here be observed, that the King's concessions were never in season but generally too late. He that declared he would not, to please the Parliament, diminish the meanness of his servants, passed afterwards the Earl of Strafford's attainder, and offered to chuse his Counsellors, Ministers, and Officers of State, with the approbation of both Houses. He that declared he would not part with the Militia for an hour, offered to settle it in the Parliament for twenty years; whereas his consent for two years, at first, would have prevented the civil wars. The same may be said of his other concessions. So that Burnet had reason to say, "The truth was, the King did not come into his concessions seasonably, nor with a good grace: All appeared to be extorted from him." Vol. I. p. 31.

(1) In the form of proclaiming the King, May 8, 1660. are these words: "We the Lords and Commons assembled in Parliament, together with the Lord Mayor, &c. unanimously acknowledge and proclaim that immediately upon the decease of our late Sovereign King Charles I. the imperial Crown of the Realm of England, &c. did by inherent Birth-right, and lawful and undoubted Succession, descend to his most excellent Majesty King Charles II. as being lineally the next heir, &c." See the Proclamation in Compl. Hist. Vol. III. p. 241. By the words Imperial Crown, used here and in Acts of Parliaments, is meant an independent Crown not held of any other, as the Princes of Germany are said to hold of the Empire.

(2) The words of the Act are as follows: "Be it hereby declared, that by the undoubted and fundamental laws of this Kingdom, neither the Peers, nor the Commons, nor both together, in Parliament or out of Parliament, nor the people collectively or representatively, nor any other persons whatsoever, ever had, hath, or ought to have any coercive power over the persons of the Kings of this Realm." The Parliaments that deposed Edward II. and Richard II. seem to have been of a contrary opinion.

(3) The oath is thus worded: "I A. B. do declare and believe, that it is not lawful, upon any pretence whatsoever, to take up arms against the King. And I do abhor that traitorous position of taking arms by his authority against his person, or against those who are commissioned by him." This oath was imposed; first, on all officers in Corporations, by the Act called the Corporation Act, the intent of which was declared to be, "That the succession in Corporation may be most probably perpetuated in the hands of persons well-affecting to his Majesty and the established Government, &c." The same oath was, in the next place, imposed on Lord-Lieutenants, Deputy-Lieutenants, Officers and Soldiers, by the Militia Act, which begins with asserting, "that the sole and supreme power, government, command, and disposition of the Militia, and of all forces by sea and land, &c. is, and by the laws of England ever was, the undoubted right of his Majesty and his predecessors, and that the Parliament cannot pretend to the same, nor can lawfully raise or levy war, offensive or defensive, against his Majesty, his heirs, or lawful successors, &c." Lastly, the whole body of the Clergy enjoying any benefice or salary, were enjoined to take the same oath by the Uniformity-Act, chiefly levelled against the Presbyterian Clergy, two thousand of whom were ejected out of their livings, for refusing to declare their assent to every thing contained in the book of Common Prayer. The author of the Detestation of the Court and State of England, observes, This is one of the first laws that ever was made to swear to opinions and belief, and seems to doubt whether there can be any such thing as a negative assertory oath as this is. However that be, such an oath, says he, can never extend farther than to him who swears he does not know what he is required to swear: but he can never swear that another does not know it. This sort of swearing destroys the religion and end of an assertory oath, which is only to what a man knows certainly to be true, but no man knows that an opinion or belief is certainly true.—In justice therefore an assertory oath, that I believe or am of opinion, is not admitted, unless the testifier swears the ground or cause of his belief to be true of his own knowledge. Now what were the grounds fully might be added to Commissioned; the oath was enacted without any limitation and left in general terms, though the word Lawfully was owned to be implied (1). The command and disposition of the Militia, one of the immediate causes of the civil wars, was also declared to be solely in the King, and his undoubted Prerogative. In fine, to remove all restraints upon the Crown, the Act for Triennial Parliaments, which had been deemed the nation's security, was repealed, and another of much less force substituted in its room (2).

Thus the King, according to the tenor of these Acts, was invested with absolute power, accountable to none but God alone, and exalted above all resistance. These proceedings so destructive of the public liberties, so repugnant to the old English Constitution, flowed chiefly from the present temper of the Royal Party, of which the Parliament mostly consisted, and which now prevailed in the nation. The remembrance of their late misfortunes, and the dread of falling again into the like situation, so fully possessed them, that they wholly imputed the civil wars to the principles on which King Charles I. had been opposed, and zealously espoused the contrary maxims, without perceiving the impossibility of reducing them to practice, and without imagining they should themselves, in a few years, be forced to retract them (3). For

The King, with his brother the Duke of York, encouraged by the establishment of the Monarchy, on principles so subversive of liberty, form the project of introducing arbitrary power, and by that means the popish religion. To this end, the administration of affairs is lodged in the hands of a Cabal of five persons, who were thought fit instruments for such purposes (4). A private treaty is made with France for the destruction of the Dutch, in order to pave the way for the extirpation of the Protestant Religion, and the ruin of the English privileges (5). Pursuant to this secret agreement, the Triple Alliance is dissolved (6), war proclaimed against Holland in conjunction

"grounds or reason of the Corporation-Oath, which every one ought to swear to be true of his own certain knowledge, before he believe it not to be lawful, on any pretence, to take up arms against the King? Or, admit there might be reason for this belief, yet if the causes of this belief were not known to the taker of this oath, so as he knows them to be true of his certain knowledge, this oath, if any, is perjury." See Coke's Detection, Vol. II. p. 116.

(1) Sir John Vaughan, in the debate on the words commissioned by him, produced many instances to show, "That the people of England not only might, but in some cases were bound to take arms against persons commissioned by the King; and that the Sheriffs were bound, if it could be no otherwise done, to raise the Posse Comitatus, to oppose and suppress all such as should put any such illegal Commissions in execution." He therefore pressed that the word lawfully might be added. But Attorney-General Finch, a promoter of the bill, replied, "That it was not necessary, since the very word Commission did import it: for if it was not lawfully issued out to lawful persons, and for lawful reasons, it was no Commission." And to this interpretation the whole House assented. The Earl of Southampton moved also, in the House of Peers, for the addition of the same word, but was answered in the like manner by the Earl of Anglesey. Upon Southampton's urging it farther, "Because it would clear all difficulties with many, who not having heard the particular sense of both Houses, might imagine, that if any sort of Commission was granted, it would be unlawful to resist it." As a satisfactory answer it was alledged, "That this explanation being the very sense of both Houses, it would soon spread and be known, so as to become the sense of the nation." But unfortunately this was not the case, for the doctrine of absolute non-resistance was every where inculcated by the Clergy and others, without the least intimation of the sense of both Houses. By which means, many persons were induced to believe, that they were bound to an unlimited obedience, and that it was unlawful to relieve themselves in the most threatening danger. Whereas if Lawfully had been inserted in the Act, no man could have been misled, and the proposition would have been strictly true, namely, that the King's legal Commissions are no more to be resisted than the King himself, in the due execution of the laws. But by the omission of the word Lawfully, the Act literally ascribed greater power to the King than ever was, or ever can be exercised by the most absolute tyrant. Well therefore might Mr. Locke say, that the Corporations were made to swear to a declaration and belief of such propositions as the Parliament themselves afterwards, upon debate, were forced to alter, and could not justify. (5) The account of this private treaty was published in Italian at Paris in 1682, by Abbot Primi, who was employed by Colbert de Croissy the French Ambassador in England, but soon after suppressed, and almost all the copies seized and destroyed, at the instance of the Lord Protestant the English Ambassador. It was published under the name of Count Maiale, with the royal privilege. In this treatise are the following passages: "These things engaged the King of England to sign a secret treaty with France; and to make it more firm, Henrietta Dutches of Orleans, sister to the King of England, went over into England in 1670, and proposed a treaty to her brother in the name of the most Christian King, wherein she offered to secure to him an absolute authority over his Parliament, and the re-establishment of the Roman Catholic Religion in his three Kingdoms of England, Scotland, and Ireland. But she said, that before this could be effected, there was an absolute necessity of abating the haughtiness and power of the Hollanders, who only studied to foment divisions amongst their neighbours; and to reduce them to the single Province of Holland, of which the Prince of Orange should be Sovereign, or at least perpetual Governor, which would not be difficult for these two mighty Kings, when once well united, to accomplish: so that by this means the King of England might have Zealand to retire to, if there should be occasion; and that the rest of the Low Countries should remain to the King of France, whenever he shall be able to conquer them." State-Tracts, Vol. I. p. 34.

(6) The triple alliance was made in 1668, between the Kings of England, and Sweden, and the Dutch, to prevent the progress of the French King's arms: so was entirely destroyed by the private treaty with France. Moreover Coventry was sent to the Court of Sweden to dissolve it, which was so effectually done, that the King of Sweden first stood neuter, and afterwards joined with the French. For this, which put all Christendom in a flame, conjunction with France; and as this was done during a long recess of the Parliament, money is raised by shutting up the Exchequer and by a supply from France (1). At the same time the penal laws against Dissenters are suspended, and a Toleration published by the King, with the sole view of including the Papists (2).

Hitherto, it may be said, there had been but one party in the Parliament; the majority of both Houses, full of zeal for the prerogative, and of repentment against the maxims, which, in their opinion, had caused the late civil wars, seemed to have made it their whole care to exalt the Crown above any future attempts, by fencing it with unlimited obedience, and by excluding from offices of trust, all persons of contrary principles, by subscriptions and oaths. No other party dared to appear in the nation, and all opposition to the Court vanished. But when the King's designs began to be suspected, when the Constitution was thought to be in danger, the scene was immediately changed, and the old English spirit of liberty roused itself. The very Parliament by which the doctrine of Non-resistance had been in appearance so firmly established, resisted to the utmost in a Parliamentary way, and, very probably, would have proceeded to a resistance of another kind, had not the King given up his Ministers, departed from his claims, and in great measure complied with their demands. At their meeting, Feb. 4. after a long interval, they resolve, in the first place, to crush the design for Popery. They begin with the King's declaration for liberty of conscience, as knowing it was intended in favour of the Catholics, and after some struggles oblige the King to recal it, as illegal, though he told them in his speech, he had resolved to stick to it. Then, as an effectual means to remove all Papists from places and posts, the Test-Act is passed, in consequence of which the Duke of Tork himself, High-Admiral of England, with the Lord-Treasurer Clifford, resign their Commissions (3). Whereupon the Cabal is broke, and three of the members called to account (4). Moreover, the Parliament force the King, notwithstanding his reluctance and private engagements with France, to put an end to the Dutch war, and conclude a league with the States. The zeal against Popery is inflamed, as well in the Nation as the Parliament, upon the discovery of the Papish Plot. A Bill is immediately passed for disabling Papists to sit in Parliament, or come near the King, with an exception, however, for the Duke of Tork. Another Bill is prepared for raising part of the Militia for a time, to which indeed the King denied his assent. It was also voted, that no more money should be granted, till satisfaction was given in matters of religion. Not satisfied with same, Coventry was made (says Coke) Secretary of State, and it may be, presented with the Ranger's place of Enfield-Chase; whereas Sir William Temple, principal instrument in the peace of Nimwegen, lost 2200 l. by it; and his only recompence was to be Secretary of State in Coventry's place, if Sir William would give him 10,000 l. for it. Dietl. Vol. II. p. 167.

(1) In Abbot Primi's account of the secret treaty, it is said: "As for the King of England he was exceedingly perplexed, there was need of money to carry on the design, and that secretly too: He could raise none at home without assembling his Parliament, and that could not be done without acquainting all Europe with his designs: there was also great fear of opposition, both from the misunderstandings which in that tumultuous assembly do for the most part arise between the two Houses; and from the intrigues of the Hollanders. For which reasons the King of France furnished him with such sums of money as were sufficient to send out a considerable fleet; and he advised the King of England (the better to conceal their agreements) to keep a fair correspondence outwardly with the Dutch; to appear firm to the Triple League; and to declare that he set out a fleet for no other reasons, but because his neighbours, and especially the French, who made great preparations in all their ports upon the ocean, strengthened themselves so very considerably by sea." State-Treaties, Vol. I. p. 35. Accordingly King Charles received between six and seven hundred thousand pounds, which, for fear of suspicion, were not returned into the Exchequer, but into the hands of Mr. Chaffinich, (Page of the back-stairs) who, for his pains, was to have two-pence in the pound. Coke's Delect. Vol. II. p. 166.

(2) It must be observed, that the opportunity at the Restoration, of closing the division in the Church, was lost, and instead of a comprehension, the terms of Communion were made harder, and severe laws against all Non-conformists were enacted, which will be remembered hereafter in the account of our religious differences. The Court's design in thus widening the breach, and excluding great numbers from the Communion of the Church, was, to have room for granting a liberty of conscience in matters of religion, in order to procure some indulgence for the Catholics. Accordingly the King, in defiance of several Acts of Parliament, published a Declaration for Toleration, in which the Papists were so far included, as to be exempted from the penal laws, and permitted the exercise of their religion in their houses. See the Declaration, Rapin, Vol. II. p. 66.

(3) The Test-Act runs: "For preventing dangers which may happen from Papish Recusants, and quieting the minds of his Majesty's good subjects, all and every person or persons, that shall bear office civil or military, or shall receive any pay, salary, fee or wages, by reason of any patent or grant from his Majesty, or shall have command, or place of trust under his Majesty, or by authority derived from him, shall receive the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper, according to the usage of the Church of England, within three months after his or their admittance in or receiving their said authority or employment; and every of the said persons, in the respective Court where he takes the oaths, shall deliver a certificate of such his receiving the said Sacrament, under the hands of the respective Minister and Church-Warden, and shall make proof of the truth thereof, by two credible witnesses upon oath: all which shall be required of, and put upon record in the respective Courts." With the oaths of Allegiance and Supremacy, the following declaration was also enjoined: "I, A. B. do declare, that I do believe, that there is not any Transubstantiation in the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper, or in the Elements of the Bread and Wine, at or after the consecration thereof by any person whatsoever." This Test, though designed against the Papists, as appears from the tenor of it, and the disposition of the Parliament at the time of enacting, affected the Protestant Dissenters, and therefore a vote passed to bring in a bill in their favour, which was prevented from being finished by a prorogation. By which it was evident, the King in his declaration for liberty of conscience, did not intend the ease of the Protestant Non-Conformists. Of this the Dissenters were so well satisfied, that Levee, a City-Member, and a Dissenter, spoke against the King's declaration. See Rapin, Vol. II. p. 66. It is farther observable, that notwithstanding the severe laws against the Dissenters, they remained unmolested, during the continuance of this and the three following Parliaments. The reason was, because the designs of the Court were now fully discovered.

with all this, the Commons, after having endeavoured, but in vain, to prevent the Duke of York's marriage with a Papist, project his exclusion from the Crown, in defiance of the doctrine of the divine right of lineal Succession. In a word, their resistance reaches even the King himself, in the impeachment of the Earl of Danby. Neither his Majesty's declaration that the Earl had done nothing but by his order, nor a pardon under the Great-Seal could screen him from their prosecution (1). To put a stop to these proceedings, the Parliament, after a continuance of above seventeen years, is at last dissolved.

Beginning of the Whig and Tory Parties.

From the latter years of this Parliament may be dated the beginnings of the Tory and Whig parties, though they were not yet distinguished by these names. That party which in the Parliament and Nation had appeared on the side of the Court, acquired the appellation of Tories, and was formed upon principles grounded on a literal interpretation of the Acts established soon after the Restoration, in favour of the Crown. They professed to believe all resistance unlawful, and lineal Succession unalterable; and therefore considered those who differed from them in these points, as enemies of the Monarchy and Church. The other party which had opposed the designs of the Court, received the name of Whigs, and was formed upon a limited interpretation of the non-resistance Acts, which they understood with such restrictions, as rendered them, in their opinion, consistent with the ancient Constitution (2). These parties were now chiefly distinguished by their adherence or opposition to the exclusion of a Papish Successor. The Tories, pursuant to their notion of Hereditary Right, espoused the Duke of York's cause; whilst the Whigs, in consequence of their principles, were for altering the Succession. The Tories, in this respect, were the majority in the House of Peers, and the Whigs, in the House of Commons.

The nation having been alarmed with apprehensions of Popery, the elections for a new Parliament ran in favour of the Country-party or Whigs. Accordingly the impeachment of the Lord Danby is immediately resumed, and a bill for the exclusion of the Duke of York brought in by the Commons. In vain did the King offer limitations on a Papish Successor, they were not received, and therefore this Parliament was also dissolved.

But such was the temper of the people in the present state of jealousies and fears, that the next Parliament was not more favourable to the Court. The King, in a dread of their treading in the steps of the former Parliament, deferred their first Session above a year after their summons. In this interval petitions were presented to him for the sitting of the new Parliament, the promoters of which were termed Petitioners. These were followed by counter-petitions, wherein the Subscribers, expressed an abhorrence of dictating to the King the time of a Parliament's meeting, and from thence were called Abhorers. But these party-names were soon lost, in the more general distinctions of Tory and Whig (3).

The Parliament was no sooner assembled, but the Commons warmly resumed the affair of Exclusion, and a bill to disabie the Duke of York to inherit the crown passed by a great majority, though, during the debate, the King sent and offered them any other security. Upon the bill's being thrown out by the Peers, the Commons voted all other means not only insufficient but dangerous. As nothing less than a total exclusion would satisfy the Commons, and as the King was determined not to consent to it, this Parliament was likewise dissolved.

(1) Though it appeared to the Commons, by the letters produced by Montague, that in the private negotiations with France, particularly concerning the pension of six millions of livres for three years to the King, the Earl of Danby had acted entirely by his Majesty's direction, they would not desist, but were resolved to lay open, if possible, the whole proceedings, and therefore may be said to attack the King himself, tho' indirectly, in their impeachment of the Earl. So far did even this Prerogative-Parliament carry their resistance, when they thought their liberties in danger.

(2) Though this long Parliament seemed at first to be entirely Tory, and to be wholly engrossed with the thoughts of guarding the Crown and the Church with Non-resistance Acts and penal Laws, yet a Whig or Country Party may be traced from the moment the ill effects of these things began to be perceived. Hence the Commons, upon any remarkable occasion, took care to explain their own Acts, by asserting, "That they never designed to make any real alteration in the English Constitution, or any direct incroachment upon the ancient liberties of the people, secured to them by Magna Charta, and many subsequent Acts." But the first noted instance of the Whig or Country Party in the House of Peers, was in the seventeen days debate in the year 1675, when the Oath and Declaration of Non-resistance on any pretence was attempted to be imposed on Privy-Counsellors and members of Parliament. In the debate on the words, against those commissioned by him, it was said, "That such words, without distinctions and limitations, would effectually change a civil and regulated Government into one military and arbitrary, so that there could be no difference between the English and the Turkish government." Echard's Review, p. 19. To the former oath it was now added: "And I swear that I will not at any time endeavour the alteration of the Government in Church or State." See Rapin, Vol. II. p. 677. The Court Lords, (says Coke) with all the Bishops to a man, were for it: yet (continues he) the Country Lords, when they debated it in paragraphs, made it inconsistent with the present constitution of the nation. Detest. p. 194.

(3) Burnet observes, there were not such numbers that joined in the petitions for the Parliament as had been expected: So this showed rather the weakness than the strength of the party: and many well-meaning men began to dislike those practices, and to apprehend that a change of government was designed, p. 487. As this, very probably, with the Factions which now arose in the Council and Parliament, concerning the manner of the Exclusion, confirmed the King in his resolution to adhere to his brother and lineal Succession, in the prospect of dividing the nation: so it should have warned the Country Party or Whigs of the danger of pushing things too far, and induced them, when they saw the King utterly averse to the Exclusion, to content themselves with the most proper Expedients. And doubtless they would have taken this method, had not faction and private views mixed with the national interests. That this was the case, too plainly appears from the history of those times. Hence an eminent person of the Country Party (who lost his life afterwards for the cause) says, in a letter still extant: "I must confess, I do not know three men of a mind, and that a spirit of giddiness reigns among us, far beyond any I have ever observed in my life. Some look who is fittest to succeed—They are for the most part divided between Government, in case of a Papish Successor, should be lodged in Protestant hands. Accordingly it was proposed to the Commons, that the Duke of York should be banished during life, five hundred miles from England, Scotland, and Ireland, and the whole Government, ecclesiastical and civil, vested, upon the King's death, in the Princess of Orange as Regent. But so averse were the Commons to all Expedients, that these proposals were rejected, and the Exclusion pursued with as much warmth as ever. For which reason the King, after a seven days session, suddenly dissolved this his last Parliament, to the great joy of the Duke of York, who dreaded limitations even more than a total exclusion (1).

Thus by the King's resolution to maintain Hereditary Right, and by the Commons' adherence to an absolute Exclusion, in a confidence of the King's yielding at last, the design not only proved abortive, but occasioned such a change in affairs, as brought both religion and liberty to the brink of destruction (2). The proceedings of the three last Parliaments gave the Court an opportunity to revive the fears and resentments which had prevailed just after the Restoration, and by that means to divide the nation into Tory and Whig, which were now become the general names of distinction. As by the indulgence shewn to Protestant Dissenters by the late Parliament, and their consequent behaviour, the Court artfully rouzed the jealousy of the Church and alarmed the Clergy (3); so by the indifereet zeal of others, a suspicion was infused of a design to alter the Government, and matter furnished for the Protestant Plot, by which some of the best blood in the nation was spilt.

The King, upon the abrupt dissolution of the last Parliament, published a declaration by way of apology, which being read in all the Churches of England, produced, by the management of the Court, addresses of thanks to the King, with assurances of adhering to the unalterable right of lineal succession. The Clergy were extremely zealous on this occasion. Divine hereditary Right, Passive obedience and Non-resistance, were every where preached in the highest terms, and without any restrictions. The two Universities, the Judges, with many professors of the law, promoted the same doctrines in the strictest sense, and gave the Crown an unlimited power (4). The King, however, in the midst of his triumphs, did not yet think himself entirely secure. Notwithstanding the flattering addresses from all parts, he was still afraid of a Parliament, and durst not venture to meet the Representative of the Nation, before he was absolute master of the Elections. Effectual methods were taken to that end. Not only such Sheriffs, Justices of the Peace, Officers of the Militia, were appointed as favoured the Court, but the King resolves to new model the Corpo-

"between the Prince of Orange and the Duke of Monmouth—Others are only upon negatives, &c."

(1) The Duke of York (says Burnet) declared openly against the limitations. He was very sensible the limitations would be almost universally agreed to, but knew that many in the nation thought the Exclusion unlawful. By whose means he might possibly recover the throne, but to break through the limitations he was afraid would not be so practicable. Hence it was, that the next day after the Lord Finch had proposed the limitations to the Parliament, the Dutchess of York said in a letter, "That as for all the High Things which were said by their enemies they looked for them; but the speech of the Lord Chancellor was a surprise and a great mortification to them." Burnet, Vol. I.

(2) The author of the Dissertations on Parties observes: Men were made to believe that the King, who had yielded on so many other occasions, would yield on this; that he, who had given up so many Ministers, would give up his brother at last; and that if the Parliament would accept nothing less than the Exclusion, in their own way, it would be extorted from him. Now in this they were fatally deceived.—The King, who had not used to show firmness, on other occasions, was firm on this; and the consequence of pushing the Exclusion, in this manner, was giving him an opportunity of breaking the Country Party; of dividing the nation into Whig and Tory; of governing without Parliaments; and of leaving the throne open to his brother, not only without limitations or conditions, but with a more absolute power established, than any Prince of his family had enjoyed, p. 42.

(3) The Country or Whig Party no sooner prevailed in the House of Commons, but they espoused the cause of the Protestant Dissenters so far, as to endeavour to free them from the penal laws, particularly such as were primarily intended against the Papists. Hence it is that they had been unmolested, from the time that the design for Papery had begun to be discovered. In the fourth Parliament a bill passed both Houses to repeal the severe Act made in the 35th year of Queen Elizabeth, by which those who did not conform to the Church were required to abjure the Kingdom on pain of death; and for some degrees of Non-conformity, they were adjudged to die without the favour of banishment. Bur- net observes, this bill went heavily in the House of Lords; for many of the Bishops, though they were not for putting it in execution, thought the terror of it of some use. But this bill, on the day of prorogation, when it should have been offered to the King, was, by his Majesty's particular order, withdrawn by the Clerk of the Crown. The House of Commons of the same Parliament, the last day of their sitting, voted, "That the Acts of Parliament made in the reign of Queen Elizabeth and King James, against Papish Recusants, ought not to be extended against Protestant Dissenters." And, "That the prosecution of Protestant Dissenters upon the penal laws, is at this time grievous to the subject, a weakening the Protestant interest, an incouragement to Papery, and dangerous to the state of the Kingdom." It was also given to the members of the last Parliament of this reign, as an instruction from their electors, to repeal the 35th of Elizabeth and the Corporation Act. By the favour thus shewn them, the Non-conformists (says Burnet) behaved themselves very indecently, and fell very severely upon the body of the Clergy, which made the Bishops and Clergy apprehend, that a rebellion, and with it the pulling the Church to pieces, was designed. It was easy therefore for the Court to inflame the Clergy, and cause them to turn their apprehensions of Papery into a dread of falling again under a Presbyterian Government.

(4) Dr. Gower, Vice-Chancellor of Cambridge, told the King in the name of the University, "We will still believe and maintain, that our Kings derive not their titles from the people but from God; that to him only they are accountable; that it belongs not to subjects either to create or censure, but to honour and obey their sovereign, who comes to be so by a fundamental Hereditary Right of Succession, which no religion, no law, no fault or forfeiture can alter or diminish."—The University of Oxford passed a decree, wherein regal Power, hereditary Right, passive Obedience and Non-resistance, are carried to the utmost height, and a copy of the decree was ordered to be hung up in every college. Little did the University think that within five years they should conform their practice to Propositions, which they now declared, false, seditious, and impious!

Corporations by annulling their Charters, and granting others under such limitations and conditions, as he should think fit. Almost five parts in six of the House of Commons would by that means be in his disposal. He begins with the City of London, and pursuant to a sentence in the King's Bench, seizes the liberties of the Metropolis into his hands. Upon this, many Corporations unable to contend with the Crown, are prevailed with to surrender their Charters. The Court was vigorously pursuing this project when the King was suddenly and unexpectedly snatched out of the world.

State of - Partisun-der James
II.

At the accession of King James II. to the Throne, the Tories and Whigs were the principal Parties in the nation, and at open defiance with one another. Among the Tories were all the High-church Men, and the Clergy, by whom the divine Right of Kings, unalterableness of lineal Succession, Passive Obedience and Non-resistance had been zealously preached above twenty years to the people. It is no wonder therefore, these doctrines had spread themselves in the Kingdom and been embraced by many very learned Professors of the Law, and Members of the Universities, especially as they seemed to be a part of the legal establishment. As the Tories by their principles thought themselves bound to adhere to a Popish successor, and happened to be under the influence of Popish Counsels, they were reproached by their adversaries as favourers of Papery as well as arbitrary Power. But this imputation appeared afterwards entirely groundless. The Whigs, chiefly consisting of moderate Churchmen with some few of the Clergy, avow'd the Principles of resistance in some cases, and asserted the power of the Parliament to limit the Succession to the Crown. As the Whigs were declared enemies to every degree of persecution, and consequently promoters of toleration in matters of religion, they were supported by the Protestant Dissenters of all denominations. Hence they were represented as Presbyterians, enemies of the Church, men of Anti-monarchical principles. But this was with as little reason as the Tories were charged with a Popish inclination. The Whigs as to religion, were no more Presbyterians than the Tories were Popists; and though the small remains of the Republicans took shelter in their party, the Whigs were far from being Anti-monarchical, as their conduct afterwards fully demonstrated.

King James begins his reign with a strong declaration in council, that as he would never depart from his prerogative, so he would preserve the establishment in Church and State, and maintain the Rights of the people without invading any man's property. The Tories who were now predominant in the Nation, whilst the Whigs with their adherents were oppressed, too readily believed the King's promises. The Clergy every where extolled the royal word, and it was magnified as a security beyond any law (1). Addresses were presented from all parts full of the highest expressions of fidelity, trust and obedience (2). Though the King in a few days after his declaration in council, ordered the Customs to be levied contrary to law, so far were the prevailing Party from being alarmed, that he was publicly thank'd by a learned Society, for this first violation of his word (3).

The Corporations for the most part being modelled according to the project begun in the late reign, a Parliament was called, and the Elections by that and other irregular methods, were almost universally carried in favour of the Tories (4). The King opens the first Session with repeating his former declaration of supporting the Church of England, preserving the established Government, and never departing from his just prerogatives, assuring them, they might firmly rely upon a promise so solemnly made. Accordingly the Commons, so great is their confidence in the King, grant him for life an annual revenue of two millions and a half, without any conditions or appropriations; voting withal that they entirely rely and

(1) The pulpits (says Burnet) were full of it, and of thanksgivings for it. — The common phrase was, we have now the word of a King, and a word never yet broken. p. 620.

(2) The University of Oxford in their address promised to obey the King without limitations or restrictions. The King's promise passed for a thing so sacred, that they were looked upon as ill bred that put in their address, our religion established by law, which looked like a tie on the King to maintain it: whereas the title of the more courtly was to put all our security upon the King's promise. The Clergy of London added a word to this in their address, our religion established by law, dearer to us than our lives. This had such an insinuation in it, as made it very unacceptable. Some followed that pattern. But this was marked to be remembered against those that used so menacing a form. Burnet, p. 620.

(3) The society of the Middle-Temple in their address said, "That with the deepest sense of gratitude they acknowledged his Majesty's great goodness, in extending his royal care of the government, to the preservation of the customs which had been continually received in his royal predecessors for some hundreds of years, and never questioned by any Parliament, unless in that wherein were sown the seeds of rebellion against the King his father. — May there never want millions as loyal as we are, to sacrifice their lives and fortunes in defense of your sacred person and prerogative in its full extent." Thus a manifest breach of the law was vindicated and applauded by a body of Lawyers themselves. The legal method (says Burnet, p. 622.) was to have made entries, and to have taken bonds for those duties to be paid, when the Parliament should meet and renew the grant which expired with the late King. As this seizing of the customs (says Wetwood, p. 138.) was contrary to law, so was it altogether needless at that time, since a Parliament was to meet within a few days, which nobody doubted would in a Parliamentary way continue them for life. So that he openly violated the Constitution, to obtain what he was certain would be granted him in a legal manner, and with the goodwill of his people.

(4) The methods for securing the elections were so successful, that the King said, there were not above forty members but such as he himself wished for. They were neither men of parts nor estates, so there was no hope left, either of working on their understandings, or of making them see their interest in not giving the King all at once. Most of them were furious and violent, and seemed resolved to recommend themselves to the King, by putting every thing in his power, and by ruining all those who had been for the exclusion. Some few had designed to give the King the revenue only from three years to three years. But there was no prospect of any strength in opposing any thing that the King should ask of them. This gave all thinking men a melancholy prospect. Burnet, p. 626.

and rest satisfied on his Majesty's word to support the Religion of the Church of England, dearer to them than their lives (1).

June 11. In this disposition was the Parliament when the Duke of Monmouth's invasion put an end to the first Session, after an Act of Attainder against the Duke, and a farther grant of four hundred thousand pounds to the King on this extraordinary occasion.

July 2. The ill-concerted expeditions of Argyle into Scotland, and of Monmouth in England, being defeated and the leaders put to death, the King thought himself so firmly established in his throne, that he was easily induced to pull off the mask and more openly avow his designs (2). These invasions furnished him with the pretence of raising and keeping up an army which he took care to fill with Popish officers though unqualified by law. Supported thus by a strong force and a large revenue, he resolves to hasten the introduction of Popery and arbitrary Power. He begins with plainly telling the Parliament at the opening of the second Session, "that a standing army was necessary, and therefore he had increased the number of forces, and demanded a supply for their maintenance. He owned some Officers had not taken the Tests, and declared he would not dismiss them (3)."

Vol. II. P. 752. The Parliament, and more especially the Commons, though chiefly consisting of men who professed to believe the doctrines of Passive Obedience and Non-Resistance, were alarmed at this speech, as manifestly intimating a power in the King to dispense with the laws. However to act as consistently with their principles as possible, they offered not only to pass a bill for indemnifying the Popish officers from the penalties they had incurred, but also to capacitate such others as should be named by the King, and which voted a supply of seven hundred thousand pounds, though they would not expressly declare that it was for the support of the additional forces. Notwithstanding these complaisant offers, as they insisted on the King's removal of all jealousies from his people by maintaining the laws, and especially the Tests, he chose rather to lose the seven hundred thousand pounds, than suffer them to sit any longer, and accordingly put an end to the Session by a sudden prorogation, Nov. 20. which after many but fruitless attempts to gain the majority, was at last followed by a dissolution.

From this time may be dated the first deviation from the principles which had for many years been professed by the Prerogative-Party. The King had been often declared to be above law, accountable only to God, and his commands to be received with an active or passive obedience. And yet the King's first attempt to dispense with the Laws is strenuously opposed by the very men who had espoused the highest notions of Regal Power and been elected as it were with the King's approbation. This naturally should have deterred him from pursuing (at least so openly) his designs, and taught him how little he could rely on the professors of Passive Obedience, who, as it plainly appeared, when their Religion and liberty were in danger, would interpret the doctrine of Non-resistance in a limited sense. But,

Instead of being discouraged, the King since he could not prevail with the Parliament to come into his measures, resolves to fill Westminster-Hall with Judges that should answer his purposes. Accordingly at a sham trial, the new Judges declare it to be, "an inseparable prerogative of the Crown to dispense with all penal laws (4)." P. 754.

This important point being gained, the King contrary

(1) This reliance on a Popish King for the support of a Protestant Church, appears so extravagant to the author of the Dissertations on Parties, that he says "It is impossible to believe that their confidence in the King's word was such as they affected. But like drowning men who saw nothing else to catch at, they caught at a straw." p. 76. And indeed the conclusion of this complaisant vote, viz. dearer to us than our lives, seems to intimate to the King the danger of breaking his word, and is also an evidence that the Tories even when most triumphant were far from being Popishly inclined.

(2) It is observable, that these invasions were so far from affording the Nation any opportunity of mending their condition, that Monmouth's declaration might draw some of the Dissenters to his standard, as it did; but was calculated to drive the Tory-Party, most of the Whigs, and in short the bulk of the people from him. Argyle's Declaration was founded in the Jehem League and Covenant, and gave so much reason to apprehend that a revival of the same principles, and a renewal of the same tyranny was intended, that we cannot wonder it had no better effect, though we lament the fate of a worthy and gallant man, whose crime was refusing a Test, that should never have been imposed on Protestants and Freemen, and who had been driven into these extreme resolutions by a series of unjust and tyrannical usage. Thus were these invasions, favourable in some respects to the designs of King James.—But, in the event, they forwarded our deliverance from all the dangers to which we were exposed, under his government, by precipitating his attempts against our religion and liberty. Dissert. on Parties, p. 77.

(3) Welwood remarks, that as King James's former speeches to his Council and Parliament had put the French Court to a stand what to think of him, this last speech put them out of pain, and convinced them he was entirely theirs.—Accordingly the revocation of the Edict of Nantes, which probably had been some time under consideration before, was now put in execution, to the astonishment of all Europe. Wel. Mem. p. 156. Burnet makes the same observation. As far as I could judge, (says he) the affairs of England gave the last stroke to the recalling the edict of Nantes, and then adds, this year (1685) must ever be remembered, as the most fatal to the Protestant Religion. In February, a King of England declared himself a Popist. In June, Charles, the Elector Palatine, dying without issue, the electoral dignity went to the house of Newburgh, a most bigotted popish family. In October, the King of France recalled the edict of Nantes. And in December, the Duke of Savoy, by the persuasions and even threatnings of the Court of France, recalled the edict that his father had granted to the Vaudais. So it must be confessed, that this was a very critical year. p. 656.

(4) A sham information was brought against Sir Edward Hales, a Popist, for acting in a military office without qualifying himself according to laws, which produced the declared opinion of the new Judges in favour of the dispensing power. Edward's Review, p. 71. When King James (says Welwood) came to assume to himself this power, as his prerogative and right, he unbind'd the Constitution all at once; for to dispense with laws already made, is as much a part of the Legislature, as the making of new ones. And therefore in arrogating to himself such a dispensing power, he invaded the very essence of the English Constitution, by which "the Legislature is lodged in King, Lords, and Commons, and every one of them has a negative upon the other two." Welwood's Memoirs, p. 169. It was not enough (continues the same author) for King James to assume a dispensing power and to act by it, but such was the misery and hard fate of England, that the party about the King would have had us believe, that a power in the King to dispense

p. 755. contrary to an express act of Parliament erects a court of Inquisition under the name of a Commission for Ecclesiastical Causes. The Clergy are forbid to preach on controverted points, that is, to defend their Religion against the open attacks of the Romish Priests; and the Bishop of London, for not obeying an illegal command of the King, is summoned before the new court and arbitrarily suspended from his office (1). Mean time a solemn Embassy is sent to Rome to reconcile the British dominions to the Holy See, whilst the Catholic Religion is publicly propagated in Jesuit schools and seminaries in London, and other considerable Towns, and such Ministers at Court as would not consent to the repeal of the Tests, are, notwithstanding past services, dismissed, and their Posts filled with others of greater compliance.

Apr. 4. Things being thus prepared, a proclamation for liberty of Conscience is published, the dispensing power is claimed, and all subjects allowed to hold places without the usual Oaths or Tests. The Dissenters dazzled with this indulgence, as freeing them from the oppressions they endured, present addresses of thanks, full of high strains of gratitude and loyalty, not considering that by approving an illegal toleration they became incouragers of the dispensing power assumed by the King (2).

As the Jesuits were very impatient to get footing in the Universities, in a belief it would greatly advance the propagation of their religion, the King's next step was to order, by a Royal Mandate, the Fellows of Magdalen College in Oxford, to elect a President contrary to their statutes and oaths. Upon their refusal, they are summoned before the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, deprived

During the contest with the College, all methods were practised to procure a new Parliament that should ratify the King's measures, repeal the Tests and give a Parliamentary sanction to his dispensing Power. To this end he took a progress into several counties, pursued the affair of new-modelling the Corporations, dismissed from posts and employments all such as showed the least dislike of his proceedings. With these, and many other artifices, the King could not however so far carry his point as to be sure of a Parliament to his mind; and therefore would not venture to call one, but chose rather to rely on his army, which he resolved to fill with Irish Papists. To convince the nation still more plainly of his designs, he not only made Father Petre, a Privy-Counsellor, but solemnly received a Nuncio from the Pope, who made his publick entry at Windsor (3).

In this situation were affairs in the beginning of the famous year 1688; the King invested by the Judges with the dispensing Power; the Privy-Council under the direction of a Jesuit; the Counties and Militia in the hands of Papists or other unqualified persons; an army of fifteen thousand men incamped ten miles from London; and to crown all, the King's proceedings approved by addresses not only from the Dissenters but from Corporations and other Societies (4), with promises of electing such members of Parliament as should confirm his measures. In these favourable circumstances, it is not strange the King should push his designs with openness and vigour. Accordingly after a proclamation of the Queen's Jan. 2; preg-dispense with laws, was law. To maintain this monstrous position, there were not only mercenary pens set a-work, but a set of Judges found out, that, to their eternal reproach, did all that was possible for them to compliment the King with the liberties of their country.—Thus were we fallen under the greatest misfortune that could possibly happen to a nation, to have our laws and constitutions trampled upon, under colour of law: And those very men, whose office it was to support them, became now the betrayers of them to the will of the Prince. Ibid. p. 171.

(1) The King sent an order to the Bishop of London to suspend Dr. Sharp (afterwards Archbishop of York) for a pretended contempt of the order against preaching on controverted points: and the Bishop refusing to execute it, as being illegal, was himself suspended by the new Court. Wetwood observes on this occasion, that notwithstanding the King's insinuating letter to the Clergy about preaching, they were not wanting in their duty; for to their immortal honour, they did more to vindicate the doctrine of their own Church, and expose the errors of the Church of Rome, both in their sermons and writings, than ever had been done either at home or abroad since the Reformation; and in such a stile, and with such inimitable force of reasoning, as will be a standard of writing to succeeding ages. Wet. Mem. p. 174. The chief of these writers were, Tillotson, Sharp, Patrick, Stillingfleet, Williams, Tennison, Sherlock, Clogget, Gee, Whitby, and Dr. Wake late Archbishop of Canterbury.

(2) The observations of the anonymous Author on Parties, concerning the proceedings of the Dissenters, seem but too justly grounded. The King's designs (says he) were openly avowed, and desperately pushed. The Church of England opposed them with the utmost vigour. The Dissenters were cajoled by the Court, and they, who had been ready to take arms against King Charles, because he was unwilling to exclude his Brother, and who had taken arms against this Prince, since he was on the throne, became abettors of his un-surpations. It were easy to prove this, even by Bishop Burnet's account, as much as that is softened; and if the excuses which have been made for their silence against Popery in this critical moment, or for their approving and encouraging the exercise of a dispensing power are to be received, one may undertake to excuse, on the same principles of reasoning, all those instances of misconduct in the Church-Party, which I have presumed to censure so freely. But the truth is, these excuses are frivolous. I could quote some, that are even burlesque. Let us reverence truth therefore, and condemn the Dissenters as frankly on this occasion, as we have condemned the members of the Church of England on others. Dissert. on Parties, p. 78.

(4) In the address from the Middle-Temple, it is said,— "As thanks (for the Toleration) ought to be paid your Majesty by all your subjects, so we especially, of the profession of the law, have most reason to be thankful for the honour you have done us, by asserting your own royal prerogatives, which is the very life of the law and our profession. Which prerogatives, as they were given by God himself, so we declare, That no power upon earth can diminish them, but they must always remain entire and inseparable to your royal person. Which prerogatives, as we have studied to know them, so we are resolved to defend them, by asserting with our lives that divine maxim, A Deo Rex, a Rege Lex, &c." Hist. of Addresses, p. 113.

pregnancy, and some fruitless attempts to persuade the Prince and Princess of Orange to approve the repeal of the penal Laws and Tests, comes forth (what quickly brought things to a crisis) a second declaration for Liberty of Conscience, more full and explicit in favour of the Catholics, which was soon followed with an order of Council to the Bishops, to cause the declaration to be read by the Clergy in all the Churches of their several Dioceses.

This order immediately produced a petition from the Archbishops of Canterbury and six other Bishops (1) against reading the declaration, as "being founded upon a dispensing power often declared illegal in Parliament." Whereupon they were all sent to the Tower, and not long after, brought to a trial for framing and publishing a seditious libel; for so was termed their petition, though delivered in the humblest and most private manner to the King alone. After a long trial, wherein the dispensing power was not only boldly argued against, but demonstrated to be a violation of the constitution, the Bishops were acquitted with loud acclamations, not only of the people, but even of the army itself, to the King's great mortification, who was then in the camp (2).

During the confinement of the Bishops it was that the Queen's delivery of a son was published, to the great joy of the Catholics, (who were now less anxious about the uncertainty of the King's life) but to the grief and astonishment of the confederate part of the nation, who had placed all their hopes on a Protestant Successor, which now seemed entirely defeated. Their comfort was the Queen's delivery by many circumstances was rendered suspicious, and the people in general inclined to believe it an imposture of the Papists to finish their ruin (3).

Notwithstanding the public rejoicings in the city, country and army, for the acquittal of the Bishops, which sufficiently discovered the general dislike of the King's measures, he resolved to pursue his designs. Two of the Judges were dismissed for not vindicating his pretended prerogative in the late trial, and the Ecclesiastical Commissioners were ordered to proceed against the Clergy for not reading the declaration. The inclinations of the land and sea forces were founded, and though several discouraging circumstances occurred, the King was not deterred from his purposes, nor would he be persuaded to use gentler methods, according to the advice of some of his friends, and particularly one of his ministers who had suddenly changed his religion. (4). It was thought that all opposition would vanish before the army, when strengthened with Irish supplies.

During the Transactions of the foregoing State alterations. The Tories and Churchmen who had that time so zealously espoused and asserted the doctrine of Non-resistance in all cases, whilst the King exerted his prerogative in their favour, and suffered them to trample upon their opposers the Whigs and Dissenters, when they discovered that this doctrine was going to be turned upon them, and made an instrument of destroying the established religion and introducing Popery and arbitrary power, their zeal began to abate, and neither pulpit nor press any longer so strenuously inculcated the doctrine of Passive Obedience. It was now generally thought that the King, as well as those commissioned by him, were not to be obeyed without limitation, and that their power was circumscribed by the law. In a word, the Tories were so far become Whigs that they believed when a Prince visibly endeavours the subversion of the religion and liberties, he may be lawfully restrained and kept within bounds. In this situation were the Tories, when the Whigs were suddenly deprived of a great support. The Dissenters, who had all along adhered to that party, fell for some time into a snare laid for them by the Court. Liberty of conscience, and exemption from penal laws, were so grateful, that overlooking the destructive and illegal means by which they were obtained, they exalted the prerogative in their addresses of thanks to as great a height as ever the Tories had done, and so became indirectly abettors of the dispensing power, which at once unhinged the Constitution. But quickly perceiving their error, they returned to their former friends, and joined with the Whigs in opposing arbitrary power. At length, the Tories being convinced that their religion and liberties were in manifest danger, and popery and slavery advancing with large steps, believed it time to provide for the safety of the Church and State (5). Thus persuaded, they also co-operate

(1) The six Bishops were St. Asaph, Ely, Bath and Wells, Peterborough, Chichester and Bristol, five of whom were afterwards Non-jurors.

(2) It was also observable upon their trial, that the tables were so far turned, that some that had largely contributed to the enslaving their country with false notions of law, were now of another opinion; while at the same time, others, that had stood up for the liberties of their country in two successive Parliaments, and had suffered upon that account, did now as much endeavour to stretch the prerogative beyond its just limits, as they had opposed it before. So hard it is (says Helwood, p. 186.) for mankind to be in all times, and upon all turns, constant to themselves. The proceedings against the Bishops were chiefly managed by Solicitor Williams, a zealous promoter of the Exclusion in the reign of King Charles, Speaker in his two last Parliaments, and a bold pleader in all causes against the crown. On the Bishops side appeared, amongst others, Finch and Sawyer, who had been, whilst in power, great sticklers for the prerogative.

(3) It must be owned, that in case the Queen was really delivered of a son, both she and the King acted as if it had not been so, and by their proceedings not only rendered it suspected, but put it out of the King's power to prove the birth in a satisfactory manner when he thought proper to endeavour it.

(4) This was the Lord Sunderland, who in several long audiences with the Queen, represented, "That since she had got a son, the state of her affairs was quite changed, and that there was no occasion for making such haste now the succession was sure. He told her, time would bring all about, if soft methods were used; and advised her to appear the author of gentle counsels, which by another administration might lay the flame so lately kindled, and gain the hearts of the nation both to herself and her son, so that the might be declared Regent if the King should die during the minority of the Prince." Echard's Review, 103. Burnet, Vol. I. 755. In order (says Burnet) to have the more credit in pressing these advices, he resolved to declare himself a Papist. Ibid. p. 756.

(5) Echard, in his Review, expresses this very fully. And now (says he) the breaches into the English constitution, which many were unwilling to see before, became apparent to almost all men's eyes. The King had plainly and openly assumed to himself a power to make laws rate with the Whigs, and by this means the whole nation, as to the point of resistance in so desperate a case, seemed to be all of one party.

Accordingly, soon after the Queen's delivery, the Prince of Orange was earnestly invited, as well by Tories as Whigs, to come and save the nation from falling into the most deplorable of states, popery and slavery. As the safety, not only of the United Provinces but of the Protestant Religion in general, depended on the fate of England, the invitation was gladly accepted by the Prince of Orange, and heartily espoused by the Dutch, who readily furnished an army and fleet.

Whilst the warlike preparations were with great secrecy carried on in Holland, King James had intimation from France of an expedition intended against England, with the offer of a French army to assist him. This offer, to the great surprise of the King of France, was rejected as unnecessary, though a private treaty was said to be then made between the two monarchs (1).

Sep. 23.

But at length receiving certain advice of the Prince of Orange's design, King James was extremely alarmed. He instantly saw the necessity of requiring the confidence of the Clergy, still vainly imagining they would practice that Passive Obedience they had so long and so strenuously asserted. But to his great mortification the Bishops, to whom he applied for the assistance of their counsels, plainly advised him in ten articles, "to redress all his illegal proceedings, and speedily call a FREE PARLIAMENT, in which the Church of England, a due liberty of conscience, and the properties of the subject might be secured."

Whilst the Bishops were preparing this address, the King publishes a Proclamation, intimating, "that no less than an absolute conquest of his kingdoms were proposed by this invasion; that, nevertheless, he declined all foreign aid, and wholly relied upon his own subjects." Concluding, "that though he intended to have met his Parliament the 17th of November, he found it necessary to recall the writs that had been issued for that purpose."

About the same time the King, as his fears increased, thought proper to redress some of the grievances complained of. He begins with taking off the Bishop of London's suspension, and publishing a general pardon of all criminals; a few only excepted. Soon after this, the commission for causes ecclesiastical was dissolved: the charter of London restored: the fellows of Magdalen College were ordered to be re-instituted: corporations were restored to their ancient charters: popish Lord-Lieutenants, Justices of the Peace, Mayors, and other magistrates were displaced, and Protestants put in their room. In a word, the whole popish fabric, the work of near four years, was in a few days almost entirely demolished. But with how little sincerity this was done, the King took care to show presently after.

Whilst these things were transacting in England, the Prince of Orange, to justify his undertaking, published a solemn declaration, that "the expedition was intended only for redress of the grievances, by a free and lawful Parliament, to which should be referred the inquiry into the birth of the pretended Prince of Wales, and of all things relating to the right of succession."

Upon news that the King, pursuant to the advice of the Bishops, had retracted some of his arbitrary proceedings, an addition was made to the declaration importing, "that these redresses were imperfect, and a plain confession of the violences complained of, that the root of oppression, the claim of a despotic power, was reserved entire, and consequently no remedy could be offered but in Parliament, by a declaration laws void and to qualify such for employments, who were so incapacitated by law, as to render all their actions void. All unqualified persons, Sheriffs, and even Judges, were now no legal Officers, inasmuch that the Government and the lawful Administration of it was quite broken and confounded. All this was brought about by the magic of dispensing power, which changed the whole frame of the Legislature, and reduced all laws to the pleasure of the crown. For by virtue of the same power, every disagreeable statute was made liable to be vacated, especially since no laws were fortified with stronger clauses to force their execution, than those which the late declaration had made useless. And when this was declared such a sacred point of Government, that a petition doubting of it and delivered in the most modest and private manner, was made a high crime, and inflexibly carried on against the most eminent of the Church. This convinced the most doubtful, that the breach into the constitution was general, destructive, and inconsistent with the nature of it. The matter was so open and avowed, and continued with such regular steps and repeated acts, that many of those that had taught the highest notions of Obedience, were sensible that there was such a total subversion, as might warrant the nation to guard its constitution, and to look out for its own preservation. Echard's Review, p. 104.

(1) All the Priests and Popish Lords were having the French forces; it was opposed by the Earl of Sunderland only, who said, that an army of forty thousand men might perhaps master England, but they would become the King's masters too, and render him only a Viceroy to the King of France. A less army would lose the King the affections of his people, and drive his own to desertion, if not to mutiny. The King did not think matters were yet so near a crisis; so he neither entertained the proposition, nor let it fall to the ground. There was a treaty on foot, and the King was to have a hundred transport-ships ready for such forces as he should desire. It is certain, the French Ambassador then at London did believe, that the King would have been able to have made a greater division of the nation, than it proved afterwards he was able to do, and that then the King would have been forced to have taken assistance from France on any terms, and so he encouraged the King of France to go on with his design, in the winter, and he believed he might come in good time, next year, to the King's assistance. This advice proved fatal to the King. The first discovery of the alliance with France was by a memorial given to the States by the French Ambassador, wherein he told them, that there was such a strict alliance between his master and the King of England, that he would look upon every thing done against England as an invasion of his crown. This put the King and his Ministers out of countenance, for they had positively denied there was any such thing. But the memorial was a full proof of it. Burnet, Vol. I. 767. Stelton, the King's Envoy at Paris, had the blame cast on him of putting it in the memorial, and when he came over was sent to the Tower on that account; but this show of a disgrace was but short, for he was soon after made Lieutenant of the Tower. The French Ambassador about this time showed Sir William Trumbull, Ambassador at Constantinople, a letter from M. de Cressy, importing, that an alliance was concluded between the two Kings. Ibid.

G

(1) The

"claration of the rights of the subject which had been invaded, and therefore all should be referred to "a free assembly of the nation in a lawful Parliament."

The King soon verified that part of the declaration concerning the defectiveness of the redresses of grievances; for hearing the Dutch fleet had so greatly suffered by a storm, that they were forced to put back, and would not be able to proceed till the spring, he returned to his former conduct, recalled several of his late acts of favour, particularly the restoration of Magdalen College, and thereby demonstrated, that all his redresses were owing entirely to necessity and not to inclination, which lost him many friends that might otherwise have been induced to stand by him.

Mention being made in the Prince's declaration of his being invited by divers of the Lords spiritual and temporal, the King in great haste sent for the Archbishop, and such Bishops as were in London, and required them to justify themselves to the world, by declaring under their hands their abhorrence of the Prince's intended invasion. But instead of complying with his request, they renewed their petition with great earnestness to call a free Parliament.

The damage sustained by the Dutch fleet having been purposely magnified to increase the King's security, it was soon repaired, and the Prince sailed again on the first of November, and on the fifth, landed his forces at Torbay. He marched directly to Exeter, where he was at first but coldly received by the Clergy and Magistrates. But soon after an association by the advice of Sir Edward Seymour was drawn up, to stand by the Prince of Orange, till religion, the laws and liberties were secured by a free Parliament. This association was signed and sent to other places, particularly to Oxford, where it was subscribed by almost all the heads and chief men of the University, and the Prince was earnestly invited thither, with a promise that their plate if wanted, should be at his service. From that time, as every day brought some persons of distinction to the Prince, so the King was daily forsaken, not only by those he had most trusted, but even by his own children, the Prince and Princess of Denmark.

The King was now under such a consternation that he neither knew what to resolve on, nor whom to trust. He sent for all the Lords in London, that were known to be firm Protestants, by some of whom he was privately advised to call a general meeting of all the Privy-Counsellors and Peers to ask their opinion. They unanimously agreed, that it was necessary to call a free Parliament, and send Commissioners to treat with the Prince. How much soever this went against the King's inclinations, he next day declared in council, that he resolved to have a free Parliament on the fifteenth of January, and ordered writs to be issued out accordingly. At the same time, the Marquis of Hallifax, the Earl of Nottingham, and the Lord Gedolphin, were appointed to go and ask the Prince what it was he demanded. The removal of Papists, and calling a free Parliament, were the chief articles proposed by the Prince, which with the rest of the Prince's demands, were deemed so reasonable that they were immediately sent away to the King, who owned he did not expect so good terms. During this treaty, strange councils were suggested to the King and Queen. The Priests and violent Papists knew that they must be the sacrifice, and the whole design of Popery given up without hope of revival. They told the Queen, she would be impeached and witnesses set up against herself and son. Whereupon the resolved to go to France with the child; and the midwife, with all that assisted at the birth, were also carried over, or so disposed of, that it was never known what became of them afterwards. The Queen prevailed with the King to promise to follow her very soon. Accordingly, having called an extraordinary council on account of the Prince's proposals, he acquainted them with the Queen's departure the night before, but still promised them that he would stay with them. He was unanimously advised to comply with the Prince's demands, and all things appeared as if he designed it, and the council was ordered to attend her next morning. But having privately sent for the Great Seal, on the eleventh of December, about three in the morning, he went away in disguise with Sir Edward Hales, whose servant he seemed to be. They past the Thames, and threw the Great Seal into the river; which was found some months after by a fisherman near Vaux-Hall. The King went down to a fisher-boat that Hales had provided for carrying him over.

Thus King James when there was no apparent cause to fear the safety of his person, chose rather to abandon all, than to stay and see the issue of a Free Parliament; which he had been so often petitioned and advised to call, and which he had so often promised to summon. With this his reign may be said to end. For if ever there Echard was a real desertion of a Kingdom, and ever a people left to take care of themselves, this was certainly the time. He exposed the nation to the pillage of an army which he had ordered to be disbanded without money, he destroyed the Parliament writs, threw the Broad Seal into the Thames, and left the people without a Governor.

Upon this desertion the Privy-counsellors and Peers with the Archbishop of Canterbury, met at Guild-Hall, and agreed to invite the Prince to come and take upon him the government of the nation, till matters were settled by a Parliament. This invitation was signed by all, and sent to the Prince, who upon receiving the surprising news of the King's sudden departure, thought it necessary to make all possible haste to London. When he was advanced as far as Windsor, two Gentlemen of Kent brought him notice, that the King was taken by some fishermen and carried to Feverham (1). The Prince instantly ordered Zuy-lstein

lestein to go and desire him to stay at Rockester, but Zuykestein missing his way, the King, at the invitation of the same Peers and Privy-council, that had just before sent to the Prince to take upon “fort of emulation at the success of the landmen, were resolved to have a frolick in their way; and about seven at night, under the conduct of William Ames and John Hunt, with about fifty more, chiefly seamen, put off in quest of a prize, and about eleven at night they took a Custom-house boat, in which proved to be the King, Sir Edward Hales, and Ralph Sheldon. The King was in a particular disguise, and so not known that night; but as if his destiny designed to be severe upon him, the seamen treated him very roughly above the rest, though incognito. One cried out, 'twas Father Petre; they knew it to be so by his lean jaws: A second called him old hatchet-faced Jesuit: a third swore, 'twas a cunning old rogue, they would warrant him. And all night long they welcomed him with these rough salutations, and perfuming the room with tobacco, the smell whereof the King hates. His Majesty was taken at the west point, not above a quarter of an hour before the flood would have carried him off; and it was his own fault, that they stooped there for balast, which the pilot was against: but the roughness of the seamen made his Majesty fear they were not safe in so small a boat without balast; whereby they lost six or eight hours, and so were providentially taken. He was detained at sea all night, and brought up from Ouse, where he landed, to Feverham about twelve, Wednesday the 12th. Then he was suspected, as he came up the town, and within a quarter of an hour after he was in the inn, fully discovered. He was willing by all arts at first to conceal himself; and at his first coming in he called for bacon and eggs, as if he were some ordinary man in his diet; whereas he tastes no meat that is in the least salted, as it afterwards appeared. He seemed cast down somewhat at the noise of the rabble; but after some recollection, called for some ink and paper to write to the Earl of Winchester; but was so discomposed, that he wrote, and tore, and begun again, as if he were overcome with disorder or fears. Inasmuch as I was with him before he was discovered, he entered into some discourse with me. He thanked me, and commended my prudence for not discovering him with the first, though I knew him, as soon as any one. He told me, that the rage of the people was up; and now that of the Psalmist was true; I, who still the raging of the sea, must still the rage and madness of the people; for he could not, therefore he——He complained heavily of fears and jealousies blown about by ill men; and too many of the black coats had done him that ill office they could never make him amends for. He insisted on his integrity; said, he had a good conscience, and could suffer and die. He told me, he read scripture much, and found great comfort in it. He declared, he never designed to oppress conscience, alter the government, or destroy the subjects liberties; and at last asked me plainly, What have I done? What are the errors of my reign? Tell me freely. To which, you may be sure, I made no answer. He insisted much upon going off, after he was taken; and I believe he put the question to every Layman and Churchman in the room, to get him a boat, and let him escape. He said, the Prince of Orange fought his crown and life; and if he were delivered up, his blood would lie at our doors, for he seemed persuaded they would murder him. Now, said he, the opportunity is in your hand; but if you miss this, it will not be in your power to help me. He argued much upon these words, He that is not with me, is against me; and sermonized half an hour, making reflections on men's coldness to serve him in that extremity. Whilst he insisted upon going off, and used all motives proper, as he thought, in begging, praying, tempting, arguing, persuading, reproving, &c. which was for above three hours, the rage of the seamen took fire, apprehending he would prevail with some to let him escape secretly;

“and thereupon arose some contemptuous words, and no small insolencies offered; which I almost think had not happened, if the fear of his escape had not run so much in their Minds, or if his Majesty would have waved discouraging so much thereof. For the seamen much valued themselves on their charge, and did apprehend their own lives in danger, if he went off; imagining, they had done a singular piece of service to the nation, and resolving there to keep him till order from the Prince, or the Lords at Guildhall. And the King himself undertook to discourse them, and asked the seamen, By what authority do you stand here? Am not I your King? And sure you will not hurt my life. Will you stand by me? I'll reward you. If you be my good subjects, you must obey me. Come and serve me, and get me a boat, and I'll go off. Afterward, he went so far as to regulate their way of keeping guards; bid them stand further off: Go down, and keep your distance: which so enraged them, that some of them forgot all decency and reverence to him; inasmuch that Sir Edward Hales was desired to take the King off from that discourse, which made him cheap, and proved so unpolitick and unsuccessful. But still the rage of the seamen increased, and they shook hands and cried out one and all, We'll die rather than he shall go off; got together in a full body, broke out into fo scornful huzzas, and for a while doubled their guard, suffered none to go to him, but whom they well knew, loaded their muskets, and made ready as if they resolved to fire upon any that opposed their measures. This indeed intimidated the King, and his spirits seemed much down; which made him keep his eye upon the door, and watch all their motions narrowly, and desire not to be much alone, but the Gentlemen to stay with him. Towards night, the Earl of Winchester came, and then it was resolved to remove the King to a private house; which the seamen still opposed for fear of escape. But my Lord pawning his honour for the King's stay, the better sort of them consented, but the mobile still refused; and as the King came down stairs, I believe more than twenty swords were drawn over his head, and some threats passed; and at the bottom of the stairs they stooped him near a quarter of an hour. At length, the matter was compounded, upon condition they only should be the King's guards, whilst he stayed. So at length the King was suffered to walk down the dirty street to his private apartments, with the irregular disorderly crew at his heels.

“When the King had been some while in the private house, his spirits revived, and he was full of discourse, which was chiefly in his own vindication; for he undertook to justify himself even to Magdalen college business. Only I must not forget that he pleasantly entertained us with a long discourse about St. Wenefrid and the virtue of her well, and the whole legend of it; as also having lost a wooden cross, he told us how much it was to be prized, for it was St. Edward the Confessor's, and had a piece of the true real cross in it, on which our Saviour suffered; which sort of discourse was to us, you must imagine, very agreeable. He then wished himself with the Queen; and blessed God, she and his son were safely arrived abroad. And he was farther heard more than once to thank God, that Father Petre was safely arrived also, and seemed to express a mighty esteem for him. As to Sir Edward Hales, he did confess, it was by his means he came this way; but seemed not much to blame him for his ill success. And when he was told, the country hated him, and none spake well of him, he said, that then he was the likelier to be an honest man. And being told, that Mr. William Penn was seized also, he pitied him much, and said, he was a good man, and he was sure no ill could be charged on him.

“Next

upon him the government, came to London; where he was received with expressions of joy by great numbers (1).

When the Prince at Windsor, had notice of the King's return to London; he thought himself ill used by the Privy-council, who had invited the King without consulting him. The scene was now altered, and new counsels were to be taken. So it was resolved to stick to the point of the King's deserting his people, and not to give it up, by entering into any treaty with him. Pursuant to this resolution, the King was sent to and desired to remove out of London, and Ham being proposed to him, it was asked whether he might not go to Rochester. As this was visibly desired in order to a second escape, the Prince readily consented to it, and came to St. James's, the same day the King departed from White-Hall.

The King remained a week at Rochester, and both himself and every one else saw he was at full liberty, and under no sort of restraint. Many that were zealous for his interest, went to him and pressed him to stay and see the issue of a free Parliament. But a vehement letter from the Queen (which was intercepted and afterwards conveyed to the King) claiming his promise to come over to her, determined him contrary to the solicitations of his friends: So he left Rochester very secretly, on the last day of that memorable year, and in a vessel prepared for him, got safe into France.

The Prince at his coming to London, called together all the Peers and the Members of the three last Parliaments that were in town, with the Aldermen, and some other Citizens of London.

By these he was desired to take upon him the administration of affairs, and to write missive letters to the same effect, and for the same persons to whom writs were issued out for calling a Parliament, that so there might be an assembly of men in the form of a Parliament though without writs under the Great Seal; such as that was which had called home King Charles the second (2).

Pursuant to this advice, the Prince summoned a Convention in the manner desired, and the elections of the members were managed with all possible freedom. Every man voting for whom he pleased, without any interposition or recommendation from the Prince (3).

The Convention being met and the speakers chosen, the Marquis of Hallifax, for the Peers (in opposition to the Earl of Darby), and Mr. Henry Powle for the Commons, it was voted in the lower House, "that King James having endeavoured to subvert the Constitution, by breaking the original contract between King and people, and having violated the fundamental laws and withdrawn himself out of the Kingdom, has abdicated the Government; and the Throne is thereby become vacant." The next day it was farther resolved, "That it has been found by experience, to be inconsistent with this Protestant Kingdom to be governed by a Popish Prince." When these important votes were sent up to the Lords for their concurrence, a motion was made not to agree with the Commons, that the Throne was vacant but only to suppose it for the present, and determine first, whether the Throne being vacant, it ought to be filled by a Regent or a King: This question was debated

"Next day being Thursday the 13th, came in two hundred Gentlemen from Canterbury and East-Kent, and in the fight of him declared their concurrence with the Prince of Orange; which much afflicted him, for that he then said, he was not safe where he was. And towards night Captain Crayford and another Captain came from Sheerness, declaring the resolution to deliver up to the Prince the fort and the ships in the Suade, which is a road under the protection of the fort. Upon the hearing of which he said, he would consent to any thing to prevent bloodshed; but seemed extremely afflicted thereat. He was really very melancholy at times, and often shed tears. His guards were so severe upon him, and pursued him from one room to another; and pressed upon his privacies, so that he had scarce the civilities from the seamen, that was due to a Gentleman in restraint; scarce leisure to be devout or retire to the calls of nature; so over officiously did they guard him. Fresh rumours oft were raised of his going off, which fetched the scattered seamen together, and were the occasion of fresh heats and insolencies. In this tumultuous manner was the poor King guarded; neither would they suffer the Gentlemen to take their turns.

"When Friday night came, and the guards, that were sent from the Lords that were then at Guild-hall, were within two hours march of Faversham, the rage of the seamen increased, because the Earl of Faversham was with them, and some others they disliked; that they swore bloodily, no guards should come in there, and so run all to arms. Upon sight of which the Gentlemen were forced to dispatch express away to stop the guards, and pray them to lodge at Sittingbourn; for doubtless if the guards had come that night into town, there had been bloody work; for by what I heard and saw, I verily believe the seamen would have resisted them.

"At length, Saturday morning came, when the "King was guarded out by the seamen and Gentle-men, and so received near Sittingbourn, by those that were sent for him." Thus you have a long account of this affair.

(1) It is observed, by Burnet, that though this accident of the King's return, seemed of no great consequence, yet all the strugglings afterward made by the Jacobite party, did flow from thence. For if he had got clear away, by all that could be judged, he would not have had a party left. All would have agreed, that here was a desertion, and therefore the nation was free and at liberty to secure itself. But what followed, gave them a colour to say that he was forced away. Till now he had scarce any party but among the papists; but from this incident a party grew up, that were long very active for his interests.

(2) The Lawyers were generally of opinion, that the Prince ought to declare himself King like Henry VII. This they said, would put an end to all disputes, which might otherwise grow very perplexing and tedious. And, they said, he might call a Parliament, which would be a legal assembly, if summoned by a King in fact, though his title was not yet recognized. This was plainly contrary to his Declaration, by which the settlement of the nation was referred to a Parliament; such a step would make all the Prince had hitherto done, pass for an aspiring ambition only to raise himself, disgust those who had been best affected to his designs, and make them less concerned in the quarrel, if instead of staying till the crown should be offered him, he would assume it as a conquest. These reasons determined the Prince against that Proposition, and to call the Peers, &c. together. Burnet l. 803.

(3) As there had been writs for a Parliament twice before this, in a few months, most places had fixed their members, so that the difference was not considerable, between the members that were, and those that would have been chosen, if King James had suffered the first or second parliament, he had called to meet, which in debated with great warmth. The Earls of Nottingham, Clarendon and Rochester, were the chief managers in favour of a Regent; in opposition to the Marquis of Halifax, and the Earl of Danby, who strenuously asserted the necessity of filling the Throne with a King. The debate being ended, fifty one voted for a King, and forty nine for a Regent. It was next debated, whether or no there was an original Contract between King and People? The House being divided upon the question, fifty three were for the original contract, and forty six against it. After this, it was soon carried in the affirmative, that King James had broke the original Contract. Then they took into consideration the word abdicated, and concluded, that the word deserted was more proper. They examined also the word vacant, and the question was put, whether King James, having broke the original Contract, and deserted the Government, the Throne was thereby vacant? Upon a division in the House, those who maintained the King never dies, and consequently, that the Throne is immediately full of the next Heir; carried it against the vacancy, by eleven voices. Whereupon a motion being made, that the Prince and Princess of Orange should be declared King and Queen; this was also carried in the negative by five voices, though protested against by forty Lords. Having thus gone through the grand vote of the Commons, the Peers acquainted them, that instead of abdicated, they would have deserted put in, and that the Throne is thereby vacant to be left out. But the Commons adhering to their vote, rejected these amendments, and after a very famous free conference, the Lords at last agreed, that King James had abdicated the government, and that the Throne was thereby become vacant (1). This done, it was voted in both Houses, that the Prince and Princess of Orange, should be declared King and Queen, but that the administration should be singly in the Prince. There was drawn up and agreed to, a solemn declaration of rights, containing the several facts and reasons, for King James's forfeiture of the Crown; asserting the undoubted rights and liberties of the subject (2), settling the succession of the Crown and appointing the new oaths of allegiance. This declaration and the tender of the Crown being offered to their Royal Highnesses, they were proclaimed the same day, to the great joy of the nation. Feb. 13. 1688.

By all these Proceedings of the Convention, it plainly appears, that the state of parties was State of Parties at the Revolution very much altered. Till King James's abdication on the whole nation seemed to be of one mind. Tories and Whigs unanimously carried on the great work. But when King James rather than wait the issue of a free Parliament, and be bound to govern by law, (which was all that was required of him) chose to abdicate the government, and withdraw into France; several parties arose both in the nation, and in the Parliament; according to the different principles they had espoused. Though the Tories, when their religion and liberties were at stake, had laid aside Passive Obedience and Non-resistance, they still firmly adhered to the principle on which those doctrines were founded, namely, the divine, unalienable, inalienable, hereditary right of Kings. And therefore, though they had heartily concurred with the

(1) The disputes about the words abdicate, or desert, and the vacancy of the Throne, were fitter for a school than a House of Parliament; and might have been expected in some assembly of pedants, where young students exercised themselves in disputation, but not in such an august assembly, as that of Lords and Commons met in solemn conference, upon the most important occasion. The truth is, that they who formed the opposition, were reduced to maintain strange paradoxes—Thus for instance, they were forced to admit, that an oppressed people might seek their remedy in resistance, for they had sought it there themselves, and yet they opposed making use of the only remedy, which could effectually secure them against returns of the same oppression, when resistance had put it in their power, as oppression had given them a right, to use this remedy. This must appear a very absurd paradox, if we consider that resistance, in all such cases, is the mean, and future security the end; and that the one is wicked in the highest degree, if it be not employed to obtain the other. Thus again, the same men declared themselves willing to secure the nation against the return of King James, to that Throne he had abdicated, or according to them, deserted; and yet they could not prevail on their scrupulous consciences to declare the Throne vacant. They had concurred in the vote, that it was inconsistent with the laws, liberties and religion of England, to have a Papist rule over the Kingdom; and yet they maintained, though they did not expressly name him, that if the Throne was then, or should be at any time, vacant of the father, it must be reputed instantaneously full of the son, upon the foundation of this silly axiom that the King never dies. According to this law, King James and his successors, to the twentieth generation, might have continued abroad a race of royal exiles, preserving their indefeasible right to govern, but debarred from the exercise of it, whilst the nation continued, from century to century, under the dominion of Regents with regal authority, but without any regal right. Thus they who maintained the hereditary right of our Kings, reduced themselves, and would have reduced their country, to the absurd necessity of altering the Constitution, under pretence of preserving it. No King, except a Stuart, was to reign over us, but we might establish a Doge or Regent; and by this means these warm assertors of monarchy, refusing to be slaves, concluded to be republicans. Many more paradoxes of equal extravagance might be cited, which were advanced directly, or which resulted plainly, from the arguments employed on one side of the question in these disputes. But these instances may suffice to show, that although difficulties hard to solve in speculation, or to remove in practice, will arise in the pursuit of the most rational principles; yet such absurdities as these can never arise, except from the most irrational, and always must arise from such. Differ. on Par. p. 83.

(2) In stating the grievances and rights, the dispensing power came to be discussed. And then the power of the crown to grant a Non-obstante to some statutes was objected to. Upon opening this, the debate was found so intricate, that it was let fall at that time only for dispatch. But afterwards an act pass'd condemning it singly, and the power of a Non-obstante was taken away. Yet King James's party took great advantage from this; they said, though the main clamour of the nation was against the dispensing power, yet when the Convention brought things to a settlement, that did not appear to be so clear a point as had been pretended; and it was not so much as mentioned in this instrument of government. So that by the confession of his enemies, it appeared to be no unlawful power; nor was it declared contrary to the laws of England. Whereas its not being mentioned then, was only upon the opposition that was made, that so no more time might be lost, nor this instrument be clogged with disputable points. Burnet, p. 222.

the Whigs in inviting over the Prince of Orange, their only view was to oblige King James to alter his measures and make the laws the sole rule of his conduct. In a word, they wanted the Prince to be their deliverer, but not their Sovereign. In these sentiments were almost one half of the Lords, about one third of the Commons, and the Clergy in general. All these declared for a Regent; for according to their principles, the King never dies, nor can the Throne ever be vacant, being, upon death, cession, or abdication, instantly full of the next heir. If therefore a King, by his misconduct should show that he was as incapable as an infant or lunatic of governing his people, the remedy provided for infancy or lunacy might in their opinion be applied, but the right must remain and go on in a lineal succession (1).

The Non-juring Party.

Of those who were thus for continuing the right of sovereignty in King James, and vesting a Regent with the exercise of the power, there were visibly two different parties. Some adhering to the old principles (transmitted down from King James I.) in their literal sense and full extent, went into the expedient of a Regency, as the most probable way for laying the nation asleep, and for overcoming the present general aversion to King James. After which they imagined it would not be difficult in some time, to compass his restoration. This was their intention, and therefore, when the Prince of Orange was declared King, they could not comply with the settlement, nor swear Allegiance to the new King, but formed what was properly called the Non-juring party, whose number indeed was not very great, though headed however by Dr. San- croft, Archbishop of Canterbury; and several other spiritual and temporal Lords.

The rest of those that were for hereditary right and a Regent, though they could not, consistently with their principles, promote the advancement of the Prince of Orange to the Throne, yet when he was declared King, they thought they might swear Allegiance to him, by means of the distinction of a King de jure, and a King de facto; a distinction authorized by the famous statute of Henry VII. (2). But though the whole Tory party came into the new settlement upon this distinction, they were however divided into two very different Branches, by the different consequences they drew from it. Some sincerely thought that a King de facto, had a right to their obedience, and that they were bound to adhere to him and defend him, even in opposition to him, with whom they believed the right did still remain. Hence it was, that though they could not resolve to vote or act themselves, against the principles they had professed as maxims of law, yet they could resolve to adhere to a new settlement, when it was made. This was the case of the Earl of Nottingham, and many others who were employed in eminent posts in the reign of King William (3).

But the other branch of the Tories, drew from the same distinction of a King de jure and a King de facto a very different conclusion. They acknowledged one King, and held their allegiance still due to another. They bound themselves by oath to preserve a settlement, which they pretended themselves in conscience obliged to subvert (4). According to them, the meaning of the oath of allegiance was, that they were only

(1) If the persons who maintained the divine hereditary indefeasible right of four Kings, had thought fit to drop their principles when they laid aside those of Passive Obedience and Non-resistance, and no tolerable reason can be given why they did not, their conduct would have been consistent and uniform on this great occasion, and this uniformity would have been productive of great good, by taking away at once, even the appearances of all political division in the bulk of the nation. But whilst they laboured to reconcile their present conduct to their ancient system, they were true to neither. They had gone much farther lengths than their ancient system would allow, and then they refused to go as far as the other required in order to be safe; and therefore in order to be justified, they lost every kind of merit, the chimerical merit of adhering to a set of silly principles; and the real merit of sacrificing their prejudice to the complete deliverance of their country, from the recent danger of Papery and arbitrary Power. Dissert. on Part. p. 85. It may be observed on this occasion, that there is a distinction which should be constantly made in cases of this nature, and which those who espouse the principle of hereditary right, never make in their discourses or writings, or never make exactly enough. They compare the proceedings, without comparing the situation. Necessity and self-preservation are great laws of nature, and may well dispense with the strict observance of the common forms of any particular constitution. Either the convention must have fallen into the absurdities mentioned in a former note, or have called back King James, the greatest absurdity of all, or have left their country in absolute anarchy, or have done what they did. What they did, was done as near as possible to the spirit of our constitution, the forms of our laws, and the examples of former times.

(2) This statute did ordain, that no person, that did assist in arms or otherwise, the King for the time being, should after be impeached therefore or attainted. For that it was agreeable to reason of states, that the subject should not inquire of the justness of the King's title, or quarrel; and it was agreeable to good conscience (that whatsoever the fortune of war were) the subject should not suffer for his obedience. Bacon's Hist. of Hen. VII. p. 144. This statute was principally made (says a certain author) that the subjects might be safe which ever side prevailed, in an age, when the epidemical folly of fighting for different Pretenders, had spilt oceans of blood on the scaffold, as well as in the field. He observes, of this law, that it confounds in effect the very distinction it seems to make, since it secures alike, and, by securing alike, authorizes alike those who adhere to the King de jure, and those who adhere to the King in possession. Dissert. on Part. p. 91.

(3) The principle (says the anonymous author so often mentioned) of this branch of the Tories was wrong, but it could not be reputed dangerous, whilst it lasted; and it seems to have been built on so narrow and slippery a foundation, that it did not continue long in force.——Since we find among those who voted for a Regent, not a King, some illustrious persons, who served King William faithfully, adhered invariably to the new establishment, and have been distinguished friends to the succession that hath now taken place. Dissert. on Parties, p. 92.

(4) This was (says the formentioned author) to justify perjury, to sanctify perjury, to remove the boundaries of Right and Wrong, and as far as in them lay, to teach mankind to call good evil, and evil good.——That there have been persons who deserved to be ranked under this head, is too notorious to be denied; but I persuade myself, that this division hath always consisted of a flux body. On one hand, it is scarce possible to believe, that any number of men should be so hardened as to avow to themselves, and to one another, the acting, and persisting to act, on a principle so repugnant to every notion and sentiment, that harbour in the breasts of social creatures. On the other, we know how the fallies and transports of party on some occasions can hurry only to obey the new King as an usurper, during his usurpation; and therefore, as long as he continued in possession, they were bound to submit to him, but that it was still lawful for them to assist King James, if he should come to recover his crown; and that they might act all they could in his favour, as being still their King de jure. The proceedings of this branch of the Tory-party, in the course of King William's reign, make it but too visible, that they took the oaths in this sense, contrary to the plain meaning of the words faith and true allegiance, and contrary to the express declaration of the act that enjoined them. This branch of the Tory-party were styled the rigid Tories, or High-fliers.

On the other hand, as the Tories were divided into two branches, so the Whigs were not all of one mind. For though they had all, pursuant to their principles, declared themselves for the abdication of King James, and the vacancy of the throne, and unanimously concurred in making the new settlement, yet some few among them had very different views and ends from the rest. Those intended to take advantage from the present conjuncture to depress the crown, to render it as precarious and elective as they could, and to raise the power of the people upon the ruin of the monarchy. Hence it was dangerously asserted by some, that the whole government was dissolved, from which a dissolution of all men's properties, honours and rights, might have been inferred. And when it was proposed to examine into the birth of the pretended Prince (1), the same persons thought it policy to let it lie in the dark undecided, and believed it no ill precedent that they should so neglect the right of succession, as not so much as to enquire into the matter. They also thought, it would be a good security for the nation, to have a dormant title to the crown lie as it were neglected, to oblige the Kings to govern well, while they would apprehend the danger of a revolt to a Pretender still in their eye. From these and other proceedings they are called Republican Whigs. But the far greater part of the Whigs, without going into new schemes of government, thought it sufficient to say, that in extreme cases all obligations did cease; and that in the present circumstances, the extremity of affairs, by reason of the late ill government, and by King James's flying over to the enemy of England, rather than submit to reasonable terms, had put the nation on the necessity of securing themselves upon a legal bottom. Extreme dangers would justify extreme remedies, though there was no special provision that directed to them, or allowed of them. Nor was there any need to fear ill consequences from this, since houses were pulled down or blown up in a fire, and yet a town in general was not thereby destroyed. So a nation's securing itself against a King, who was subverting the government, did not expose monarchy, nor raise a popular authority. In a word, they were for keeping, as near as they could with safety to the lineal succession, and not to destroy but rather improve the constitution, by marking out the bounds of the Prerogative, and declaring the rights and liberties of the People.

As for the Clergy, when they saw the Church ^{The state} in imminent danger, they had, with the rest of ^{of the clergy} the Tories, so far given up passive obedience and non-resistance, as to co-operate with the Laity in promoting the Revolution, till King James's abdication. Some of the Prelates had joined to invite over the Prince of Orange, and their brethren refused to sign an abhorrence of this invitation. Nay, the University of Oxford had associated for him against their King; and the Bishops and London Clergy had welcomed him to St. James's, even after the King had withdrawn himself into France. But as they still firmly adhered to the divine right of monarchy and lineal succession, (which they had so often and so publicly asserted) upon the King's abdication they were at a loss how to disengage themselves with honour or conscience. Consistently with their professed principles they could not vote nor act in favour of the new settlement, and therefore they had recourse to the distinction above-mentioned, of a King de jure and a King de facto; and too many of them drew the same consequence from that distinction, as the rigid Tories, that is, they acknowledged one King, and held their allegiance due to another. But others, and especially such as came in more sincerely to the new government, were influenced by a notion which seemed to agree with their principles, and which was thus expressed: "The Prince of Orange had just cause to make war on King James. In a just war, success is considered as the decision of heaven. Consequently, the Prince's success gave him a right of conquest over King James, and a title to all that was before vested in him." This is said to have had the most universal effect hurry even reasonable men to act on the most absurd, and honest men to act on the most unjustifiable principles, or both one and the other on no principle at all, according as the object which the prevailing passion presents to them, directs. Dissert. on Parties, p. 92.

(1) When this debate was proposed in the House of Lords, it was rejected with indignation. James was now sent out of England to be bred up in France, an enemy both to the nation and the established religion. It was impossible for the people of England to know, whether he was the same person that had been carried over or not: If he should die, another might be put in his room, so as the nation could not be assured concerning him.—It was known that all the persons, who had been the confidants in that matter, were conveyed away: so it was impossible to come at them, by whose means only the truth of the birth could be found out.

This matter, it seems, had been privately debated before it was brought to the House; and it was by some observed, that as King James, by going about to prove the truth of the birth, and yet doing it imperfectly, had really made it more suspicious than it was before; so, if there was no clear or positive proof made of an imposture, the pretending to examine into it, and then the not being able to make it out beyond the possibility of contradiction, would really give more credit to the thing than it had, and instead of weakening it, would strengthen the pretension of the birth. Upon all these considerations, no farther inquiry was made into it. It is true, this put a plausible objection in the mouth of all King James's party. Here, said they, an infant was condemned, and denied his right, without either proof or enquiry. Burnet, p. 817.

effect on the greatest part of the Clergy. Some few who were more scrupulous, refused to submit to the new settlement, and remained among the Non-jurors.

Such was the state of parties at the time of the Revolution; and such the political divisions in the Nation and Parliament, when King William was advanced to the throne: which being remembered, will plainly account for the early and strong opposition to the new settlement, even from those who had heartily espoused the Prince of Orange's cause till the flight of King James; and also for the many difficulties, obstructions, plots, and conspiracies, which King William encountered in the course of his reign; and which made him so uneasy, that he will be seen more than once resolving to quit his throne, and retire to Holland.

THE HISTORY of ENGLAND.

BOOK XXV.

SECT. I.

From the REVOLUTION, to the Death of Queen MARY, in 1694.

28. WILLIAM III. and MARY II.

AMONG the various revolutions in Kingdoms and States mentioned in History, that in England in the year 1688. is hardly to be paralleled. The manner in which it was accomplished, and the circumstances attending the course of it, were as extraordinary as the importance of it was great, not only to the British dominions, but also to the best part of Europe, and to the Protestant interest in general. The progress of the French in their design of an universal monarchy was such, that Catholick no less than Protestant States rejoiced, at a Revolution that seemed to be the only means to check the overgrown power of France, and free them from the approaching state of a slavish dependency. But to England this Revolution was in a more particular manner the fountain of many invaluable blessings, not only as the nation was delivered by it from popery and arbitrary power, which were advancing very swiftly, but the like danger for the future was by the new establishment entirely removed. The authority of the Prince, which by such principles as composed an avowed system of tyranny, had been raised to a degree inconsistent with a free State, was reduced within the bounds of the laws. The prerogative of the crown, which by various arts had been stretched, and the many precedents, destructive of liberty, that had been set, were no longer to be feared; all hidden reserves of authority to be let out on occasion, and to overflow the privileges of the people, being removed, and the laws of the land made the sole springs of the the Sovereign's pretensions and the Nation's rights. In a word, the constitution of England, which for almost a century had been seen in two very different lights, was by the Revolution and subsequent Settlement not only renewed and brought back to the first principles, and nearer the primitive institution, but moreover was fixed upon surer and more lasting foundations.

William III. Prince of Orange, chief author of Abrief of this famous Revolution, was descended from the ^{ancient} house of Nassau (1). He was great-grandson of William I. Prince of Orange, who, ^{the} Revolution upon

(1) The house of Nassau is very ancient, and divided into numerous branches, which have their titles from the several counties belonging to Nassau, as Nassau-Dittgenburg, Nassau-Dietz, Nassau-Seigen, Nassau-Hadamar, &c. Nassau was made a Principality by Ferdinand II. in 1653. This ^{house} Nassau is not only a King to Great-Britain in the person of William III. but also an Emperor to Germany in the person of Adolphus, Count of Nassau, in 1292, slain six years after in a battle with his rival Albert of Austria. From Otto Count of Nassau, General of the Imperial army against the Hungarians under Henry I. in 926, to John III. in 1494, are fourteen descents. In which time the Counts of Nassau by marriages acquired large possessions in the Netherlands, Burgundy, &c. as Fianden, Brabant, Loek, &c. John III. Count of Nassau-Dittgenburg, had (by Elizabeth daughter of the Landgrave of Hesse-Cassel, and in right of her mother Countess of Katzenelbogen) two sons Henry and William, between whom his territories were divided; Henry had the possessions in the Netherlands, and William those in Germany. Henry (to whom Charles V. owed in great measure his advancement to the Imperial throne) being sent by the Emperor as Sovereign of the Netherlands into France, to do homage for Flanders and Artois, was, (1515) with the consent of Francis I. married to Claude de Chabot, only sister of Philibert de Chabot Prince of Orange, by whom he had a son called René or Renaus. Philibert dying without issue, left, by will, the principality of Orange to his sister's son Renaus, who died dying without heirs (1544), bequeathed it to his cousin, son of his uncle William; namely,

WILLIAM, surnamed the GREAT,

Count of Nassau, and by his cousin Renaus's will, Prince of Orange, born 1533. He was son of William the Elder, who having embraced the reformed religion, and introduced it into his territories, the Emperor Charles V. took from him this his son William, and educated him in the Papist religion, which he professed till the revolt of the Netherlands. He was many years about the Emperor's person, and by him made, at the age of twenty-two, Generalissimo of his armies. When Philip II. would have subverted the constitution of the Netherlands, he being then Governor of Holland, Zealand, &c. espoused the cause of liberty, and became the founder of the Republic of the United Provinces. In this he was greatly assisted by his brothers Lodowick, Adolphus, Henry, (all three slain in battle without heirs) but especially by John his second brother, (b. 1535.) to whom he gave part of his German dominions, with the title of Count of Nassau-Dietz. [This John Count of Nassau, and Stadtholder of Friesland, was ancestor of several branches of Nassau, viz. by his son John, of the line of Seigen; by his son George, of the line of Dittgenburg; by his son Lewis, of the line of Hadamar; and by his third son Ernst-Casimir, of the line of Dietz, Stadtholders of Friesland. This Ernst-Casimir (b. 1573.) Count of Nassau-Dietz, was father of William-Frederick (b. 1613.), father of Henry-Casimir (b. 1657.), father of John-William-Frizzo (b. 1687, who being appointed heir of the house of Orange by King William III. assumed that title, and was drowned 1711.), father of William-Charles-Henry-Frizzo, the present Prince of Nassau-Dietz and Orange, hereditary Stadtholder of Friesland, and chosen Stadtholder of Gelderland, Zutphen and Groningen (1722.), married (1733.) to Anne, Princess of Great-Britain.] William I. Prince of Orange was at last assassinated at Delft (1584.), in the 57th year of his age. He had by his first wife Ann of Egmont (Countess of Buren and Leerdam) Mary, and Philip-William Prince of Orange, who being seized at the University of Leuven by the Duke of Alva, was carried to Spain, and confined there thirty years, before he was suffered to come back to the Netherlands, where he died without heirs 1618. By his second wife Anne daughter of Maurice Elector of Saxony, he had Emilia (married to Emanuel nominal King of Portugal) and Maurice. By his third wife Charlotte de Bourbon, daughter to the Duke of Montpensier, who had been a Nun, he had six daughters; Juliana (married to Frederick IV. Elector Palatine) Isabella, Catharina Belgica, Charlotta Brabantina, Charlotta Flandrina, Emilia. By his fourth wife Louisa de Coligny, he had Henry-Frederick. After his death, Philip his eldest son being in Spain, he was succeeded in the Stadtholdership of Holland and Zealand by his second son,

MAURICE,

Count of Nassau, and, after his brother Philip's death, Prince of Orange, (b. 1567.) He was called into action at seventeen years of age, and remained at the head of affairs above forty years, from 1584 to 1625, when he died. He was never married, but was succeeded in his estates and dignities by

It may not be improper to insert here, a brief account of the nature and constitution of a Republick, so different from all others; and which is to bear so large a part in the affairs of Europe, throughout the following history.

The Netherlands, or Low-countries, have been for many ages, divided into seventeen distinct Provinces; and were governed by so many Sovereigns, under the various titles of Prince, Duke, or Count. The several constitutions of these Provinces, were much the same, being originally formed by part of those northern swarms which over ran Europe, and every where introduced a Constitution, now generally called the States; under a single person limited by law. As by the Assembly of the States, the succession when doubtful or contested was settled, laws made, taxes imposed, peace or war declared; the use of this assembly was the principal privilege of the inhabitants of the Low-countries, and consequently, they were always very jealous of any encroachment upon it.

In process of time, these Provinces by marriages, successions, or conquests were united in the House of Burgundy, under Philip the good. Afterwards upon a marriage with the heiress of Burgundy, they came to the House of Austria, and in the person of the Emperor Charles V. were incorporated with his dominions of Germany, Spain, Italy and the Indies.

In the height of his glory Charles V. not only resigned the imperial crown to his brother Ferdinand, but also the Kingdom of Spain with the Netherlands, to his son Philip, whom he had two years before married to Mary, Queen of England. Philip II. sworn enemy of the Reformed Religion, which now began to spread in the Low-Countries, resolved to extirpate heresy in all his dominions, and to that end, introduced by violence the inquisition, into the Netherlands; to which the inhabitants had always refused to submit. Provoked at this, and many other encroachments of their liberties, the Provinces rise in arms, and headed by the prince of Orange, waged war with their Sovereign; which at length produced in 1580, the famous union of Utrecht, the foundation of the present Republick of the united Provinces, the nature of whose government is briefly this.

The sovereign authority of the united provinces resides in the States-general, or the states of each Province assembled in one place. But as this assembly (consisting of above eight hundred persons) cannot meet without great expence and trouble, each Province deputes a small number of Plenipotentiaries, (usually in all about thirty) who with the Greffier or secretary, constantly sit at the Hague, and are commonly called the States-General. Each Province presides their week in turns. Neither Stadtholder or Governor, or any military person, can be a member of this assembly. Matters are here decided by the majority, except in cases of peace and war, foreign alliances, raising or coining money, and particularly the sovereignty and privileges of each Province or member of the union. In all these the Provinces must all concur

He was King William's Captain of the Guard when Prince of Orange, and Master of the Horse when King of England, d. 1708. By Isabel van Arfens, daughter of Cornelius Lord of Somerdyke, (who d. 1719-20.) this Henry had five sons; Lewis, (d. 1687.); Cornelius, (Lieutenant-General of the Dutch infantry, Lord of Woudenberg); Maurice, (Captain of the Dutch Life-guards); Francis, (Colonel of an English regiment of dragoons, killed at Almenara in Spain); and Henry, the eldest surviving son, created 24 Dec. 1698, Baron of Alford, Viscount Boston, and Earl of Grantham, Lord-Chamberlain to her late Majesty Queen Caroline.

* Henry Frederick Prince of Orange, had by a concubine Frederick of Nassau Lord of Zulststein, killed at the battle of Naardam (1672.) refusing quarter. He left by his wife Mary, daughter of Sir William Killigrew Bart. of Cornwall; William-Henry, Lord of Zulststein, created May 10. 1695. Baron of Enfield, Viscount Tunbridge, and Earl of Rochford, whose son William II. Earl of Rochford died without heirs at Almenara 1710, and was succeeded by his brother Frederick, who dying in June 1737. was succeeded by his son William-Henry.

This Republick formed by the father, was established by his second son Maurice, and by his youngest son Henry-Frederick brought to perfection, being acknowledged and treated with by Spain, as free and independent states; and their Ambassadors ranked with the Venetian by the treaty concur. Nor can they chuse ambassadors, or answer foreign ministers, (though sent and received in their name) without consulting the States of each Province, by their deputies, and receiving their orders; which is indeed also done in all affairs of great importance. Each Province may send what number of deputies they please, as two, three or more; since the Deputies of a Province have but one vote. The sovereignty of the territories and places, conquered by the common arms, is likewise imbodied in the States-General, as Bistduc, Breda, Bergensloot, &c. and the places belonging to the East and West-India companies, in Asia, America and Africa.

The resolves of the States-General are executed by the Council of State, consisting of three deputies from Holland, two from Gelderland, two from Zeland, two from Friesland, one from Groningen, one from Utrecht, and one from Overyssel, in all twelve. The deputies preside by turns, and may always decide by plurality of voices. This council proposes to the States the ways and means of raising forces and money, superintends the troops, fortifications, contributions upon the enemy's country, passports, and the affairs, revenues, and government of the places conquered since the Union. Estimates of the expences of the ensuing year, are also drawn up by the Treasurer-general, (who has a seat here for life, with a deliberative voice) under the authority of the council, and a petition presented to the States to demand the same of the Provinces in the proportion above-mentioned. Each Province raises what money they please, send in their quota to the Receiver-general (who also has a seat in the council of state) and convert the rest to present uses, or reserve it for future occasions. In a word, the Council of State disposes of all money designed for extraordinary affairs, and gives orders (signed by at least three deputies of several Provinces and the Treasurer-general, and registered in the Chamber of accounts) for the whole expence of the State, according to the resolves of the States-General. It must be observed, the Council of State, formerly represented the authority of the States-General in their absence, and were judges of the proper time to convene them. But this power being abused under the Earl of Leicester, the Provincial States desired of the General, that they might by deputies, continue their assemblies under the name of States-General, which has been done ever since Leicester's leaving the government.

The Chamber of Accounts erected for the care of the Council of State, to examine and state all the accounts of the several receivers, to controul, and register the orders of the Council of State. This chamber is composed of two deputies from each province, who are changed every three years, and reside at the Hague.

The Admiralty (divided into five Colleges; one in Amsterdam, a second at Rotterdam, a third at Horn, a fourth at Middleburg, a fifth at Harlingen;) has the management of the sea-affairs, and when a fleet is ordered, each College, (consisting of seven deputies, four from the Province where the College resides, and three named by other Provinces) furnishes their own proportion in all monies that are to be raised.

Each Province, being sovereign and independent, is governed by its own laws and customs, under the authority of the provincial states; for instance, the sovereignty of Holland is lodged in the States of that Province represented by deputies from the nobles and towns, composing nineteen voices, of which the nobles have only the first, and the cities eighteen, so many sending deputies to the States. These were originally but six, till William I. Prince of Orange, to strengthen his authority, added twelve more. The former are still distinguished from the latter, by being called the six great cities, namely, Dort, Harlem, Delft, Leiden, Amsterdam and Gouda. The nobles are represented by eight or nine of their body, and each town may send what number of deputies they please, since they are maintained at their charge, and have but one vote. The Provincial States of Holland severally meet four times a year at the Hague, in February, June, September, and November, to order the affairs of the Province. The Pensioner of Holland, has a place in all the assemblies of the Province, and in the States proposes all affairs, gathers the votes, and concludes. This office is of great importance, for the pensioner is as the President of the assembly, and generally for life, though he ought to be chosen or renewed every fifth year. He is always one of their deputies, in the States-General. When there is a Stadtholder, and differences arise between him and the States, the Pensioner is in a dangerous situation, of which Barneveldt and De Wit, are terrible instances. There is likewise a Provincial Council of State composed of several deputies, one from the nobles, and one from each of the principal towns; and but one, from three of the smaller towns who chuse him by turns. This council sits constantly at the Hague, proposes the matters of deliberation to, and executes the resolves of, the Provincial States, who are convened by this council upon extraordinary occasions. There are also two chambers of Accounts, one for the ancient Deman of the old courts of Holland, (but as the Deman is begun to be fold, this Chamber will in the end be suppressed) the other manages the revenues of the Province. These charges are given as an honourable retreat to persons who are grown old, in the more laborious employments.

Holland and Zealand, having but one Stadtholder or Governor, under the Houses of Burgundy and Austria, still continue to have but one common judicature, exercised by two courts of justice, common to both Provinces. The first consists of a President, eight Counsellors of Holland, and three of Zealand, with a Greffier, and six secretaries. The other called the High-council, (to which there is an appeal from the first in civil, though not in criminal cases) is composed of six Counsellors of Holland, and three of Zealand, a Greffier and substitute.

As the Provinces are governed by their States, so are the Cities by their senators. For example, the sovereign authority of Amsterdam resides in a Senate of thirty-six, who, (by a former resolution of the Burghers in a general assembly) chuse a new Senator when one happens to die. And this custom has prevailed in all the towns of the Province, though with some difference in the number of Senators. By the Senate are elected the four Burgomasters, of whom three are chosen every year, and one stays in office two years. The Burgomaster of the year before, presides the first three months, after which the other three preside by turns. Though this office is of great authority, the salary is but 500 guilders a year. The Eschevins (who are the court of justice, in every town) are also annually chosen by the Senate in this manner: The Senate names eighteen, out of which the Burgomasters chuse nine, for so many are there at Amsterdam. They are sovereign Judges in criminal causes, but in civil, above such a value, there lies an appeal to the Provincial Court of justice. In a sentence of death they advise with the Burgomasters, but are not bound to follow their advice. Under these magistrates, are the Treasurer of the city; the scout who seizes all criminals, and sees the sentences of justice executed; the Pensioner, who is a civil lawyer, versed in the customs, records and privileges of the town, of which he informs the magistracy upon occasion: He is a servant of the senate and Burgomasters, delivers their messages, and makes their publick harangues. Thus the Burgomasters and Eschevins may be likened to our Lord Mayor and Alderman, the Scout to the Sheriff, and the Pensioner to the Recorder. The Deputies to the Provincial States are chosen by the Senate, among whom one of the Burgomasters and the Pensioners are commonly sent.

As to the office of Stadtholder it must be observed, whilst the united Provinces were under the dominion of Spain, there was a Stadtholder or Lieutenant-General, over the seventeen Provinces with inferior Governors or Stadtholders, over particular Provinces. After the Revolt,

May 2.
1641. treaty of Munster. William II, son of Henry-Frederick (who had married the Princess Mary, eldest daughter of Charles I. King of England, and been invested with the survivorship of his father's dignities of Stadtholder and Captain-General), being disgusted at the resolution of Holland to dismiss great part of the army, suffered himself to be swayed by violent counsels, and under colour of a power from the States-General to preserve the Union, and oppose whatever might disturb it, not only imprisoned six Provincial States in the castle of Louvestein, but rashly marched an army against Amsterdam, in order to seize and change the magistrates of that city, by whom his measures were chiefly opposed. This design being discovered by the Hamburgh post, who happened to ride through the army in the night, the Prince's mortification at his disappointment was so great, that he retired to the Hague to his seat in the country, on pretence of taking the diversion of hunting, where being seized by a fever, which was followed by the small-pox, he died in the 25th year of his age. The Princess his wife was so struck with this unexpected accident, that in eight days after she was delivered of a son when she was but seven months gone with child. Nov. 4 1650.

This son was William-Henry third Prince of Orange of that name, and afterwards King of Great-Britain. The disadvantages under which he came into the world were so many and so great, that there was no possibility of foreseeing that he was born for the preservation of the liberties not only of Holland and England, but of all

Revolt, the supreme power which before resided in Philip II, as sovereign of the Netherlands, devolved upon the States-General, namely the power of making war and peace, raising money and the like, whilst the rights of the Governors or Stadtholders, seemed to have been preserved. For instance, William I, Prince of Orange, being at the time of the Revolt, Stadtholder of Holland and Zealand, under the Spaniards, had his power and authority confirmed to him by the States of those Provinces, now become sovereigns, and was also made Stadtholder-General, as well as Captain-General of the United Provinces after the Union of Utrecht. After his assassination, Prince Maurice, was chosen Stadtholder of Holland and Zealand, and after Leicester's return to England, was also made Stadtholder of Guelderland, Utrecht, and Overijssel, whilst his cousin Prince William-Lewis of Nassau-Deutz, was chosen Stadtholder of Friesland, and Groningen. The power and rights of the Stadtholder were, the command of the land and sea-forces as Captain-General and Admiral, the disposition of military posts, the pardon of penalties and crimes, the election of magistrates, upon the nomination of the towns, who presented three, and he chose one of them. But with all this he could neither raise nor disband forces, and for governors of frontier towns, he was to choose them out of persons nominated by the States. In a word, he could not take the field, form a camp or siege, without the express order of the States; when the Stadtholder or general of the union had any view which he thought to be advantageous to the republic, and which ought to be kept secret, he desired the States to appoint two or three persons to whom he imparted his design which being approved of, the States without knowing the particulars, made the necessary preparations and always sent with him three or four deputies, to represent the State and serve him for Counsellors. But as for the council of war he formed it as he pleased, and was master of the military discipline.

From the time of Prince Maurice and his brother Frederick-Henry, there were two Stadtholders and generals in the seven Provinces, the Princes of Orange of five, and the Counts of Nassau-Deutz of two, but the command in chief of the army belonged to the Princes of Orange.

The Stadtholder in the assemblies of the States-General or Provincial, could only give his opinion, not vote. He was arbitrator of differences between Provinces, a power founded upon an article of the union, which gave that right to the Stadtholders of the Provinces. They had a large patrimonial revenue in lands, lordships, &c. in the Provinces which enabled them to live with splendor and increased their authority, though in Holland, they were not masters of any town that sent deputies to the States. In Zealand, they had most power, where, of the seven votes of the Provincial States, they were masters of three; one as first noblemen, (the nobility being extinct in that Province, they had some person to represent them in the assemblies) the other two as Marquises of Vers and Flushing. But never was the authority of Stadtholder greater than under William III, Prince of Orange, and King of England.

The inhabitants of Holland, may be divided into No. 3. Vol. III.

Boers, or countrymen who cultivate the land, mariners, merchants or traders, who fill their towns, Renteers, or such as live in their cities upon estates formerly acquired, nobles and officers of the army. The Renteers have a liberal education, with a view chiefly to render them fit for the service of their country, for out of these the magistracy of their towns, their provinces, and their State is generally composed; being descended from families, who have many times been constantly magistrates in their native towns, for many years and some for several ages. Their estates consist in their salaries (which are small) rents of lands, or interest of money. The nobles in Holland are very few, most of the families having been extinguished in the long wars with Spain. Those that remain, are in a manner all employed in the military or civil charges of the Province or State. They value themselves more upon their nobility, than in countries where 'tis more common, and would not upon any consideration marry below their rank. The officers of the army live after the customs of the nobles, as do many of the sons of rich merchants, who returning from their travels pursue their pleasures more than the service of their country, or if they pretend to that, it is rather by the army than the state. All these are generally desirous to see a court, and wish for the re-establishment of a Stadtholder. Temp. Le Clerc.

From this account it appears the Republic of Holland, is rather an Oligarchy or Aristocracy, than a Democracy; for the Senates of the towns are filled up by themselves, the Provincial-States are chosen by the Senate, and the deputies to the States-General are elected by the Provincial. Thus the people have little or no share in the government. The case is much the same in all the seven Provinces.

About four years after the Union of Utrecht, Prince William was assassinated at Delft, July 10th, 1584. The murderer was one Balthazar Gerard, who in hopes of the reward, or of meriting Heaven by killing the Prince, had insinuated himself into his family, under the name of Francis Guyer, son to a martyr for the reformed religion. He had always the Huguenot Psalms in his hands, and was a constant frequenter of sermons, in order to conceal his designs. By this means he was trusted by the Prince and sent upon several dispatches. At the time of the murder, he was come for a passport to go where the Prince had ordered him, and finding a fit opportunity shot him with a pistol loaded with three balls, of which he instantly died, with these words in his mouth, "Lord have mercy on my soul, and the poor people." Thus died the founder of the Republic of the united Provinces, who (says Maurier) made more noise in Europe, than all the Kings of his time put together. Count Maurice his son erected for him at Delft, a marble monument, not inferior to the most stately tombs in Italy. His murderer who is ranked among the martyrs by the Catholics, suffered in the 27th year of his age his punishment with incredible constancy, his right arm, was burnt to the stump and the flesh of the muscular parts of his body torn off with hot-irons, without his expressing the least sign of pain. An instance of the strange effects of enthusiasm and superstition!

all Europe. His constitution, by reason of his untimely birth, was infirm. His private affairs were in a bad condition; too great jointures to his mother and grandmother, besides a large debt contracted by his father for the assistance of his brother-in-law King Charles II, then in exile with the rest of the royal family of England. As to his publick affairs, his condition was still worse. His father's late attempt upon Amsterdam had raised great jealousies of his family. A strong party, with the grand Pensionary de Wit at their head, was formed against him and the States of Holland, at the instigation of Cromwel, who dreaded the advancement of a Prince so nearly allied to the Stuarts, excluded him and his descendants from the dignities enjoyed by his ancestors; and afterwards, to bar him from all hopes of ever being Stadtholder, that office, by the perpetual edict, was entirely abolished, and the person chosen admiral or Captain-General was to renounce it by a solemn oath, though offered him by the Provinces themselves. The French King, mortal enemy of his family, seized the Principality of Orange, and demolished the strong citadel built by Prince Maurice at a great expence. Such were the disadvantages the young Prince had to struggle with, and which, contrary to all appearance, he lived to surmount. Tho' his education, among his other misfortunes, had been much neglected, the Governor imposed upon him, scarce affording him a tutor of any tolerable learning or knowledge of the world, yet he soon became master of those parts of mathematics which related to the military art; and learnt to speak English, French, and Higb-Dutch, almost as fluently as his own tongue. As he advanced in years, notwithstanding the strong opposition of the contrary party, his friends increased, and particularly among the Clergy and populace. The first turn in his favour was his being chosen chief Nobleman of Zealand, after which he was introduced into the Council of State. He paid a visit to his uncle King Charles II, in hopes of recovering the money which his father had supplied him with in his distress, and to see what offices the King would do towards his advancement to the Stadtholdership, but instead of receiving any satisfaction in these points, he only discovered the King's inclination to Popery (1). However, what his uncle would not assist him in, was obtained by his friends at home. It was proposed in so many places, that he should have the supreme command of the fleet and armies; that de Wit, who dreaded the name of Stadtholder, and had been author of the perpetual edict, was no longer able to oppose the torrent. And the Prince was declared Admiral and Captain-General, though by de Wit's management, it was done with such limitations as were not easy to digest. The hardest condition was, that he should bind himself by oath never to aspire to the office of Stadtholder, nor accept it even though it should be offered. But when the war broke out with France in conjunction with England, and the French like a flood over-ran the United Provinces, all these limitations quickly vanished, the oath was dispensed with, the perpetual edict revoked, de Wit and his brother torn in pieces by the mob, and the Prince restored to the dignity of Stadtholder with full power, for the time, of peace and war, and not long after the same dignity, from which he and his heirs had been excluded for ever, was made hereditary in his family, and settled upon him and his issue-male. This turn, however great, was no more than what he had deserved. He had made a stand against France, when his country was on the brink of destruction; and in less than two years, had entirely changed the face of affairs. He had not only retaken Narden, but boldly marched up the Rhine, and seized Bonne, by which means he had cut off the supplies sent down by the French to their garrisons on the Rhine and the Iffel, and opened a passage for the Germans into Flanders, which gave such a diversion to the progress of the French, that they abandoned the three provinces they were possessed of, in less time than they had conquered them. An alliance was also made with the Emperor, and a peace with the Elector of Cologne and the Bishop of Munster; after which a separate treaty was concluded with the King of England, whose mediation was accepted by France. But as that mediation was run out to a great length, the Prince, whose governing passion was the depression of France, attacked the whole French army, commanded by the Prince of Condé, and fought the famous battle of Senefte, wherein he justly gained the esteem of all the world, and of Condé in particular, for his conduct and courage (2). This change of the affairs of the States had acquired the Prince of Orange,

(1) The King (says Burnet) gave him good words only, and tried him in point of religion. "He spoke of all the Protestants, as of a factious body broken among themselves, ever since they had broken off from the main body, and wished the Prince would take more pains, and look into those things better, and not be led by his Dutch blockheads." The Prince told this to Zwylfstein, his natural uncle, but never spoke of it to any other person till after the King's death, though he carried it always in his own mind, and could not hinder himself from judging of all the King's intentions after that, from the discovery he had then made of his sentiments. Nor did he, upon his not complying with that proposition, expect any real assistance from the King, but general intercessions, which signified nothing, and which indeed was all he obtained. The Prince was about twenty at the time of this visit.

(2) Condé's testimony of the Prince was, that he had acted like an old Captain in all, but only in venturing himself too much like a young man. For which very thing that old General himself was remarkable in that day's action. In the beginning of the battle the French had the advantage; but Condé pushed it too far, and the Prince of Orange engaged the whole army with so much bravery, that it appeared, the Dutch army was now brought to another state than he had found it in. He charged himself in so many places with too great a neglect of his person, considering how much depended upon it. He was once engaged among a body of French, thinking them his own men, and bid them charge: They told him they had no more powder. He, perceiving his mistake, with great presence of mind, got out of their hands, and brought up a body of his army to charge them, who quickly routed them. The action in the afternoon recovered the loss that was made in the morning, and possessed every one, with a high esteem of the Prince of Orange. The Emperor's General Zouch, behaved so ill, that the Prince told his son at night, that his father had acted so basely, that, if it had not been for the respect he bore the Emperor, he would have shot him through the head. By this and some other accidents, the battle was not decisive, the losses being nearly equal, between six and seven thousand on each side.

Orange, the affections of the people, to such a degree, that he could have obtained whatever he desired, and even the loss of so important a place as Maastricht, was not at all charged to him (1). Indeed, it appears in the whole course of this war, that the Prince of Orange, even while so young and so little practised in affairs, had so clear and so just a view of them, that nothing could misguide him, and that the bad prospect he had from the ill condition of affairs, did not frighten him to accept of any mean or base conditions of peace. His fidelity to his country and the publick interest, was so firm that no private consideration of his own could bias him, or indeed be much considered by him (2).

During the negotiations of Nimeguen, under the mediation of England, the Prince came over and by the management of the Earl of Danby, and Sir William Temple, his marriage with the Princess Mary, eldest daughter of his uncle the Duke of York, was concluded to the universal satisfaction of the Protestant party, both at home and abroad; but to the great surprize and concern of the French King, who declared the Duke had given his daughter to the "greatest enemy he had in the world." (3) From this time the Prince of Orange, was looked upon as the head of the Protestant interest in Europe, and the greatest check to the overgrowing power of France, which he desired to see well bounded, but not destroyed. Having married the presumptive heir to the Crown of England, the eyes of the English were continually upon his proceedings, as were his upon their affairs, and upon the various steps of his two royal uncles. Tho' little application was made to him, during the rest of King Charles's reign, yet he found that neither he nor his Princess, were forgot by the Parliament, in the great struggle about the exclusion of the Duke of York, his father-in-law; upon whose death it was intended, that they should fill the Throne.

Though neither this marriage, nor any other motive could prevail with the Prince to abandon the allies, and make a separate peace with France; yet at length the French found means to accomplish their ends. They suddenly attacked the Spanish Netherlands, and taking Ghent and Ypres, struck such a terror into the Dutch, that the States resolved on a peace at any rate, and the treaty at Nimeguen, after several years negotiations, was at last finished, according to the terms prescribed by France; though strongly protested against by Denmark, Brandenburg and Munster (4). This was followed by a treaty between France and Spain, and another between the Emperor and France, and thus the peace became general, though not at all agreeable to the Prince of Orange's plan, who had all along insisted upon the enlargement of a Frontier on both sides of Flanders; without which, France, he affirmed, would end this war only with a prospect of beginning another with greater advantage, after breaking the present confederacy. What the Prince foretold was soon verified. For the French quickly began their incroachments, and claimed whole Provinces, by way of dependencies upon their new conquests, granted them by the late treaty

(1) After the battle of Senefz, the Prince in two enterprises was unsuccessful. He besieged Maastricht, the only town of the Dutch Provinces, then remaining in the hands of the French, but after two months endeavours to take it, Schemberg, (who in the mean time had besieged and taken Aire) marched an army through the heart of the Spanish Netherlands, and unexpectedly came to the relief of the town. At his approach, the Prince, whose army was weakened by sickness and duty, was forced to retire. For this, it is said, he never heartily forgave Schemberg, though he made use of his councils and experience afterwards in the expedition into England, and the reduction of Ireland. At the battle of Montcastle against the Duke of Orleans, reinforced by Luxemburg, after a sharp dispute, the first regiment of Dutch Infantry began to break. The Prince, rallied them several times, but at last was born down by the flight of his men, whom he was forced to resist like enemies. He fell in among them with sword in hand, and cutting the first cross the face, cried aloud, "Rascal! I'll set a mark on thee at least, that I may hang thee afterwards." The Prince was carried by the torrent of the run-aways, to the rest of his troops, which yet made a stand; and with these he made a retreat that came little short of a victory. He also offered battle to the King of France when before Bouchain, which was refused.

(2) Of this there are many instances. When, to allure him to a dependence on France and England, all the offers were made him, that could be of honour and advantage to his person and family, (particularly the proposal of making him Sovereign of the united Provinces, under the protection of England and France, at a time too, when so little of the Provinces was left, and what remained in so imminent danger) he always answered with great firmness, "He would never betray a trust reposed in him, nor ever sell the liberty of that country, which his ancestors had so long defended." And when the Duke of Buckingham pressed him much on the same head, and often said to him; "Do not you see your Country is lost?" He replied,

"I do see indeed it is in great danger; but there is a sure way never to see it lost, and that is, to die in the last ditch." Temple's Memoirs. Burnet.

(3) Letters were sent to the King of France, from the King, the Duke, and also from the Prince; who had no mind to this piece of courtship, but was obliged to it by his uncle. The King assured Lewis, that he had made the match on design to engage the Prince, to be more tractable in the treaty, that was now on foot at Nimeguen. Montague, the English Ambassador being called over soon after this for new instructions, Danby asked him, "how the King of France, received the news of the marriage?" He answered, "as he would have done the loss of an army, and spoke very hardly of the Duke, for not acquainting him with it." Danby answered, "he wronged him, for he did not know it an hour before it was published, and the King himself, not above two hours." This was a master-piece in the Earl of Danby, who since he was Duke of Leeds, has declared in print "that he will not suffer that part of his service to be buried in oblivion." For this the Duke never forgave him. It must be observed, that notwithstanding all this, Sir William Temple, makes himself the sole agent in the success of this affair, though according to the account, which the Duke of Montague told Bishop Burnet, Sir William Temple was not present, when the King was persuaded to consent to it, when the Duke was sent for by the King, when the Prince came to them and the Lord Treasurer, and when the Princess was given to him. What makes this the more probable, is, that Montague, was known to be no friend to the Lord Danby, and yet does this justice to him. See Burnet, I. p. 409.

(4) After the orders for signing the treaty were sent, the Prince of Orange, by whom the peace was by no means approved, marched and attacked the Duke of Luxemburg, before Mons; and notwithstanding his advantageous situation, beat him from several posts. This action happened four days after the treaty was signed, but the Prince having no intimation of it, nor orders to stop

The Prince of Orange, ever ready to assert the liberties of Europe, came forth from his retirement where he had lived since the conclusion of the peace, and projected an alliance against France. Accordingly the league of Austria was formed, wherein were engaged the Emperor, Sweden, the States of Holland, Circle of Francia, and some of the Imperial Cities. But the French, after the taking of Luxemburg, (which the Prince of Orange, with a small army in vain endeavoured to relieve) having obtained their ends, proposed a truce for twenty years; which was agreed upon by a treaty signed at the Hague.

Of France

The King of France now at peace with all his neighbours, and in strict alliance with King James, (who had succeeded his brother King Charles II.) resolved to extirpate the Reformed Religion in his dominions. He began with letting loose his dragons, to live upon the Huguenots at discretion. They were under no restraint, but from rapes and murder. This was followed by the revocation of the edict of Nantes, which proscribed two millions of reformed, and drove above two hundred thousand into foreign countries, for refuge, leaving those that remained to the mercy of an enraged clergy, to the barbarity of the intendants, and other officers (who on this occasion seemed to have thrown off the common impressions of humanity) and to the cruelty of the dragons. The Principality of Orange, (then in possession of the Prince of Orange, by the treaty of Nimeguen) was not only dragooned but out of enmity to the owner, seized by the King of France, and united to the rest of Provence; and all its rights, as a distinct principality were suppressed. Whilst Heresy was thus extirpating at home, the French King declares war against the Pope, seizes Avignon, and sends Lavardin to Rome, to brave his holiness at his see. The Regale (2) gave the first rise to this quarrel, the Franchises (3) inflamed it, and the Pope's inclination for the Emperor carried his most Christian Majesty's indignation, to extremity. By being thus employed, the King of France except in the affair of Orange, had not yet openly, violated the peace of Nimeguen, or the twenty years truce. But at length he pulls off the mask and whilst the Emperor relying on the late truce, was carrying on his wars in Hungary, privately assists Tekely and his party with money, and by his agents encourages the Grand Seigneur to continue the war, with the promise of a powerful diversion. This diversion was accordingly made by the sudden irruption of the French into Germany. Philipsburg, Spires and Worms were taken, and these conquests were followed by those of Frankendal and Manheim, and with the desolation of the Palatinate. They drained, plundered, destroyed several cities of the Empire, burnt the palaces of the Princes, pillaged the Churches and stop, thought he might take all advantages; as wishing rather than fearing, to embroil matters. But the French were so tired of the war, that no notice was taken of this business, which an officer in the French army, esteemed "the only heroic action that had been done" in the whole course of the war. The Prince having the next day, received an account of the peace, communicated the same to Luxemburg, who desired an interview with the Prince; which being agreed to, they met in the field at the head of their chief officers. Many civilities passed, and there was great curiosity in the French, to see a young Prince, who had made such a noise in the world, and who the day before, had given life and vigour to so desperate an action as this battle of St. Dennis, was universally deemed. It was believed by many, that the Marquis de Grana, the Spanish General intercepted the packets from Nimeguen, till the action was over; for Spain did not like the peace. During the battle, as the Prince was engaged among the thickest of the enemies, a French Captain was just going to fire a pistol at him, when M. D'Auverquerque, interposed and shot the Frenchman dead. The Earl of Offory signalized himself in this battle, with the English and Scots under his command.

(1) It was pretended that in time of old, Alstia, Lorain, the counties of Chiny, Arlon, Vierzon, St. Armand, all Luxemburg (except the city of that name) divers villages and seignories in Germany, Flanders, Brabant, Haguenau and the country of Liege, did of just right belong to the King of France, as dependencies upon the Bishopsricks of Metz, Toul and Verdun, or upon the places yielded to him by the treaty of Nimeguen. In pursuance whereof, were erected in France, two tribunals of justice, one at Metz, and the other at Bri-fac, by the names of the Chambers of Re-Union, where the inhabitants and Lords of all the forementioned places were cited to appear, and make their submission to the King of France, and in case of refusal were condemned for contumacy. Under such pretensions it was, that Strasbourg was seized and Luxemburg besieged, because the Spaniards would not yield up several places in Flanders, which were thus claimed. The King of Spain, upon this occasion, proclaimed war against France; but as the Prince of Orange could not prevail with the States to give him timely assistance, he was forced to submit.

(2) The Regale is a right, which the King of France has to enjoy the revenues of Bishopsricks and Archbishopsricks, and vacant sees; till the Bishop and Archbishop, has taken the oath of fidelity to the King, and the oath be registred in the Chamber of accounts at Paris. The King also during the vacancy of a See, nominates to all the Prebendaries and other dignities, and to whatever benefices are in the gift of the Bishops and Archbishops, except cures of parishes.

(3) In Rome, all those of a nation put themselves under the protection of the Ambassador, and were usually lodged in his neighbourhood; pretending that they belonged to him. So they exempted themselves from the orders and justice of Rome, as part of the Ambassador's family. The extent of houses or streets in which they lodged was called the Franchises, which were become so great a part of the city, that the privileges of those, that lived in them, were daily giving disturbances to the course of justice, and were the common sanctuaries of criminals. The Pope resolved to reduce the privileges of Ambassadors, to their own families within their own palaces. He began with the Emperor's and the King of Spain's Ambassadors, who quitted their pretensions to the Franchises, provided the French did the same. So the Pope said, as his Nuntio at Paris, had no privilege but for his family, he was resolved the French should have no more at Rome. This was rejected by the French, with great scorn; and the quarrel rose so high, that France and Rome, seemed to be in a state of war. Lavardin was sent Ambassador to Rome, and the Pope refusing to see him unless he would renounce the Franchises, he entered Rome in a hostile manner with some troops of horse, tho' not in the form of troops, kept guard in the Franchises, and affronted the Pope's authority on all occasions. The Pope in revenge, not only refused to confirm the election of a coadjutor to Cologny, by which means it became void by the death of the Elector; but afterwards he got Prince Clement's election to Cologny, judged in his favour, against Cardinal Furstenberg set up by France. Thus by affronting the Pope the French King's design which he had been long pursuing was defeated, otherwise the expedition to England would not have been so safe for Holland, nor could it have been proposed easily to the States.

(1) The

Emperor's letter to King James. and committed a thousand instances of an inhumanity more than barbarian. A manifesto was published by France against the Emperor, which by all who had considered the rights of peace and laws of war, was looked upon as one of the most avowed and solemn declarations, that ever was made of the perfidioufness of the French King, who seemed plainly to intimate, that he thought himself tied by no peace, but might, upon any suspicion of his neighbours, begin a war when he pleased. Hence may be dated the beginning of the great war, which lasted till the peace of Ryfwick.

To this height of power and infolence was the French Monarchy grown, and Lewis le Grand (1) seemed as it were resolved to give law to all Europe. He had usurped an absolute power over the estates, persons, and consciences of his subjects, and had a mind to extend it also over his neighbours and enemies. And indeed, what but the Revolution in England could possibly have stopped the progress of his designs, supported as he was by his alliance with England. Whether this invasion of Germany, in open violation of the treaty of Nimeguen, was to break the measures of the Prince of Orange, and hinder his expedition into England, or to perform his promise to the Turk, or to oblige the empire and especially the Emperor to convert the twenty years truce into a treaty of peace, which might hinder Germany from leaguings with Holland, and the Prince of Orange, or whatever other design the French King might have, it served only to render him more odious to the Empire and hasten the alliance against him; and was so far from retarding, that it promoted, the Prince of Orange's expedition. Since by marching his troops towards the upper Rhine, the French King had made it impracticable to transport an army into England, or to send a sufficient force into Cologne, to alarm the Dutch. It is true, he never imagined, that an expedition which seemed almost desperate, could have succeeded in so sudden and surprizing a manner. He expected, and in all appearance very justly, that King James would have been able to make a great division in the nation, and that the Kingdom would have been deeply involved in a civil war. And therefore, he was the less concerned that his offer of troops was refused by King James, and the more easily induced to prosecute his designs that winter in Germany, not at all doubting but he should come in good time, the next summer to King James's assistance who would then, he thought, be forced to receive aid from France on any terms. But to his great disappointment as well as mortification, he saw the Revolution completed, without any effusion of blood, and a Prince advanced to the throne of England, that was resolutely bent to check, to the utmost of his power, the progress of his ambitious designs.

State of Spain.

In proportion as France grew every day more powerful, Spain on the contrary, daily declined; and under the reign of an infirm King seemed like him, to be without strength or life. The council of Madrid, used their utmost endeavours to support the sinking state, but when the head is dying, the rest of the members strive in vain to uphold the body. It was to no purpose, that able ministers were employed in foreign Courts, and able Governors in the Provinces; France had always the ascendant. The Marquisses of Grana and Castanaga, successive governors of the Spanish Netherlands, were good generals, as well as good Politicians. They had their agents at King James's court, and themselves negotiated in Flanders, with all possible zeal and capacity. Ron-Fauquier, his Catholick Majesty's ambassador at London, who is said to know the English genius and constitution, strenuously backed their endeavours and used all possible arguments to draw off King James from France; and, if that King's historian, is to be credited, he went so far, as to offer to assist him, in obliging the Parliament to approve of his measures, provided he would but accede to the league of Austria, which shows at least, the sincere desire of Spain, to engage him to break with the French King. But as troops were wanted and there was no money to raise new levies, or to pay those already on foot, France, well acquainted with the wants and weakness of Spain, and secure of England, during the reign of James II, was preparing in concert with him for the invasion of Holland, and the Spanish Netherlands. Nothing therefore could happen more fortunately for Spain, than the Revolution in England; without which in all appearance the loss of the Netherlands, would have been unavoidable.

The united Provinces saw with terror the progress of the French arms, and their encroachments on the Netherlands, since the conclusion of the Peace of Nimeguen. They were greatly alarmed when they found that the taking of Luxembourg, by the French King was connived at by King James, but when they discovered the private alliance between the two monarchs, they plainly perceived their destruction was inevitable, unless timely prevented. Wherefore, as soon as their Stadtholder had secured the Elector of Brandenburg in his interest and concerted measures with Cologne, Hesse and Luxembourg, for a supply of troops if required, in the room of those he should take with him, they readily furnished an army and fleet for an expedition, on the success whereof, their safety so visibly depended, and which, however dangerous it appeared, was the only means to save them from ruin. So great reason had the united Provinces to rejoice at a Revolution which freed them from such dreadful apprehensions, and would be a strong bulwark for the future against the common enemy of Europe.

King William, was thirty eight years of age, Abstract of King William's reign to the peace of Rylwick. when the Revolution took place, seventeen of which had been spent in a constant opposition of the pernicious scheme, (formed by Richlieu and pursued by Mazarine) of making France the seat of universal empire, and of enslaving all Europe. Lewis le Grand, had made such a progress in this scheme, that it would probably have succeeded had it not been for the great checks it received from King William, whilst Prince of Orange. As that Prince had made the humbling of France, the

the great business of his life before the Revolution, so after his advancement to the British Throne, we shall see him still vigorously prosecuting the same design, in a thorough belief that it was the sole means of preserving the Protestant Religion, and the liberties of Christendom. But first we shall see him earnestly endeavouring to finish and complete the new settlement in church and state in the best manner he could, amidst the opposition of those who thro' principle, prejudice, party, or disappointment clogged all his measures. We shall see him pursue the abdicated King into Ireland, and oblige him to retire once more into France, and that Kingdom to return to the obedience of the Crown of England. We shall see him escape from the plots and conspiracies of his enemies at home, and abroad. We shall see him declared Generalissimo of the confederate armies, exposing himself to great perils, in voyages and battles; and crossing the seas whenever his presence was necessary at the head of the armies, or at the publick assemblies in Holland, and Germany. We shall see him exerting all his courage and strength, to humble the pride of France, under the greatest difficulties. Spain quite exhausted will assist him but feebly, whilst the forces of Holland, are employed in defence of the Spanish Netherlands. The Emperor attacked by the Turks, and the Hungarian malecontents will send but weak armies on the Rhine, and the Princes of the Empire, will be either so slow, or so disjointed, that their assistance will be inconsiderable. We shall see King William by his ability, constancy and resolution, surmount all these difficulties, and make head against an enemy superior to him in the number of his troops, and more so, in the union of his Generals; till Lewis, apprehensive of being obstructed in his grand, tho' as yet secret design upon Spain, gladly consents to a peace, concluded at Ryswick in 1697. These in general are the events of the first nine years of King William's reign; throughout which his moderation and clemency, his wisdom and valour, were equally conspicuous. And what is very uncommon, he brought with all his virtues, not one vice to the throne (1). He was addicted neither to wine, nor women; nor did religion or pride, make any part of his character. It is true, he had some failings which were an alloy to his virtues. He was so intent upon the war, and the humbling of France, which he thought absolutely necessary for the safety of Europe, that he was not so careful of his government as he should have been. The disgust this raised, being improved by men of ill designs, so perplexed his affairs, that he could hardly support himself at home; whilst he was the admiration of all abroad. He was also so reserved and silent a temper, (which had been heightened by his education, when all his words and actions were narrowly watched,) that it made him averse to talking and company, and very hard of access. This was by no means agreeable to the English nation, and therefore many endeavoured to persuade him to be more visible, open and communicative. He seemed resolved to follow their advice, but his ill state of health, increased by his long stay at St. James's, without his usual exercise of hunting, of which he was very fond, made him give way to his natural disposition; and he became rather more retired and less accessible than before. In a few days after he was placed on the throne, he went to Hampton-Court, from whence he came to town only on Council-days. So that the face, gaiety and diversions of a court disappeared, which gave great discontent. The Queen, who was affable and lively, endeavoured by a great vivacity and cheerfulness to supply what was wanting in the King, but when she was found not to meddle in business, though all were pleased with her, yet few came to make their court to her, as but few found their account in it.

King William's first care after his advancement to the throne, was to settle a Privy-Council (2), and appoint a ministry. The Earl of Danby, created Marquis of Carmarthen, was made president of the council. He had, by his accomplishing the King's marriage with the Queen, and heartily concurring in the Revolution from the very beginning, atoned in some measure for his proceedings under Charles II. He is said to have pulsed for the Treasurer's staff, a post he had formerly enjoyed, but was refused by the King, who was resolved the Treasury should be in the hands of Commissioners (3). What this vice was, he has left the world to guess, by which means, the worst sort of vice is, at least by his enemies, fixed upon him, though in express contradiction to the religious character given of him by the same Bishop after his death, and which the reader may see at the end of his reign.

(2) The names of the Privy-councillors were as follows; his Royal Highness George Prince of Denmark, William Sancroft, Archbishop of Canterbury, Henry Compton Bishop of London, Henry Duke of Norfolk, Charles Marquis of Winchester, George Marquis of Halifax, Thomas Earl of Danby, Robert Earl of Limbury, Aubrey Earl of Oxford, Charles Earl of Shrewsbury, Charles Earl of Dorset and Middlesex, William Earl of Bedford, John Earl of Bath, Charles Earl of Macclesfield, Daniel Earl of Nottingham, Thomas Viscount Falkenberg, Charles Viscount Mordaunt, Francis Viscount Newport, Richard Viscount Lunley, Philip Lord Wharton, Ralph Lord Montagu, Henry Lord Delamere, John Lord Churchill, Mr. Bentinck, Mr. Henry Sidney, Sir Robert Howard, Knt. Sir Henry Capel, Knt. Mr. Henry Poulter, Mr. Edward Russell, Mr. Hugh Boyle, and Mr. Richard Hampden, to whom were added on the twentieth of February, Thomas Wharton, Esq; and Sir John Lowther, of Lowther Bart.

See in Burnet, l. ii. c. 5, that he certainly had been in hopes of being advanced to the office of Lord Treasurer; but being disappointed in this, he was obliged to take up with the post of President of the Council, which was of great honour and credit, though very small profit. However, his Lordship had not been above a fortnight in his post, "before I found him," (says Sir John) "extremely cooled with regard to affairs, as then managed. He said, that being embarked with his all, he was sorry to see things no better conducted: That Ireland was in a manner become invincible, by our neglect of sending forces thither before now. That with regard to this, and other material points, equally unheeded, he had been pressing the King to a degree even of incivility. That he had told his Majesty, he plainly saw, he did all he could to encourage the Presbyterians, and to dishearten the Church, which could not but be absolutely prejudicial both to himself and the government; though he, at the same time, observed, that his Majesty interfered but little in councils, being prevented therefrom, partly by inclination, and partly by want of health. Indeed was given to Lord Halifax, who for zealously promoting all the steps that were lately made for the King, was hated by the Tories, and for his opposition to the Bill of Exclusion, was not beloved by the Whigs. The affair of surrendering up the Charters, and the remissions in relieving of Ireland, were also charged on him. He had for some time great credit with the King, but Lord Carmarthen not being able to bear the equality, or rather preference that seemed to be given him, brought on a storm that quickly fell on him. The Earl of Devonshire was made Lord Steward of the Household, and the Earl of Dorset, Lord Chamberlain. As they were both Whigs, the Household was made up of such, except where there were buyers for places, which were set to sale. And though the King seemed to discourage such practices, yet he did not encourage proposals for detecting them. Mr. Bentinck, afterwards Earl of Portland, was made Groom of the Stole and Privy Purse. He continued for ten years, to be entirely trusted by the King, and served him with great fidelity and obsequiousness, but could never bring himself to be acceptable to the English nation (1). Mr. Sidney, made first Lord Sidney, and then Earl of Runney, was made one of the Gentlemen of the King's Bed-chamber, and afterwards Secretary of State, Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, and in other great posts. The King's chief personal favour lay between Bentinck and him. He was brother to the Earl of Leicester, and to Alegernon Sidney, beheaded by King James. He was the man who had the secret of all the correspondence, that was before the Revolution, between the Prince of Orange and his party in England, and the conduct of that whole affair was by the Prince's own order, chiefly deposited in his hands. He was a graceful man, and had lived long at court, where he had some adventures that became very publick. He was a person of a sweet and caressing temper, had no malice in his heart, but too great a love of pleasure. He had been sent envoy to Holland in the year 1679. where he entered into such particular confidences with the Prince, that he had the highest measure of his trust and favour, that any English man ever had. Marshal Schomberg was made master of the Ordnance. He had been of great service to the King in his expedition into England, and the King had been very earnestly pressed to bring him over with him, both because of the great reputation he was in, and because it was thought to be a security for the King's person, and to the whole design, to have another General with him, to whom all would submit in case of any accident (2).

"the King looked but ill, and the difficulty he laboured under in swallowing, seemed to foretel him a man of short continuance in the world. His Lordship further told me, that he had been appointed President of the Council quite against his will, after the King had declared he could not give him the staff of Treasurer, determined, as he was, that the Treasury should be in the hands of Commissioners. That he had been offered to be Secretary of State and President both at the same time; and that he had declined the first. That all he asked of the King for himself was a patent, to which he had a right by a former grant; and that he would also be pleased to gratify some Gentlemen, who had, upon the revolution, joined him in the North. In fine, that the King had told him, it would be by no means for his interest to be out of all business; and that he had, in a manner, forced the Presidentship upon him. His Lordship expressed himself doubtful of the continuance of affairs, as they now stood; and informed me, that King James had sent down to him into the North, offering to throw himself into his hands before he went away. To this, he said, his answer was, by Charles Bertie, who brought the message, that his own force, which he depended upon in the North, was not sufficient to trust to; but that if his Majesty would bring a consideration to party with him, and come without his Papists, he would sooner lose his life than he should suffer the least injury. But that the King having no mind to part with his Romans, would not come. His Lordship then said, that if the King would but quit his Papists, it might possibly not be too late yet for him. He then observed, that the Duke of Gordon, a Papist, and Governor of Edinburgh castle, the only magazine in Scotland, who was lately ready and willing to surrender it to any body, now held it out obstinately for King James; and that the discontents in England grew greater daily and greater. He then reflected on Lord Halifax, the King, and all about him, as most strangely insatuated with notions of their own security; and particularly animadverted on the last mentioned Lord, for insinuating with such violence in a speech of his, that the Prince should be intitled legal and rightful King of this realm, (which, I suppose, the Lord Halifax did with a view of continuing the old oaths of allegiance and supremacy, and to obviate all scruple about taking the new,) saying, it was mere nonsense; for that "had the Prince of Wales been made King, he could never have been deemed our lawful Sovereign, while his father lived.—But his Lordship nevertheless appeared very serious and urgent about the legality of taking the new oaths, and condemned the Bishops for their squeamishness in that respect, though they themselves had so large a hand in bringing about this great and extraordinary change; and thereupon quoted Lord Nottingham's speech, who, in the House of Lords, had observed, that though he had never in the least consented to this Revolution, but had with all his might opposed the Prince's accession, as contrary to law; yet since his Highness was here, and we must owe our protection to him as King de facto, he thought it but just and legal to swear allegiance to him. I have been the more exact in the particulars of this conversation, to give the better insight into the thoughts of the greatest men upon this occasion; though I wondered his Lordship would venture to be so very undisguised with me; but he was sure I would not betray him, though even to Lord Halifax." See memoirs of Sir John Reresby, last Governor of York, containing several remarkable transactions from the Restoration to the Revolution, p. 321, &c.

(1) The King's affection to Mr. Bentinck, may be dated from the time of his having the small pox, in 1675. Bentinck then Gentleman of his Bed-chamber, though he had never had that distemper, attended his master during the whole course of his illness, both night and day, for sixteen days. After which having leave to go home he immediately fell sick of the small pox and was in great danger of his life.

(2) The rest of the Household were Lord Viscount Newport, Treasurer of the Household, Mr. Wharton, Comptroller of the Household, Sir John Lowther, Vice-Chamberlain of the Household, Monsieur D' Auverquerque Master of the Horse, the Lord Montagu, Master of the Great Wardrobe; Monsieur Zwylstein, Master of the Robes; the Bishop of London, Dean of the Chapel; the Lord Lowclate, Captain of the Gentlemen Pensioners; the Duke of Ormond, the Earl of Oxford, the Lords Mordaunt, Lunley and Churchill, Gentlemen of the King's Bed-chamber; the Earl of Wiltshire son to the Marquis of Winchester, Lord Chamberlain to the Queen; John Howe Esq. Vice-Chamberlain; Mr. Villiers, Great Master of the Horse, and the Countess of Dayby, sister to the Duke of Ormond, first Lady of the Bed-chamber, and Groom of the Stole to her Majesty.

(1) He

The Earl of Shrewsbury, and Nottingham made Secretaries of State.

The Earl of Shrewsbury was declared Secretary of State, and had the greatest share of the King's confidence. He had been educated a Papist, but had renounced that Religion upon a very critical and anxious inquiry into matters of controversy. Some thought, that though he had forsaken popery, he was too sceptical, and too little fixed in the principles of Religion. However, he seemed to be a man of great probity, and to have a high sense of honour. He had no ordinary measure of learning, a correct judgment, with a sweetness of temper, that charmed all who knew him. He had so great a command of himself, that during all the time he continued in the ministry, no person was heard to complain of him, except for his silent and reserved answers, with which his friends were not always well pleased. His modest deportment gave him such an interest in the King, that he never seemed so fond of any of his ministers, as he was of him. His method was only to lay in general the state of affairs before his Majesty, without pressing too much.

It was for some time under consideration, who should be the other Secretary; at last the Earl of Nottingham, was pitched upon for that post. He had stood at a great distance from the court all King James's reign, and though a Privy-counsellor, never went to the board. When the Prince of Orange's coming over was proposed to him, he first agreed to it, but afterwards refused to proceed any farther. However he declared, that though his principles restrained him, so that he could not go on, his affection would make him wish well to the cause, and would be so far a criminal as concealment could make him. Accordingly he opposed the settlement with great earnestness; but always said, that though he would not make a King, yet, upon his principles, he could obey him when made, better than those, who were so much for making one. The Tories apprehended, that the opposition, which they had given to the King's advancement, and the Zeal, that the Whigs had shewn for it, would alienate him from them, and throw him into the other hands, from whom they could expect no favour, but severe returns for the hardships they had put on the Whigs, the latter end of King Charles II's reign. These apprehensions grew daily amongst that party, and made them begin to look back towards King James. It was therefore thought advisable, in order to avoid exasperating so large a body, to employ the Earl of Nottingham. The great increase of business in chancery having led many to apprehend, that it was too much to be trusted with one person, it was resolved to put that court into commission, and the Earl was proposed to be the first in the commission, but he refused it, and accepted of the place of Secretary of State. This gave as much satisfaction to the Tories, as it begot distrust in the Whigs. The Tories hoped for protection and favour by his means; they reckoned, that he would infuse all the prerogative notions into the King, and give him such a jealousy of every step, that the Whigs should make in their prejudice, that from thence his Majesty would see cause to suspect all the shew of kindness, that they might put on towards him, when at the same time they were undermining some of those Prerogatives, for which the Earl seemed to be so zealous. This had a great effect on the King, who being ignorant of the constitution, and naturally cautious, saw reason enough to dislike the heat he found among those, who expressed much zeal for him, but who appeared, at the same time, to have it with a great mixture of republican principles. They on the other hand, were much offended at the employing the Earl; "and he gave them daily cause to be more displeased at it; for he set himself with a most eager partiality against the whole party, and against all the motions made by them; and he studied to possess the King with a very bad opinion of them. And whereas Secretaries of State have a particular allowance for such spies, as they employ to procure intelligence, how exact soever he might be in procuring foreign intelligence, he spared no cost nor pains to have an account of all that passed in the city and in other angry cabals; and he furnished the King very copiously that way, which made a deep impression on him, and had very bad effects."

The Marquis of Halifax having also refused the offer made to the Earl of Nottingham, with respect to the Chancery, Sir John Maynard was made first Commissioner, and Anthony Keck and William Rawlinson were knighted, and joined with him.

The Treasury being also put in commission, Lord Mordaunt, afterwards Earl of Monmouth, was made first Commissioner. He was the first of all the English Nobility that came over to see the King when Prince of Orange. He was a man of much heat, many notions, and full of discourse. He was brave and generous, but had not true judgment. His thoughts were indigested, and his secrets were soon known. Lord De la Mere, afterwards Earl of Warrington, was Chancellor of the Exchequer. The Lord Godolphin (1) was likewise brought into the Treasury, to the great grief of the other two, who soon saw that the King considered him more than them both. For as he understood Treasury-business well, so his calm and cold way suited the King's temper. Mr. Richard Hampden and Sir Henry Capel were the other Commissioners. The Earls of Monmouth and Warrington, though both staunch Whigs, became great enemies. Monmouth generously gave the inferior places, but fought out men of republican principles: and

(1) He was a younger brother of an antient family in Cornwall, that had been bred about King Charles II. from a page, and was considered at the time that the Earl of Sunderland, Lord Hyde, and he managed affairs, as one of the ablest men belonging to the court. He was the most silent and modest man that was perhaps ever bred in a court. He had a clear apprehension, and dispatched business with great method, and with too much temper, that he had no personal enemies. He loved gaming beyond what men of business usually do, and gave one reason for it, because it delivered him from much talking. He had true principles of religion and virtue, and was free from all vanity, and never heaped up wealth. He had much of the confidence of four succeeding Kings. He was Secretary of State in 1684, which he quitted, and was made a Baron the same year. He was concerned in the scheme laid at Lady Portsmouth's, by Barillon and Lord Sunderland; and was sent by King James to the Prince of Orange at Hungerford.

(1) The

and Warrington is said to sell every thing that was in his power (1).

And also the Admiralty.
The Admiralty was also committed to the care of Commissioners; and Admiral Herbert, afterwards Earl of Torrington, was first in the Commission. He was brother to Chief Justice Herbert. Being pressed by King James, to vote for the repeal of the Test, he absolutely refused, and chose rather than comply, to lose places to the value of four thousand a year; though his circumstances were very indifferent (2). He was a man of great pride, as well as great humour, and set a high value on himself, and expected the same from others. With all this, he had a good understanding, and a great reputation for his conduct in sea affairs. He quitted King James and went over to Holland, and was made Lieutenant General Admiral of the Dutch Fleet, that brought over the King. There were six other Commissioners named with him (3).

The Judges chosen. Burnet. Boyer.
Nothing gave a more general satisfaction than the naming of the Judges, the King ordered every Privy-Counsellor to bring a list of twelve, and out of these, were chosen twelve very learned and worthy Judges. This nomination was generally well received over the nation. The first of these was Sir John Holt, made Lord Chief Justice of England, then a young man for so high a post, who maintained it during his whole life, with a high reputation for capacity, integrity, courage and great dispatch. So that since Sir Matthew Hale's time, the King's Bench has not been so well filled as it was by him (4).

Dr. Burnet made Bishop of Salisbury. Boyer.
All these employments were disposed of at several times within the space of two months. And as Dr. Burnet had been one of the chief Promoters of the Revolution, so he was the first Ecclesiastic, who reaped the fruits of it, having been elected Bishop of Sarum, pursuant to his Majesty's Conge D'Elire, on the ninth of March, and consecrated on the thirty first of the same month at Fulham, by the Bishops of London, Winchester, Lincoln, Landaffe, St. Asaph, and Carlisle, by virtue of a Commission from the Archbishop of Canterbury, who refused to perform the Ceremony himself; and three days after the new Bishop was sworn and admitted Chancellor of the order of the Garter (5).

In this manner were settled the Court, the Council and the Ministry. As they chiefly consisted of Whigs, the Tories could not but be disgusted as well as some others who had expected a share in the promotions. These last, improving the disaffection and prejudices of the others, a faction was soon formed, which embraced all occasions to oppose and distress the administration. How early this opposition began, will appear in the proceedings of the Convention, which are now going to be related.

The first thing that was judged necessary to be done was to turn the Convention into a Parliament. For it had been already said in the House of Commons; that the Convention, not having been called by the King's Writs, their acts were not valid. To obviate this objection which might be infused into men's minds, and to avoid the usual delays, occasioned by the calling of a new Parliament, and to preserve a great number of Members, that were entirely satisfied with the present settlement, the King, the first time he advised with his Privy-Council, proposed the question to them "whether the Convention might be legally turned into a Parliament." As there were some in the Council, who still adhered to forms, without considering the state of things, the Council was divided upon the question, but the majority agreeing in the affirmative, the King went to the Feb. 18. House of Lords, in great solemnity, and taking possession of the throne, made the following Pr. H. C. speech to both houses. II. 276.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

"I have lately told you, how sensible I am of The King's
"your kindness, and how much I value the first speech
"confidence you have reposed in me; and to both
"I am come hither to assure you, that I shall Houses.
"never do any thing, that may justly lessen your "good opinion of me.
"I think it necessary to acquaint you, that "the condition of our allies abroad, and particularly that of Holland, is such, that unless
"some speedy care be taken of them, they run
"a greater hazard than you would have them
"exposed to.

"You

(1) The Commissioners of the Customs were the Honourable George Booth, Sir Richard Temple, Sir Robert Southwell, Thomas Pelham, Sir Robert Clayton, Sir Patience Ward. Of the Excise, Sir Henry Vane, Sir Henry Ashurst, Sir Humphrey Edwin, Thomas Frankland, John Danvers, Francis Perry, John Wilcocks, junr.

(2) When King James asked him to vote for the repeal of the Test, he answered, he could not do it, in honour or conscience. The King said, he knew he was a man of honour, but the rest of his life did not look like a man, that had great regard for conscience; (for he was indeed abandoned to luxury and vice.) He boldly replied, he had his faults, but they were such that other people who talked more of conscience, were guilty of the like.

(3) These were the Earl of Carbury, Sir Michael Warton, Sir Thomas Lee, Sir John Chicheley, Sir John Lawborer of Whitehaven, and Mr. William Sacheverel. This last, who had distinguished himself by several speeches for the bill of exclusion, being little acquainted with maritime affairs, desired the King to excuse him from acting at the admiralty board, on account of his insufficiency. The King replied, "There are enough who do understand the business, which a man of "sense would soon be master of, and he could depend "on his integrity." Sacheverel persisted in excusing himself saying, "since he was not qualified for the "service, he could not in conscience accept the salary." Oldm. III. p. 2.

(4) The rest of the Judges were Sir William Dolben, Sir William Gregory, and Giles Eyre, Justices of the King's Bench; Sir Henry Pollexfen, Lord Chief Justice, and Sir John Powell, Sir Thomas Rokeby, and Peyton Ventris, Justices of the common Pleas; Sir Robert Atkins, Lord Chief Baron, and Sir Edward Nevil, Nicholas Lechmere, and John Turtton, Barons of the Exchequer; and John Trenchard, Chief Justice of Chester, Sir George Treby, Attorney General, John Sommers, Solicitor General, and Henry Poule, Master of the Rolls.

(5) Archbishop Sancroft refused to consecrate him, but to avoid a premunire, he granted a commission to any three of the Bishops of his province, in conjunction with the Bishop of London, to exercise his metropolitan authority during pleasure. Thus he authorized others to do, what he seemed to think an unlawful act. He was afterwards ashamed of it himself and sent for the original warrant out of the office, and got it into his own hands. Burnet, Vol. II. p. 8.

"You yourselves must be sensible, that the posture of affairs here, requires your serious consideration; and that a good settlement at home is necessary, not only for your own peace, but for the support of the Protestant interest both here, and abroad. And particularly the state of Ireland is such, that the dangers are grown too great to be obviated by any slow methods.

"I must leave it to you to consider of the most effectual ways of preventing the inconveniences, which may arise by delays, and to judge, what terms may be most proper to bring those things to pass for the good of the nation, which, I am confident, are in all your minds, and which I on my part, shall be always ready to promote."

This speech was received with a general applause; and pursuant to the last clause of it, the Lords immediately brought in a Bill to remove and prevent all questions and disputes concerning the assembling and sitting of this present parliament: which was read twice that afternoon, passed the next day, and sent to the Commons for their concurrence. Upon which, the Commons went into a committee of the whole House, and Mr. Hampden, their Chairman, put the question, whether a King elected and declared by the Lords Spiritual, and Temporal, and Commons, assembled at Westminster the twenty second of January 1688-9, coming to, and consulting with the said Lords and Commons, did not make as complete a Parliament, and Legislative Power and Authority, to all intents and purposes, as if the said King should cause new summon's to be given, and new elections to be made by writs? This occasioned a long and warm debate; the party, who were for the negative, headed by Sir Edward Seymour, maintaining, "that, according to Sir Edward Coke, a Parliament consists of the King's Majesty sitting there as in his politic capacity, and of the three estates of the Realm; that is to say, 1. the Lords Spiritual; 2. the Lords Temporal; and 3. the Commons. That as to the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, every one of them being of full age, when a Parliament is to be held, ought, of right, to have a writ of summon's to come to that Parliament. And that as to the Commons, the same author says, they are respectively elected by the Shires or Counties, Cities and Boroughs, by force of the King's writs. That the Lords and Commons assembled at Westminster the twenty second of January, were not summoned thither by the King's writs; and therefore though the King afterwards came to them, yet such King, Lords, and Commons, could not be a Parliament. And that though the like was done at the Restoration, yet the Convention was then called, when there was no King nor Great Seal in England; and it was called by the consent of the lawful King, and was done upon a true and visible, and not on a pretended necessity. And after all, even the Convention was not looked upon as a legal Parliament; its acts were ratified in a subsequent Parliament, and from thence they had their authority." To this it was answered, "that it was generally admitted, that in an hereditary kingdom, if the King should die without an Heir, either lineal or collateral, the crown in that case would devolve, or, as it were, escheat to the whole people and nation; and that hereupon the estates and representatives of such a nation might dispose of the Crown, to whom they pleased, or quite alter and change the government into what form they thought fit; examples of which were brought out of Germany, Italy, France, and Portugal. That in like manner, where a King abandoned, forsook, or deserted his government, by going or flying out of the Kingdom, without appointing any guardian to protect and take care of his people during his absence, whereby the throne became vacant, the estates of such a people might appoint another King or Governor. That King James II. having abandoned his people, unguarded and undefended, at the mercy of a foreign army, even in the heart of the country, without so much as leaving a Guardian or Great Seal behind him, his great officers and ministers of State flying some one way and some another, what could the nation do but what they had done? Several of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, many of the Knights, Citizens, and Burgeesses of a former Parliament, the Aldermen and divers Common Council men of the City of London, addressed themselves to the Prince of Orange, desiring him to take upon him the administration of public affairs, untill the meeting of the intended Convention of the three estates or great council of the realm; and to send letters subscribed by himself both to the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, who were protestants, to meet on the said twenty second of January at Westminster, and to several Shires, Counties, Universities, Cities, &c. for electing of such number of persons to represent them, as of right were to be sent to Parliament. That accordingly such letters were sent, and elections made; and the Convention thus assembled, after mature deliberations, resolved, that the Prince and Princess of Orange should be King and Queen of England. That after they were proclaimed King and Queen, and his Majesty came and consulted with the three estates to be assembled, what could be wanting in that assembly to make them a full and complete Parliament? Or what could be had more than was in this Convention of King, Lords, and Commons, if the said King should issue out writs for calling a new Parliament? That if, as was agreed by all, the substantial parts of a Parliament be, and consist of an assembly or Convention, or meeting together of the King and three estates, the difference of the Lords and Commons being called by Writ or by Letter was nothing material, since both Writ and Letter were to the same effect; and since in some ancient records it is mentioned, that Parliaments should be summoned by Letters, particularly in King John's great charter in the seventeenth year of his reign, he promises to summon the Bishops, Abbots, Earls, &c. by his letter. That the Prince of Orange's not being King at the time of his sending forth his letters, was of no importance, since he was the person, to whom the administration of the government was then committed. That it was evident, that in many parliaments it was not so material, how the King, Lords, and Commons came together, as that they were together. That the manner of calling together the three Estates of the Realm by the Prince of Orange's letters was a much fairer proceeding, than

"dering the state of affairs, as to the calling of them together, than was in several cases, wherein they were never doubted to be a Parliament, when joined with a King. That Edward II. being imprisoned by his Queen, son, and nobles, they issued out writs in the imprisoned King's name, to summon the Lords, and to choose Knights, Citizens, and Burgeſſes to meet at Westminster, the sixteenth of January 1325. That this, one would think, was pretty hard, and an absolute force upon the King, by making use of his name against his will, so that it could not be said to be his act; yet the Lords and Commons being met, they deposed Edward II. and declared his son Edward III. King; and this new King, and the Lords, and Commons, so (one might say) irregularly convened, made several Acts of Parliament, and have been ever since adjudged a good Parliament to all intents and purposes, without any subsequent act of confirmation. That in like manner Richard II. being taken prisoner by Henry Duke of Lancaster, the Duke issued out writs in the King's name (the King being then in prison) to summon the Lords, and to elect Representatives for the people, to meet at Westminster the thirteenth of September 1399. That those being met, by this irregular-summons, they deposed Richard II. and declared the Duke of Lancaster King; and that new King, and the Lords and Commons, so irregularly convened, being joined together, were also, and are to this day, adjudged a good Parliament to all intents and purposes. Lastly, that the Lords and Commons assembled at Westminster, the 15th of April 1660, were convened by writs in the name of the keepers of the liberties of England, who were usurpers; yet when King Charles II. came to them, and they received him as King, he and they together were adjudged a Parliament, and enacted, that they should be so esteemed, and made many laws, which were put in execution; and they continued as a Parliament until the twenty ninth of December following; and though most or all those acts were afterwards confirmed by a subsequent Parliament convened by the King's writs in May 1661; yet that confirmation, according to many good judgments, was rather to satisfy some scrupulosity than out of necessity, most of the said acts having in a great measure had their effects, before the subsequent Parliament began. That if therefore upon the Prince of Orange's being declared and proclaimed King, he came to the Convention of Lords and Commons assembled at Westminster; if the same number of Lords was summoned, that of right ought to be summoned to Parliament, and the same number of Knights, Citizens, and Burgeſſes duly chosen, that ought to be chosen, to represent the Commons in Parliament; then consequently there were all the substantial and essential parts of a Parliament met together, and being so, where was the necessity, advantage, or prudence to

"dissolve these, and thereby give new trouble of new summons and new elections, lose a great deal of time, suffer irrecoverable loss and damage to Ireland, and the allies abroad, and after all, at the next meeting, be but where they now were, as to the essential parts of a parliament, there being nothing more to be had at any other time, but what they had already."

Upon these reasons the Commons agreeing to Feb. 2. the bill, it received the royal assent, and the Convention was from that time called the Parliament. This Act was to commence from the 13th of February, the day on which the royal dignity was accepted by the King and Queen, and instead of the old oaths of allegiance and supremacy, the new oaths were enjoined to be taken by all the Members of each House, from, and after the first day of March next ensuing. Accordingly a day was set for the call of both Houses, and for requiring the Members to take the oaths. Upon the passing this Act, several Members who had before protested, that they would neither submit to the decisions of such a Parliament, nor sit in it, absented themselves, and retired into the country on frivolous pretences. And when the time came for the Members to take the oaths, though they were refused by few or none of the Commons, several Lords, both Spiritual and Temporal, would not take them. As the Duke of Newcastle, the Earls of Clarendon, Lichfield, Exeter, Tarmouth, and Stafford, and the Lords Griffin, Stawel, and one or two more: these were all, at several times, summoned to attend the House, but most of them continued absent. The Spiritual Lords that absented themselves were Sancroft Archbishop of Canterbury, Turner Bishop of Ely, Lake of Chichester, Ken of Bath and Wells, White of Peterborough, (these were five of the seven Bishops sent to the Tower by King James) Lloyd of Norwich, Thomas of Worcester, and Frampton of Gloucester (1). Sancroft had been Archbishop ever since the year 1676. He was a man of solemn deportment, and considerably learned. He lived abstracted from company, and was fixed in the old maxims of high loyalty. He was named in the Ecclesiastical Commission by King James, but would never go to that court, nor declare against it, though he thought it illegal. He joined in the petition against reading King James's declaration for liberty of conscience. He met the Privy-Counsellors at Guildhall, and invited the Prince of Orange to take the government upon him, but refused to go with the rest of the Bishops to welcome him to St. James's, though he had once agreed to it. When the Convention met the 29th of January, he came not to take his place among them. He resolved neither to act for nor against King James's interest, which was thought very unbecoming in one of his high station. For since he believed, as afterwards appeared, that the nation was running into treason, rebellion and perjury, it was strange to see him, who was at the head of the Church, sit silent all the while, and not so much as declare his opinion by speaking, voting, or protesting. But he

he was a poor spirited and fearful man, and acted a mean part in the whole affair of the Revolution. He went on afterwards in the same unactive state, still refusing the oaths, but neither acting nor speaking, except in great confidence, to any against their taking them. Thomas and Lake, who both died soon after, like the Archbishop, never came to the House of Lords. When the other five withdrew from the Parliament, that they might recommend themselves by a show of moderation, some of them moved for a bill of toleration, and another of comprehension, whereby all moderate Presbyterians might be reconciled to the Church of England, and admitted to ecclesiastical benefices. These bills were drawn and offered by the Earl of Nottingham, for which he received the thanks of the House (1). From this time may be dated the rise of the Non-jurors, who rejecting the notion of a King de jure and a King de facto, as well as all other distinctions, as limitations, strictly adhered to the principle of the divine right of Kings, and were the authors of all the plots and conspiracies against the new settlement, which they refused to acknowledge.

How early they began their designs against the government was quickly discovered. For the King, by some intercepted letters, had reason to suspect that the Earl of Arran, Sir Robert Hamilton, and others, were endeavouring the restoration of King James. Upon which, they were all sent to the Tower. But as this proceeding was not strictly legal, the King sent a message to acquaint the Lords with what he had done, who immediately voted an address of thanks for his care of their liberties, and desired him to secure all disturbers of the peace till the first day of next term. But the Commons thinking this address allowed the King a power of dispensing with the Habeas Corpus Act, thought it more proper to proceed by a bill, to empower the King to apprehend and detain all suspected persons, which in a few days passed both Houses. A bill was also brought in at the same time for removing Papists from the city of London and Westminster, which having passed the Lords, the Commons added a proviso to it, by which the Queen Dowager's articles of marriage were considerably reduced. To this proviso the Lords disagreed, which occasioned several conferences, and warm debates; but at last it was settled, that the Queen Dowager should have thirty servants of the King's English subjects, provided none of them were Priests, Monks or Fryars (2). There were also in custody at this time the Lord Jeffries, the Lord Montgomery, the Earl of Salisbury, the Earl of Castlemaine, the Earl of Peterborough, and the Lord Clifford, who were all admitted to bail not long after, except Jeffries. The revolt of a body of troops about the same time, gave also some hopes to the enemies of the government. The royal regiment of Scotch horse, that was quartered at Abingdon, almost totally deserted; as did also five hundred of Dunbarton's regiment, headed by five Captains. They all took the rout to Scotland, and are supposed to have acted in concert with the Earl of Arran, who was confined in the Tower. General Ginkle was ordered to pursue them with a sufficient force of horse and dragoons, who soon obliged them to submit to the King's mercy; and the only punishment he inflicted on them, was to send them over to serve in Holland.

The oaths to be taken by the present and all future Parliaments being settled, the coronation-oath was next to be established, as the day for that ceremony drew near. Accordingly, an act was passed for that purpose, in the course of which a proviso was offered in the House of Commons, that no clause in the act should so bind the Kings and Queens as to prevent their assenting to any bill, offered by both houses, for taking away, or altering any form or ceremony, in the established church; so as the doctrines, liturgy and episcopal government be preserved. But this proviso was thrown out.

The Coronation oath (as is observed in the preamble of the act) which had by ancient usage, been solemnly taken by the Kings and Queens, to maintain the laws and customs of the realm, and the rights and liberties of the people, having been hitherto framed in doubtful expressions, with relation to constitutions now unknown, was worded in a more plain and comprehensive manner (3), and by directions from the court was to be administered, either by the Archbishop

(1) These Bills were the same that the Earl of Nottingham had prepared for the House of Commons, in King Charles's time, during the debates of the Exclusion. But then things of that kind, were looked on as artifices to lay the heat of that time, and to render the Church party more popular. Burnet, II. p. 6.

(2) In the debate upon this act for removing of Papists, there happened a pleasant incident, which was an address to the King, to order the Duchess of Mazarin to depart the Kingdom. Colonel Birch, who was one of the oldest Parliament-men in the House, presented this address; to which his Majesty answered, he would take it into consideration. However, this business did not pass without opposition. Several Members spoke in favour of the Duchess: Monsieur Odyck, one of the Dutch Ambassadors, made use of all his interests in her behalf, at the desire of Monsieur de St. Evremont, who was a great friend of that Lady. Monsieur Odyck engaged his brother Monsieur d'Auverquerque to intercede for her; and these Gentlemen represented the attentions at her house, which were thought by some to be so many popish cabals, to be only meetings for gaming, and other diversions, by the former of which the was thought chiefly to subsist. The Marquis de Seillac spoke for her to the King, alleging, that she would starve in any other country. The Bishop of Salisbury made a motion in the House of Lords for such an address as that of the Commons; but it not being carried, the Duchess was permitted to continue her diversions; and his Majesty, out of regard to her unfortunate circumstances, allowed her a pension of two thousand pounds a year. Des Maignaux's life of St. Evremont, p. 132.

"Will you solemnly promise and swear to govern the people of this kingdom of England, and the dominions thereto belonging, according to the statutes in Parliament agreed on, and the laws and customs of the same?"

I solemnly promise so to do.

"Will you, to your power, cause law and justice in mercy to be executed in all your judgments?"

I will.

The choice of one of these two Prelates being left to the King; he, fearing to be refused by the Archbishop, who still continued discontented, thought fit to appoint the Bishop of London; who accordingly officiated at the Coronation, which was performed with all the magnificence and splendour usual on such occasions. The next day the Commons waited in a full body on the King and Queen at the Banqueting house, to congratulate them upon their Coronation, which Mr. Powell, their speaker, performed in an elegant speech (1).

State of the Dissenters at the Revolution.

The next thing to be considered in relation to the new Government was, to settle the oaths to be taken by all persons enjoying any office, place, or benefice. As the Protestant Dissenters had zealously promoted the Revolution, and were hearty friends to the new establishment; the King was very desirous, that those among them who were willing and able to serve him, should be admitted to offices and employments. It must be observed, the Dissenters at the time of the Revolution were divided into four sects, Presbyterians, Independents, Anabaptists and Quakers. The Presbyterians and Independents had not the visible distinction of different rites, and their depressed condition had put an end to the dispute about the constitution and subordination of churches, which had set them at so great variance, when power was in their hands. They were now looked upon as one sect, and were three parts in four of all the dissenters. The main difference between them was, that the Presbyterians seemed reconcilable to the Church; for they were so far inclined to episcopal ordination and a liturgy, that upon some amendments they appeared disposed to come into the Church, and they liked the civil government and a limited monarchy. But the Independents were generally for a Commonwealth in the State, and therefore, they put all the power of the Church in the people, whose choice they deemed a sufficient ordination: Nor did they approve of set forms of worship. The Anabaptists were generally men of virtue, and of universal charity; and as they were far from being in any treating terms with the Church of England, so nothing but a universal toleration, could make them capable of favour and employments. The Quakers had made themselves particular in the matter of the hat, and saying thou and thee, that it became to them a badge of distinction, by which they were easily known. These were in the same state with the Anabaptists, and a toleration was all they could expect.

From hence it appears, that of all the dissenters the moderate Presbyterians alone, could upon easy terms, be incorporated with the Church, and placed on a level with those of the established religion: That the rest were at too great a distance to be reconciled to the Church, and therefore as to religion, could be made easy only by a toleration; and as to employments, could not be admitted into them, unless their conformity to the Church was dispensed with. This being the case, the King had formed three designs. 1. By a comprehension to unite the moderate Presbyterians with the Church: 2. By a toleration to give ease to scrupulous consciences: And 3. By removing the obstacles arising from non-conformity, to admit indifferently, all his protestant subjects into civil employments. How he succeeded in these his designs will quickly appear.

As a proper method to execute his third design, was by the insertion of a clause to that effect, in the bill for settling the oaths, the King not only signified in council his desire for the admission of the Protestants to offices and employments, but moreover, two days after the bill had been brought into the house of Lords under the title of, "a bill for the abrogating of the oaths of supremacy and allegiance, and appointing other oaths," he took the opportunity when he went to give the royal assent to a bill for suspending the Habeas Corpus act, to make the following speech to both houses.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

"NOW I have the occasion of coming hither to pass this bill, which, I hope, will be for all our safeties, I shall put you in mind of one thing, which will conduce much to our settlement, as a settlement will to the disappointment of all our enemies.

"I am, with all the expedition I can, filling up the vacancies, that are in offices and places of trust, by this late Revolution. I hope you are sensible, there is a necessity of some law to settle the oaths to be taken by all persons to be

"and privileges, as by law do or shall appertain unto them, or any of them?"

All this I promise to do.

Then the King or Queen, laying his or her hand upon the Gospels, shall say,

The things which I have here before promised, I will perform and keep. So help me God.

The coronation oath, it seems, had been altered for the use of King James, and the care that was taken, in the original oath, of the people's liberties was left out, and instead of it great regards had to the rights of the Clergy, and prerogatives of the Crown. See State-Tracts, Vol. II. p. 49.

(1) The titles and honours conferred just before, or after the coronation, were these: Prince George of Denmark, now naturalized, was created Baron of Oakingham, Earl of Kendal, and Duke of Cumberland; the Marquis of Winchester was made Duke of Bolton; William Bentinck, Esq; Groom of the Stole to his Majesty, Baron of Cirencester, Viscount Woodstock, and Earl of Portland; Thomas, Lord Viscount Falcon-

berg, Earl of Falconberg; Charles, Lord Viscount Mordaunt, Earl of Monmouth; Ralph, Lord Montagu, Viscount Mount-Hermer, and Earl of Montagu; John, Lord Churchill, Earl of Marlborough; Henry Sidney, Esq; Baron of Milton, and Viscount Sidney of Shrey in the county of Kent; Richard, Lord Viscount Lumley of Waterford in Ireland, Viscount Lumley of Lumley castle in the County Palatine of Durham; Hugh, Lord Viscount Cholmondeley of Kellis in Ireland, Baron Cholmondeley of Wichmalbank alias Namptwich in Cheshire. On the 27th of March, the Lord Coot was sworn and admitted into the place of Treasurer and Receiver-General to her Majesty; on the 3d of April, Frederick Marschal de Schomberg, General of his Majesty's forces, and Master General of the ordnance, and William, Earl of Devonshire, Lord Steward of his Majesty's Household, in a chapter held at Whitehall, were elected Knights Companions of the most noble order of the Garter; into which order likewise, on the 5th of the same month, the Duke of Ormond was install'd at Windor; and on the 10th, his Majesty conferred the honour of Knighthood on Thomas Pilkington, Lord Mayor of London.

And as I doubt not but you will sufficiently provide against papists, so I hope you will leave room for the admission of all Protestants, that are willing and able to serve. This conjunction in my service will tend to the better uniting you amongst yourselves, and the strengthening you against your common adversaries."

A clause drawn up to that effect and rejected.
Burnet.

Pursuant to this speech, two clauses were ordered to be drawn up, one to explain the abrogating of the oaths, and the other "to take away the necessity of receiving the sacrament, to make a man capable of enjoying any office, employment, or place of trust." But this last clause was rejected by a great majority. However seven Lords, Delamere, Stamford, North and Grey, Chesterfield, Wharton, Lovelace and Yeughan, protested against limiting offices by the sacramental Test, and dissented for these reasons; "that a hearty union among Protestants was a greater security to the Church and State, than any Test, that could be invented: That this obligation to receive the sacrament was now a Test on the Protestants, rather than on the Papists; and as long as it was so continued, there could not be that hearty and perfect union among Protestants, as had always been wished, and was at this time indispensably necessary. And, lastly, that a greater caution ought not to be required from such as were admitted into offices, than from the Members of the two Houses of Parliament, who were not obliged to receive the sacrament, to enable them to sit in either house."

Another clause for the same purpose is also rejected.
Pr. H. L.
I. 353.

Though this attempt failed, the King was resolved to pursue his design, and accordingly, another clause was proposed to be inserted in the same bill, namely, "to prevent the receiving the sacrament of the Lord's supper upon any other account, than in obedience to the holy institution thereof; and to provide that any man should be sufficiently qualified for any offices, employment, or place of trust, who within a year before or after his admission or entrance therein, did receive the sacrament of the Lord's supper, either according to the usage of the Church of England, or in any other Protestant congregation, and could produce a certificate under the hands of the minister and two other credible persons." But this clause was also rejected by a great majority, though six Lords, Oxford, Mordaunt, Lovelace, Montagu, Wharton, and Paget, entered their dissent for these reasons: "because it gives a great part of the Protestant freemen of England land reason to complain of inequality and hard usage, when they are excluded from public employments by a law; and also that it deprived the King and kingdom of divers men, fit and capable to serve the public in several stations; and that for a mere scruple of conscience, which could by no means render them suspected, much less disaffected to the government. 2.

It is also rejected.

Protest of the Lords.
Pr. H. L.
I. 353.

"Because his Majesty, as the common and indubitable interest of his people, having expressed an earnest desire of liberty for tender consciences to his Protestant subjects; and the Bishops having divers of them, on several occasions, professed an inclination to, and owned the reasonableness of such a christian temper, we apprehend it will raise suspicion in some men's minds of something else than the care of religion or the public, and different from a design to heal our breaches, when they find, that by confining secular employments to ecclesiastical conformity, those are shut out from civil affairs, whose doctrine and worship may be tolerated by authority of Parliament; there being a bill before, by order of the House, to that purpose; especially when, (without this exclusive rigour,) the Church is secured in all her privileges and preferments, no body being hereby let into them, who is not strictly conformable. 3. Because to set marks of distinction and humiliation on any sort of men, who have not rendered themselves justly suspected to the government, as it is at all times to be avoided by the makers of just and equitable laws, so it may be particularly of ill effect to the reformed interest at home and abroad in this present conjuncture, which stands in need of the united hands and hearts of all Protestants against the open attempts and secret endeavours of a restless party and a potent neighbour, who is more zealous than Rome itself, to plant Popery in these Kingdoms; and labours with the utmost force to settle his tyranny upon the ruins of the reformation through all Europe. 4. Because it turns the edge of a law (we know not by what fate) upon Protestants and friends to the government, which was intended against Papists, to exclude them from places of trust, as men avowedly dangerous to our government and religion; and thus the taking the sacrament, which was enjoined only as a means to discover Papists, is now made a distinguishing duty amongst Protestants, to weaken the whole by casting off a part of them. 5. Because mysteries of religion, and divine worship, are of divine original, and of a nature so wholly distinct from the secular affairs of politic society, that they cannot be applied to those ends; and therefore the Church, by the law of the Gospel, as well as common prudence ought to take care, neither to offend tender consciences within itself, nor give offence to those without, by mixing their sacred mysteries with secular interests. 6. Because we cannot see, how it can consist with the law of God, common equity, or the right of any free-born subject, that any one be punished without crime. If it be a crime not to take the sacrament according to the usage of the Church of England, every one ought to be punished for it; which no body affirms. If it be no crime, those, who are capable, and judged fit for employments by the King, ought not to be punished with a law of exclusion for not doing that, which it is no crime to forbear. If it be urged still, as an effectual test to discover and keep out Papists; the taking the sacrament in those Protestant congregations, where they are Members, and known, will be at least as effectual to that purpose."

Thus the King's design for the admission of all his protestant subjects to offices and places of trust, not only miscarried, but it very much heightened the prejudices of the Churchmen against him, as bearing no great affection to the Church of England, when he proposed the opening such a door which they believed would be fatal to them.

The rejecting these clauses, made the bill for settling the oaths to be pushed on with more zeal.

Debate about settling the oaths.
Pr. H. L.
Burnet.

1689. zeal. The Clergy, as has been observed, had to far entangled themselves, by preaching up for so many years the doctrines of the divine right of Kings, and the lineal succession; that it was imagined great numbers would follow the example of those Bishops, who had refused to acknowledge the government. And therefore as the Clergy were known to lie under these difficulties, it had been proposed, in order to make way for the clause about the sacramental Test, that the Clergy should be excused from the oaths, provided the Dissenters might be excused from the Sacrament. But this proposal did not take effect, the sacramental Test being deemed by the Clergy, the chief support of the Church. However that be, it was long insisted upon in the House of Lords, that instead of the clause, positively enacting that the Clergy should be obliged to take the oaths, the King should be empowered to tender them; and then the refusal was to be punished according to the clause as it stood in the act. It was thought, that such a power would oblige them to their good behaviour, and be an effectual restraint upon them. They would at least be kept quiet by it. Whereas, if they came under deprivation, or the apprehensions of it, that would make them desperate, and set them on to undermine the government. It was urged, that the Clergy by the offices of the Church did solemnly own to God their allegiance in the sight of all their people; that no oath could lay deeper engagements on them, than those acts of religious worship did; and if they should either pass over those offices, or perform them otherwise than as the Law required, there was a clear method, pursuant to the act of uniformity, to proceed severely against them. It was also said, that in many different changes of government, oaths had not proved so effectual a security as was imagined; distinctions were found out, and senses were put on words, by which they were interpreted so as to signify but little, when a government came to need strength from them; and it ill became those, who had formerly complained of these impositions, to urge this with so much vehemence.

The Commons would by no means agree to the excusing the Clergy from the oaths, alledging, "That it hath been the policy of the common law and statute law to oblige men to swear allegiance to the King. That allegiance is the common and necessary duty of all the subjects, and is most strictly to be required of Archbishops, and those, who have ecclesiastical dignities, benefices, or promotions, in regard they are highly interested in the administration of the government, draw great dependencies, and are exemplary to the rest of the people; and several of them are by law to administer the oath of allegiance to other persons. That allegiance is also strictly to be required of all Governors, Professors, and Fellows in Universities; and School-masters, because to them the education of the youth of the kingdom is committed; and therefore they ought to be persons of known loyalty to the government. That the taking the oaths publicly in open court would better manifest allegiance, than the taking them privately before persons appointed by order in Council, and would be much more safe to the persons who are obliged to take the oaths. That the best and most certain means to have the oaths taken was, to impose it upon the persons concerned to tender themselves to take the oaths under penalties; but if the oaths were not required to be taken unless tendered, the said persons might, by absence or otherwise, avoid them with impunity. That the clause, which the Commons sent to their Lordships, allowed more favour to the Archbishops, Bishops, and those that have ecclesiastical dignities and promotions, than to any Lay-Peer or other persons having offices or employments, and was more gentle in the penalty than the statutes heretofore made in the like case. That it was unreasonable and unsafe to distinguish the Archbishops, Bishops, and persons, having ecclesiastical dignities, benefices, or promotions, and such as are intrusted with the education of youth, from the rest of the subjects, in the declaration of their allegiance, and might tend to make a division in the kingdom, expose the King's person and government to hatred and danger, and occasion a general discontent."

To these reasons it was replied by the Lords, "That indeed the policy of the law requires men to swear allegiance; and that it is the common and necessary duty of all subjects, and especially of the Clergy; and therefore the Lords did not exempt them from taking these oaths, but only differed with the House of Commons about the method, by which they should be tendered. That if the Lords should agree, that it was better to tender the oaths in open court than privately, yet that was not a sufficient reason against tendering them by persons appointed by the King in Council, because the Officers and Judges of the Court might be so appointed by virtue of the clause offered by the Lords. That the Clergy would be required to take the oaths by such order in Council, as was proposed by the Lords; and their not appearing, when so summoned, would amount to a refusal; or, if it should not, the Lords would agree to any such addition, as would make it so. That the Clergy and other members of the Universities were not distinguished from the Laity, because upon the presenting to any degree or preferment they would be, equally with all others, obliged to take the oaths, when required by order of Council. That it seemed more to the settlement and safety of the government, that the King should be empowered to put the fidelity of the Clergy to a trial immediately, than leave any, who were ill affected to the government, so much time, as to the first of August, to undermine it. That the Clergy were obliged by the prayers, which they must use in the daily service, to make such express and solemn declarations of fidelity to the King and Queen by name, that the putting them to the taking of the oaths was not so necessary to the publick safety, as in other persons, who are not bound to make such frequent declarations of their fidelity. That in so critical a time as the present, it was not to be doubted, but upon any cause of apprehending their ill affections to the government, the tendering the oaths by order in Council, would not only take all imputations of hardship from his Majesty, but justify, and even require a more rigorous way of proceeding against those, that should give any cause of offence. And lastly, that since du-

This answer being communicated to the Commons, they insisted that according to the statute of the 7th of James I. all persons should be enjoined to take the oaths; and that there should be no difference between the Clergy and Laity as to that point. Then an exception of twelve was proposed, who should be subject to the law, upon refusing the oaths when required by the King; but neither was that allowed: and after a long debate, all the mitigation that could be obtained, was a power to the King to grant to any twelve Clergymen, who should be deprived by this act, a third part of their benefices during his pleasure. This clause being approved by the Commons, the bill for settling the oaths passed both Houses, and received the royal assent.

By this act the oath of supremacy, established in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, and that of allegiance in the reign of King James I. were abrogated, and others appointed. In the oath established in the time of King James I. a previous title seemed to be asserted, when the King was sworn to, as rightful and lawful King. And therefore, as these words could not be said of a King that had no precedent right, but was set up by the nation, the new oaths were reduced to the antient simplicity of swearing, to bear faith and true allegiance to the King and Queen. The declaration in the act of uniformity, that “it is not lawful upon any pretense whatsoever to take arms against the King, or those that are commissioned by him”, was also repealed, and another enjoined in its room (1). The Clergy were obliged to take the oaths before the first day of August, and in case of refusal or neglect, they were to be suspended from their office for six months; and if they took them not before the expiration of that time, they were to be actually deprived of all their ecclesiastical promotions. This indulgence to the Clergy of six months after suspension, was, that they might have sufficient time to study the point; and if in that time they could not satisfy themselves as to the lawfulness of acknowledging the government, it was said, it was not fit they should continue in the highest posts of the Church. However, the Clergy, before the time was expired, generally took the oaths, though with too many reservations and distinctions, which laid them open to severe censures, as if they had taken them against their conscience.*

Though the King had failed in his design for the admission of the Protestant Dissenters into offices and employments, by the removal of the Sacramental Test, he succeeded however in that of Toleration, by the suspension of all penal laws for not coming to Church. The King, when Prince of Orange, having been applied to 1689. by King James for his opinion concerning the repeal of the penal laws and Test, his answer was, that no Christian, in his opinion, ought to be persecuted for his conscience, or be ill used because he differed from the established religion; and therefore he heartily approved that the Dissenters should have entire liberty for the exercise of their religion, and that the penal laws should be repealed, provided those remained in force by which the Roman Catholics were excluded from Parliament, and publick employments; but that as to their religion, they should be allowed the same liberty as in Holland. These were the King's sentiments at that time, and therefore it is not strange he should, now that it was in his power, endeavour to procure a toleration for all his Protestant subjects, especially as it was not only agreeable to his principles, but what they had deserved by their steady adherence to the new settlement. Besides, his experience in Holland had made him look upon liberty of conscience as one of the wisest measures of government; as tending to the encouragement of industry, and to the increase of the people; and as affording a sanctuary to all who are oppressed.

The toleration-bill was brought into the House of Lords the 28th of February, and read the first time by the Earl of Nottingham, by whom it had been prepared. Some proposed that the act should be only for a time, as a necessary restraint upon the Dissenters, that they might demean themselves so, as to merit the continuance of it, when the term of years now offered should expire. But this was rejected, and it was urged, that there was now an universal inclination to pass the act, but it could not be expected that the nation would be in the same good disposition towards the Dissenters at another time. So the bill found an easy passage through both Houses, and received the royal assent on the 24th of May, under the title of “An act for exempting their Majesties Protestant subjects, dissenting from the Church of England, from the penalties of certain laws.”

The reason of this act is thus given in the preamble; Forasmuch as some ease to scrupulous consciences in the exercise of religion may be an effectual means to unite their Majesties Protestant subjects in interests and affections; it was therefore enacted, “That none of the penal laws shall be construed to extend to any person or persons dissenting from the Church of England, that shall take the oaths, to the present government, and subscribe the declaration of 30 Car. II. provided that no assembly of persons so dissenting should be in any place for religious worship with the doors locked, barred, or bolted, during the time of such meeting together; and provided, that nothing should be construed to exempt any of the persons aforesaid from paying of tythes or other parochial duties. If any Dissenter should be chosen or appointed to bear the office of Constable, Church-warden, Overseer, &c. and should scruple the oaths required by law to be taken in respect of such office, he shall or may execute such office or employment by a sufficient deputy. That all preachers or teachers of any

The like liberty was given to Anabaptists, but no Papist or any that denied the Trinity, were to have the benefit of this act. The Quakers were also admitted to it on condition of promising before God, in stead of swearing, to be true and faithful to the King and Queen, and solemnly professing and declaring, that they abhorred and renounced &c. They were also to subscribe a profession of their Christian belief in these words: I A. B. profess faith in God the Father, and in Jesus Christ his eternal son the true God, and in the Holy Spirit, one God blessed for evermore; and do acknowledge the Holy Scriptures of the Old and New Testament to be given by Divine Inspiration: " provided that all the Laws made for the frequenting divine service on the Lord's day shall be still in force, and executed against all persons that offend against the said laws, except such persons come to some congregation permitted by this act. Provided, that if any person shall maliciously or contemptuously come into any Cathedral or Parish Church, or other congregation, and disquiet or disturb the same, or misuse any preacher or teacher, he shall, upon conviction, suffer the penalty of twenty pounds. And finally, provided, that no congregation or assembly, for religious worship, shall be permitted or allowed by this act, until the place of such meeting shall be certified to the Bishop of the Diocese, or to the Archdeacon of that Archdeaconry, or to the Justices of the peace at the general or quarter sessions, and registered in the said Bishops or Archdeacon's court, or recorded at the said general or quarter sessions."

The Clergy had begun already to show great hatred to the Dissenters, and seemed to wish for an occasion, to renew old severities against them, and therefore, the quieting the nation by the act of Toleration, was much applauded by men of moderation and goodness. It gave the King great content, who was very uneasy to see so much ill humour spreading among the Clergy, and by their means, over a great part of the nation. He was so true to his principle of liberty of conscience, that he restrained the heat of some, who were proposing several acts against the Papists. He made them apprehend the advantage, which that would give the French, to alienate all the Papists of Europe from us, who from thence might hope to set on foot a new Catholick league, and make the war a quarrel of religion, which might have very bad effects: Nor could he pretend to protect the Protestants in many places of Germany and Hungary, unless he could cover the Papists in England, from all the severities on the account of their religion. This was so carefully infused into many, and so well understood by them, that the Papists have enjoyed the real effects of the Toleration, though they were not comprehended within the act.

Of the King's three designs in favour of the Dissenters; that of their admission into employments had miscarried, but that of Toleration had succeeded. The other of Comprehension, for the receiving the moderate Presbyterians into the Church and admitting them to Ecclesiastical benefices, met with the same fate, as that for their admission to offices. The King was extremely desirous of uniting all his Protestant subjects, and had promised them to use his utmost endeavours for such an union, but all his efforts towards it proved ineffectual.

Pursuant to the motion made by the Bishops when they withdrew from the Parliament, a bill ^{comprehension} was brought into the House of Lords, under the title of " a bill for uniting their Majesties Pro- 355.

testant subjects." In the progress of this bill, two things were warmly debated. The first was, whether kneeling at the Sacrament should be dispensed with to such, as, after conference upon it, should solemnly protest they were not satisfied as to the lawfulness of it. This occasioned a vehement debate, for the posture being the chief exception the Dissenters had to the receiving the Sacrament, the giving that up, was thought to be the opening a way for their coming into employments. However, it was carried, that kneeling should be dispensed with (1). The other debate was, whether the Laity should be added in the commission, to be given by the King to Bishops and others of the Clergy? A proviso was offered, that in imitation of the acts passed in King Henry VIII's, and Edward VI's reigns, a number of persons both of the Clergy and Laity, might be empowered to prepare such a reformation of things relating to the Church, as might be offered to King and Parliament; in order to the healing the divisions, and correcting what might be amiss or defective in the constitution. This was pressed with great earnestness by many of the temporal Lords, but it was carried for the exclusion of the Laity (2). During

(1) The question was put, Whether the clause about the indifferency of the posture at receiving the Sacrament should be left out? The votes being equal, (content 28, proxy 1, in all 29; not content 27, proxy 2, in all 29;) and therefore according to the antient rule in like cases, it was carried in the negative.

(2) In the same manner as the other question by the votes being equal. The Marquis of Winchester, and the Lords Mordaunt, Lovelace and Stamford, entered their dissents in the following reasons: " 1. Because the Act itself being designed for the peace of the State, the putting the Clergy into commission, with a to- No. 4. Vol. III.

" tal exclusion of the Laity, laid the humiliation on the Laity, as if the Clergy of the Church of England were alone friends to the peace of the State, and the Laity less able or less concerned to provide for it. 2. Because the matters to be considered being barely of human constitution, viz. the Liturgy and Ceremonies of the Church, belong to both; for in what is of divine institution, neither Clergy nor Laity can make any alteration at all. 3. Because the pretending, that differences and delays may arise, by mixing Laymen with the Ecclesiastics to the frustrating the design of the commissions, is vain 1689. ring the debates, Bishop Burnet himself warmly opposed the adding the Laity to the commission, imagining that the Clergy would have come with zeal and unanimity into such a design, and being apprehensive, that this addition of the Laity would be looked upon by them as taking the affair out of their hands. But he was convinced soon after, that he had taken wrong measures; and that the method proposed of joining the Laity in the commission was the only one like to prove effectual. But this conduct of his did not to recommend him to the Clergy, as to balance the censure, which he fell under, for moving, in another proviso of that bill, that the subscription instead of assent and consent, should only be to submit with a promise of conformity. He declared himself likewise zealous for dispensing with kneeling at the Sacrament; for since it was acknowledged, that the posture was not essential in itself, and that scruples, how ill grounded soever, were raised upon it, it seemed reasonable to leave the matter as indifferent in its practice, as it was in its nature. When the bill, after passing the Lords, was sent to the Commons, it was let lie on the table, and instead of proceeding in it, they made an address to the King for summoning a convocation, wherein "they rendered to his Majesty their most humble and hearty thanks for his gracious declaration and repeated assurances, that he would maintain the Church of England established by law, which his Majesty had been pleased to recover from the dangerous conspiracy, that was laid for its destruction, with the hazard of his royal person." They added, "That the doctrine and practice of the Church of England had evinced their loyalty beyond the contradiction of the most malicious enemies; and that the misfortunes of former princes could be attributed to nothing more than their endeavours to subvert and disable the Members thereof from contributing to their support and defence. They therefore prayed his Majesty to continue his care for the preservation of the same, whereby he would effectually establish his throne by securing the hearts of his Majesty's

"subjects within these his realms, who could no way better show their zeal for his service, than by a firm adherence to that Church, whose constitution is best suited to the support of this monarchy." They likewise humbly prayed, "that, according to the ancient practice and usage of the Kingdom in time of Parliament, his Majesty would be graciously pleased to issue forth his writs for calling a Convocation of the Clergy of this Kingdom, to be advised with in Ecclesiastical matters; assuring his Majesty, that it was their intention forthwith to proceed to the consideration of giving ease to protestant Dissenters."

By this address it appears, that a party was now beginning to be formed, that pretended great zeal for the Church and expressed their apprehensions, that it was in danger. This they plainly insinuated, by their praying the King to continue his care for the preservation of the Church, hinting at the same time, how dangerous it would be for him to do otherwise. These men, as they went heavily into the Toleration, which was the ease they here promised to give the Dissenters, so they were much offended with the bill of comprehension, as containing matters relating to the Church, in which the representative body of the Clergy had not been so much as advised with; and therefore it was, that they so hastily petitioned for a Convocation, under a notion that the business would be accomplished without one.

The King, who was not pleased with this address as perceiving the tendency of it, did not forbear intimating in his answer, that he thought he had already given them sufficient assurances of his intentions to support the Church. The answer was not returned immediately, but sent the next day by the Earl of Nottingham, who acquainted both Houses (for the Lords had concurred in the address) "That though his Majesty had had many occasions of assuring them, he would maintain the Church of England, as by law established; yet he was well pleased with repeating these promises, which he was resolved to perform, by supporting this

"vain and out of doors, unless those, that made use of this pretence, supposed, that the Clergy-part of the Church had distinct interests from the Laity-part of the same Church, and would be a reason as good, why one or other of them should quit the House of Lords, for fear of obstructing the business of it. 4. Because the commission being intended for the satisfaction of Dissenters, it would be convenient that Laymen of different ranks, nay, perhaps of different opinions too, should be united in it, the better to find expedients for that end, rather than Clergymen alone of the established Church, who are generally observed to have all very much the same way of reasoning and thinking. 5. Because it is the much readier way to facilitate the passing the alterations into a law, that Lay-Lords and Commoners should be joined in the commission, who might be able to satisfy both Houses of the reasons, upon which they were made, and thereby remove all fears and jealousies, ill men might raise against the Clergy, of their endeavouring to keep up, without ground, a distinct interest from that of the Laity, whom they so carefully excluded from being joined with them in constitutions of common concernment, that they would not have any part in the deliberation, who must have the greatest in determining. 6. Because such a restrained commission lay liable to this great objection, that it might

"be made use of to elude repeated promises, and the present general expectation of compliance with tender consciences, when the providing of it was taken out of the ordinary course of Parliament, to be put into the hands of those alone, who were least in admitting any need of it, and who might be thought to be the more unfit to be the sole composers of differences, when they were looked upon by some as parties. 7. Because, after all, this carried a dangerous suspicion along with it, as if the Laity were not a part of the Church, nor had any power to meddle in matters of religion; a suspicion directly opposite to the constitution both of Church and State, which would make all alterations utterly impossible, unless the Clergy alone were allowed to have power to make laws in matters of religion; since what was established by law could not be taken away, or changed but by consent of Laymen in Parliament, the Clergy themselves having no authority to meddle in this very case, in which the Laity was excluded by this very vote, but what they derived from Lay-hands. Lastly, because it was contrary to three statutes made in the reign of Henry VIII. and one in Edward VI. which empowers thirty-two commissioners to alter the common and ecclesiastical laws, &c. whereof sixteen to be of the Laity, and sixteen of the Clergy."

1689. "Church, whose loyalty, he doubted not, would enable him to answer their just expectations. That as his design of coming hither was to rescue them from the miseries they laboured under; so it was a great satisfaction to him, that by the success God had given him, he was in a station of defending this Church, which had effectually shewn her zeal against Popery, and should always be his peculiar care. And he hoped the ease, they designed to Dissenters, would contribute very much to the establishment of this Church; which therefore he earnestly recommended to them, that the occasions of differences and mutual animosities might be removed; and that as soon as might be, he would summon a Convocation."

Burnet.

Notwithstanding this answer, no farther progress was made in the bill. Those who had moved for this bill, and afterwards brought it into the House, acted a very dissingenuous part. For while they studied to recommend themselves by this shew of moderation, they set on their friends to oppose it; and such as were very sincerely and cordially for it, were represented as the enemies of the Church, who intended to subvert it. Nor was this bill supported by those who seemed most favourable to the Dissenters. They advanced it as a maxim, that it was fit to keep up a strong faction both in Church and State; and they thought it was not agreeable to that, to suffer so great a body as the Presbyterians to be made more easy, and more inclinable to unite to the Church. They also thought, that the toleration would be best maintained, when great numbers should need it, and be concerned to preserve it. So the design of a comprehension being zealously opposed and but faintly promoted, fell to the ground. However, the King was so desirous this affair should succeed, that it was brought on again the next session in a more formal manner, though with no better success.

State of the revenue before and after the revolution.

The oath to be used at the coronation of the King, and those to be taken by the members of both Houses of Parliament, as well as by all persons enjoying office, employment or benefice being settled, and the toleration for the Protec-

tant Dissenters being established, the next thing to be considered was a revenue for the support of the government. It must be observed, that before the Revolution the whole standing income of the State was in the power and disposal of the crown, and was called the revenue of the crown. There was then no distinction of what was to be allotted for the King's use, and what for the service of the publick. By which means the King might reserve what part he thought fit for his own designs, and employ no more than he pleased for the purposes of the nation. Accordingly it was found, that after the Restoration, the publick revenue had been constantly embezzled, and immense sums very often sunk, without being applied to the uses for which they were granted (1). It was therefore wisely concerted, after the Revolution, for the security of the nation from perpetual misapplications of the publick money, to allot a separate income for the maintenance of the King's household, and the support of his dignity, (which is now called the Civil List) and to put the rest of the publick revenues entirely under the command of the Parliament. So that from the time of the Revolution the publick money has been no more left to the discretionary management of the Court, but the Commons, after examining the current services of each year, have appropriated the supplies to those services only, and the King's business has been to see the money applied according to their appropriation, of which an account at the next meeting of the Parliament has been constantly submitted to both Houses, before any farther supplies have been granted (2). In order therefore to introduce this great change in the publick income, the Commons, in the first place, voted that the revenue was expired by the vacancy of Feb. 25th the throne, and not devolved on their Majesties; and though by a long course, and the practice of some ages, the customs had been granted to the Kings for life, it was now laid down as a maxim, not to grant any revenue but from year to year, or at least for a short term of years (3). This the Whigs thought, would oblige the Kings to such a popular method of government, as should merit the constant renewal of the grant. The King

(1) Of this the preceding reigns were one continued instance. A Gentleman, who lived in the latter end of King Charles II's reign, thus recapitulates some circumstances in the House of Commons: "I remember when eleven hundred thousand pounds was given for building of ships, and not one built; and above two millions given to support the triple league, and then it was presently employed for the breaking of it; when twelve hundred thousand pounds was given for an actual war with France, when at the same time we were under all the obligations for peace, and so continued."

(2) This appropriation of the publick revenues (one of the improvements of our constitution at the Revolution) is the great fence of our liberties, as it deprives the crown of the power of disposing of these revenues at pleasure, as it necessarily occasions the having every article of the publick service discussed and approved by the Parliament, and as it is made only from year to year with regard to the supplies of the current services; so that without the annual meeting of the Parliament, the Navy, Army, Ordnance, and all the other wheels of the government are entirely stopped. By which means the measures of the court are continually examined, and any grievances laid open with such freedom and weight, as will never suffer them to be long unredressed.

(3) The annual revenue, clear of all charges in the collection, at the time of King James II's abdication, was as follows:

1. Tonnage and poundage, with the wood-farm, coal-farm, and salt-farm	600,000
2. The hereditary and temporary excise, with the additional nine-pence for the year, ending June 24. 1689.	666,383
3. Hearth-money	245,000
4. Post-office	65,000
5. Wine licenses	10,000
6. Imposition on wines and vinegar, granted for eight years, ending June 24. 1693.	172,901
7. The imposition on tobacco and sugar	148,861
8. The imposition on French linen, brandy, and silk	93,710
9. The small branches (which before the crown-lands were sold, amounted to 130,000 l.)	60,000

1689. King, who expected the same regard should be shown for him as for his predecessors, was not pleased with so precarious a revenue, which the Tories observing, they took the occasion to beget in him jealousies of his friends, and with too great success. They resolved to reconcile themselves to the King, by granting a revenue for life; but at present only to look on, till the Whigs, who carried every thing they pleased, should have refused it.

Pursuant to the maxim before-mentioned when the King's revenue was brought into consideration, it was pretended, that, as there were anticipations and charges upon it, in which many persons were concerned, they had not time to examine that matter with due care; and therefore, by a provisional act, they granted the King the revenue but for one year. This touched the King sensibly, and was so represented to him by the Earl of Nottingham, that he concluded he was in the hands of persons that did not intend to use him well. Nor indeed was it till the year 1698, that he could prevail to have the revenue settled for life.

The civil list for this year was settled at six hundred thousand pounds, to be paid out of the publick revenue, in which was included what was to be allowed to the Queen Regent, the Queen Dowager, the Prince and Princess of Denmark; the Judges and Marhal Schomberg, to whom the Parliament had given a hundred thousand pounds for the services he had done (1). A revenue of one million two hundred thousand pounds a year was also voted to be settled for the constant necessary charge of supporting the crown in the time of peace. But before this was done, and two days after the vote of the expiration of the revenue, four hundred and twenty thousand pounds had been granted for a present aid to be levied by six monthly assessments.

The Princess of Denmark depending entirely on the King for her allowance, was uneasy that no propositions had been made to her of a settlement, nor any advance of money since the King was on the throne; and therefore while the revenue was under debate, some of her friends moved, that a provision might be made for her, but being put off for that time, it was proposed again just after the birth of the Duke of Glocester, that her revenue might be advanced from thirty thousand (which was what the King allowed her) to seventy thousand pounds, which occasioned some warm expostulations from the Queen to the Princess (2); and as this sum was to be paid out of the civil list, the motion was defeated by the King's prorogation of the Parliament; nor was it, as will be seen, till the next year, that an act passed, allowing her a settlement of fifty thousand a year, which occasioned a great coldness between not only the King, but even the Queen and the Princess.

Whilst the revenue was settling, there was one branch of it which the King had a mind should be discharged. In his march through the western counties, from his first landing, he had been moved to abolish the chimney-money, and he had promised to recommend it to the Parliament. To this end he sent a message to the Commons, acquainting them, "that being sensible what a grievous burden hearth-money was to the people, especially the poorer sort, he was willing to agree either to a regulation of it, or the taking it away, not doubting but they would take care of his revenue some other way." This proved to be an act of great prudence and popularity, for which the Commons presented an address of thanks, expressed in very grateful terms, "for this unprecedented offer for the ease of his people, affording him, that they would make such returns, and be so careful of the support of the crown, that the world might see, to the discouraging of his enemies, and satisfaction of all good men, that his Majesty reigned in the hearts of his people."

But as popular as this act was, it met with such opposition from the Tories, that it ran a great hazard in the House of Lords. They alleged, That it was the only sure fund, which could never fail in war; so that money would be freely advanced upon it; and that a few regulations would take away any grievance, which might arise from it. But it was thought, they were not willing, that such an act should pass, as would render the King acceptable to the body of the nation. It was also imagined, that the prospect they then had of a speedy Revolution in favour of King James, made some of them unwilling to pass an act, which seemed to lay an obligation on him, either to maintain it, or by refusing his revenue to raise the hatred of the nation higher against him (3). However, the

1. Maintenance of seamen, and provision of naval stores ———	£ 300,000
2. Ordinary of the navy and ordnance ———	50,000
3. Guards and other disciplined troops ———	200,000
4. Garrisons, contingences, &c. ———	50,000
Total ———	600,000

This being deducted out of the whole revenue, there remained for his civil list 1,461,885 l. by which he was enabled, without any other aid, to support a large army, and maintain great numbers of Jesuits and Priests of all orders. How easy would it have been for him to have succeeded in his designs, with a revenue that placed him above the necessity of applying to the Parliament, had he taken proper methods, or had not the Revolution intervened? Hence appears the expediency of fixing boundaries to the expences of the civil list, and the importance of appropriating the rest of the publick revenue to the particular services of each year, and of submitting an account of the application of the supplies for these services, to the discussion of the Parliament.

(1) The Queen-Dowager was to have 18,200 l. 15 s. 4 d. $\frac{1}{2}$ per annum. The Judges, Masters in Chancery, and Judges of Wales, 13,800 l. per annum. The perpetuities out of the customs, (except 100 l. a year to the heirs of Colonel Fairfax) amounting to 358 l. per annum, were also to be paid.

(2) Queen Mary, it seems, expressed a great deal of displeasure at this attempt, to settle a revenue on the Prince and Princess. Taking her sister one night to talk for it, she asked her, What was the meaning of these proceedings? To which the Princess answered, She heard her friends had a mind to make her some settlement. The Queen hastily replied—Pray what friends have you but the King and me? This the Princess herself told the Dutchess of Marlborough with great concern and resentment. Conduct of D. of Marl. p. 30.

(3) By the Hearth-books it appeared, that the number of houses, in England and Wales, soon after the Restoration was about 1,230,000, and reckoning six persons at a medium to each house, it fixes the number of the people at that time to be 7,380,000.

(1) The

1689. the act was passed at last, and this badge of slavery (as it is expressed in the preamble) upon the whole people was removed, which exposed every man's house to be entered into, and searched at pleasure by persons unknown to him.

Advice of King James's landing in Ireland.
Pr. H. C. II. 277.
Feb. 27. The friends of King James had indeed some reason to expect a Revolution in his favour at this time; for now it was that the King received intelligence of his having sailed from Brest with a considerable number of French Troops, in order to land in Ireland, which being communicated to the Commons, the following address from both Houses was presented to the King.

Address of both Houses upon it.
“WE your Majesty's most dutiful and faithful subjects, the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and Commons assembled in Parliament, being highly sensible of our late great and signal deliverance from Popery and Arbitrary Power, whereof it has pleased Almighty God to make you the glorious instrument; and desiring, to the utmost of our abilities, to express our gratitude to your Majesty for so great and generous an undertaking, no less necessary to support the Protestant interest in Europe, than for recovering and maintaining the civil rights and liberties of these nations, so notoriously invaded and undermined by Popish counsels and counsellors; and being likewise fully convinced of the restless spirits and continual endeavours of your Majesty's and the nation's enemies for the extirpation of the Protestant religion, and the subversion of our laws and liberties, do unanimously declare, that we will stand by and assist your Majesty with our lives and fortunes, in supporting the alliances abroad, in reducing of Ireland, and in defence of the Protestant religion and laws of the kingdom.”

The King's answer.
Mar. 8. Pr. H. C. II. 281.
To this address the King returned a remarkable answer, said to be drawn up in concert with Mr. Powles, speaker of the House of Commons.

My Lords and Gentlemen:

“IF any thing could add to the esteem and affection I have for Parliaments, and particularly for this, they would be much increased by the kindness you shew to me, and the zeal you express for the public good, in the address you have made, which in the manner as well as the matter has every thing in it, that ought to recommend it to me.

“I will assure you, that I will never abuse the confidence you have put in me, being fully persuaded, that there is no sure foundation of a good agreement between a King and his people, but a mutual trust; when that is once broken, a Government is half dissolved.

“It shall be therefore my chief care never to give any Parliament cause to distrust me; and the best methods I can use for that purpose, is never to expect any thing from them, but what shall be their own interest to grant.

“I came hither for the good of the kingdom; and since it is your desire that I am in this station, I shall pursue the same ends that brought me.

“God has been pleased to make me instrumental to redeem you from the ills you feared; and it is still my desire, as well as my duty, to serve you in your religion, laws, and liberties.”
No. 4. Vol. III.

ties; which was the only inducement, that brought me into England; and to these I ascribe the blessings, that have attended this undertaking.

“When I spoke last to you, I told you of the necessity of assisting our allies, and more especially the States of Holland, whose readiness to relieve you, at so great a hazard and expence, from the extremities you lay under, needs no other argument to move you to the consideration of it.

“As I was then a witness of their zeal and affection to promote the expedition, and to second my endeavours, even with the neglect of their own safety; so I am now sensible of the inevitable ruin, they have drawn upon themselves in giving you their assistance, if you should not return it to them.

“They have really exhausted themselves to such a degree, both as to men and money, that it is not easily to be imagined; and I am confident your generosity will have as little bounds towards them, as theirs had towards you; and that you will not only enable me to make good the treaty with them, and repay what they have actually laid out upon this occasion, (of which an account shall be given you) but that you will further support them, to the utmost of your ability, against the power of their enemies, who must be yours too by their interest, and their religion, and do certainly design the Ruin of Holland to be a step to your destruction.

“I need not take pains to tell you the deplorable condition of Ireland, which, by the zeal and violence of the Popish party there, and by the assistance and encouragement they have from France, is brought to that pass, that it is not advisable to attempt the reducing of it but by a considerable force; which, I think, ought not to be less than twenty thousand horse and foot, which, by the blessing of God, will make the work shorter, and in consequence the charge easier, though the first expence must of necessity be very great.

“You are to consider, that towards the most speedy and effectual success in relation to Ireland, as well as with regard to France, there must be such a fleet, as may, in conjunction with the States, make us so intirely masters of that sea, that nothing may be sent from France to Ireland, or any where else, that may give disturbance to us or our allies.

“I must also recommend to you the consideration of the revenue to me, that it may be so settled, as that it may be collected without dispute.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

“These things will amount to a great sum, and must of consequence be a present weight upon the people: but considering neither your religion nor your safety can probably be secured without these means, I conclude, nothing can be too great a price for their preservation. And I will engage my solemn word to you, that whatever you shall give to these public ends, shall be strictly applied to them; and that as you so freely offer to hazard all that is dear to you, so I shall as freely expose myself for the support of the Protestant religion, and the safety and honour of the nation.”

The King's of regard for the Dutch.

The King had a just sense of what the States of the United-Provinces, had done towards the preservation of the religion and liberties of England. He had the very day of his advancement to the throne, sent them a letter to assure them, "that his new dignity, instead of diminishing the affections he ever had, and the care he ever took, for the preservation and prosperity of their Republick, would only serve to enable him to discharge his office of Stadtholder, with more weight and success, towards the good and advantage of their State; and that during his reign, he would make it his constant business and endeavour, to establish and maintain a perfect intelligence, alliance and inviolable friendship, between his kingdoms and the United Provinces, for the safety, welfare and repose, of both estates; and the support of the Protestant religion." As the King therefore thought it highly reasonable, that the States should be repaid, as soon as possible, what they had laid out in his expedition; he took all occasions to put the Commons in mind of it, and particularly in this speech; pursuant to which, an account of the charges of the expedition was indeed taken, and the sum of six hundred thousand pounds, voted for that purpose, but it was not till the end of the session, that a fund was settled for raising the money (1).

A bill concerning the Militia.
Burnet.

After the revenue, an attempt was made concerning the Militia. A bill was prepared for settling it in such a manner, that the management of it would in great measure, be taken both from the King, and from the Lord Lieutenants. These being generally Peers, a bill that so much lessened their authority, could not but be obstructed in the House of Lords; accordingly, it was suffered to lie on the table. By this proceeding, which was chiefly promoted by the Whigs, as well as by that of the revenue; the King came to think, that those who had raised him to the throne, intended to depress his power, as much as they had exalted his person. He seemed to grow jealous of his prerogatives, the importance of each being aggravated by the Earl of Nottingham, who had given him a scheme of all the particular points, and their dependance one on another. He was so possessed with the Earl's representations, that many of those who had formerly most of his confidence, found a coldness growing upon him, which increased their disgust; and made them apprehend, they should see another reign full of prerogative maxims.

As the Whigs were disappointed in their Militia-bill, so they could not be brought to another point, though often pressed to it by the King. This was an act of indemnity, which with proper exceptions of some criminals, the King thought would very much settle the minds of the nation. Accordingly the King sent a message to each house, expressing his earnest desire that they would prepare a bill, for a general pardon; with such exceptions only, as to them should seem necessary for the vindication of public justice, in order to free great numbers of people from the guilt, reproaches and penalties, they were liable to. But how zealous soever, the King was for an act of indemnity, the warmth of the Whigs would not promote it. They thought it best to keep many under the lash; they intended severe revenges for the blood, that had been shed, and for the many unjust things, which had been done in the end of King Charles II's reign. They saw, that the clogging the indemnity with many comprehensive exceptions, would create King James a great party; so they did not think proper to offer at that: Yet they resolved to keep them still in their power, till a better opportunity for falling on them should offer itself. They proceeded therefore so slowly in the affair, that the bill could not be brought to a ripeness during this session. It is true, the great mildness of the king's temper, and the gentleness of his government, which was indeed rather liable to censure, as being too remiss, set people's minds much at ease. And if it gave too much boldness to those, who began to set up an open opposition to him, yet it gained upon the greater part of the nation, who saw none of those moving spectacles, that had been so common in former reigns; and all promised themselves happy days under so merciful a Prince. But angry men put a wicked construction on the earnestness the King shewed for the act of indemnity: they said, he intended to make use of a set of prerogative men, as soon as he legally could; and that therefore he desired the instruments of King James's illegal government might be once secured, that so he might employ them. The Earls of Monmouth and Warrington, were infusing jealousies of the King into their party, with the same industry, that the Earl of Nottingham was at the same time, infilling into the King jealousies of them; and both acted with too much success, which brought great confusion into the course of affairs. For though the Earls of Shrewsbury and Devonshire did all they could

This account looks as if it was drawn for so much sterling; but by the particulars, and by the sum granted by the Parliament for its discharge, it is plain, it must be for so many Guilders, which at one shilling and ten-pence half-penny each, were equivalent to about 686,500 l. sterling at that time.

May 9.

The next thing of importance was to pass an act, for declaring the rights and liberties of the subject, and settling the succession of the crown (as had been agreed by the Convention) to the King and Queen and their issue, and after them to the Princess Ann and her issue, and after these, to the King and his issue, by another Queen. Accordingly a bill was sent up by the Commons to the Lords, for that purpose; with a clause disabling all Papists from succeeding to the crown, to which the Lords added, or such as should marry Papists. To this was proposed by the Bishop of Salisbury, an additional clause absolving the subject, in that case, from allegiance. This was seconded by the Earl of Shrewsbury, and it passed without any opposition or debate. That prelate was ordered by the King to propose the naming of the Princess Sophia, Duchess of Hanover, and her posterity, next in the succession; the King signified his pleasure in this also to his Ministers. The Duke of Hanover was now changing his former measures, and separating himself from the interests of France. The Lords agreed to the proposition, and, amongst other amendments of the Bill, added a proviso in the

Princess Sophia's favour. The bill thus amended was returned to the Commons, where it occasioned great debates, and the House disagreed to the Lords proviso: Mr. Hampden pressed it vehemently, but the Tories and also Wildman, and all the republican party, opposed it. Their fiercest reason seemed to be a design to extinguish monarchy, and therefore to substitute none beyond the three who were named, that so the succession might quickly come to an end. But it not being decent to own this, all that they pretended was, that there being many in the lineal succession, after the three that were named, who were then of the Church of Rome, the leaving to them the possibility to succeed, upon their turning protestants, might have a good effect on them, and dispose them to hearken to instruction; all which would be defeated by a declaration in favour of the House of Hanover, besides, that the mentioning that house would give an opportunity to foreigners of intermeddling too far in the affairs of the nation; and that a Parliament of England had never determined the degrees of succession beyond two or three persons. The King, who wished nothing more earnestly than to see the crown settled in the Protestant line, used his utmost endeavours to bring the commons to a compliance with the Lords, declaring in council, that his Queen, and both the Prince and Princess of Denmark, desired it as well as himself. The Lords likewise warmly insisted on their clause, alledging "That though in the instrument offered to the King and Queen, the limitation went no farther than to their persons; yet in law, which has respect to all succeeding ages, and that settles for ever the liberties of the subject, they thought it reasonable to carry the limitation of the succession of the crown farther than was necessary in that instrument, in which the crown was offered to their Majesties, and that had no other view but of the succession of their posterity. 2. That they could see no danger, nor any ill consequence, that might follow a further limitation, but very much to the contrary. For, this secured the nation effectually from the danger of having a Papist to reign in it at any time hereafter, since of such a number of Papists, as stood next the Crown in the lineal Succession, some might be prevailed on to make a show of changing their religion, if they had a prospect of succeeding to the Crown upon it; and no danger being so great as the having one, who is a pretended Protestant, but in truth a concealed Papist, to reign over us; the most effectual way to secure our religion, was, to declare the succession in a family, that was known to be Protestant. In the next place, it was the interest of England, at present, to do right to that great house, by limiting this succession according to the Provision. For since this limitation had been proposed, if it should be now laid aside, it would look like excluding that house, which might provoke them to take a resolution, that might be of great prejudice to the nation in this present conjuncture."

These reasons being communicated to the Commons, several conferences were held between the two houses, but to no effect; for both Houses adhered, and the bill, after depending two months, was dropped on the birth of the Duke of Glocester, son of the Prince and Princess of Denmark, born the 27th of July, and christened William; the King, and the Earl of Dorset (standing for his Danish Majesty) being godfathers, and the Marchioness of Halifax godmother. The birth of this Prince greatly contributed to dissipate the fears of a Popish successor. Though the bill of Rights was thus laid aside for the present, it was resolved to resume it at the opening of the next session, the success of which shall be mentioned here, to put an end to this matter at once. When the time came, the King did not think it convenient to renew the motion of the Princess of Hanover, and ordered the Bishop of Salisbury to acquaint her with all particulars. It was proper to have a bill passed, that enacted the exclusion of all Papists. For by that means, the succession was in a manner brought to her door. And if any in the line before her should pretend to change, as it was not very likely to happen, so it would not be easily believed. Wherefore it was resolved to carry the succession no farther at this time. The bill passed the Commons, without any opposition; and being sent to the Lords, they justly considering how far King James had gone towards introducing the popish religion into the nation, took special care to prevent the like for the future, by adding a clause to the bill, "That the Kings and Queens of England should be obliged, at their coming to the crown, to take the Test in the first Parliament that should be called at the beginning of their reign; and that if any King or Queen of England should embrace the Roman Catholick religion, or marry with a Roman Catholick Prince or Princess, their subjects should be absolved of their allegiance; and that the crown and government of these realms should from time to time descend to, and be enjoyed by such persons, being Protestants, as should have inherited the same, in case the said persons so reconciled to the Church of Rome, or marrying a Papist as aforesaid, were naturally dead."

This remarkable clause passed without any opposition or debate, which considering the great importance of it, was very surprising; and being agreed to by the Commons, the whole bill was at 1689. last presented to the King for the royal assent. This act rehearses not only the foregoing clause, but the whole declaration of the rights and liberties of the subject, offered on the 13th of February to their Majesties, and establishes them to be the rights and liberties of the people of England; recognizes that King James II. having abdicated the government, their Majesties are King and Queen; settles the succession, and obliges every King and Queen, at the time of their taking the coronation-oath, to subscribe, and audibly repeat the declaration of the 30th of Charles II.; and enacts, that no dispensation by non-obstante, or to any statute shall be allowed, unless mentioned in such statute (1).

By these acts the new settlement in England was completed, as far as the enemies to the Revolution would permit. For that the constitution was not brought to greater perfection; that the Declaration of Rights was not more full, and proportionable to the importance of the occasion and favourable circumstances of the conjuncture; 1689 and that all grounds of political and religious divisions were not removed, was entirely owing to faction, discontent, prejudice, disappointment and the like. Whilst the event of things was uncertain, men remained under the full influence of their fears, which made them act contrary to their prejudices. But when the Revolution was secure, and these fears calmed, these prejudices resumed their former power, and made them argue and reason in contradiction to what most of their leaders had acted. This has already appeared, and will more fully appear in the course of the History (2).

It is now time to turn to Scotland, and see by what steps and how far the Revolution was established in that Kingdom. After that, the affairs of Ireland will require the reader's attention.

As to the affairs in Scotland (3) at this time, it will be proper to premise, that the Declaration which the Prince of Orange had caused to be published in Scotland, Ken. Crawford. p. 234.

(1) It may not be amiss to repeat here the rights and liberties which by this act are established:

- " 1. That the pretended power of suspending of laws, or execution of laws, by regal authority, without consent of Parliament, is illegal.
- " 2. That the pretended power of dispensing with laws, or the execution of laws, by regal authority, as it hath been assumed and exercised of late, is illegal.
- " 3. That the commission for erecting the late Court of Commissioners for ecclesiastical causes, and all other Commissions and Courts of the like nature, are illegal and pernicious.
- " 4. That the levying of money for or to the use of the crown, by pretence of prerogative, without grant of Parliament, for longer time, or in any other manner than the same is, or shall be granted, is illegal.
- " 5. That it is the right of the subjects to petition the King, and all commitments and prosecutions for such petitioning, are illegal.
- " 6. That the raising or keeping a standing army within the kingdom in time of peace, unless it be with consent of Parliament, is against law.
- " 7. That the subjects, which are Protestants, may have arms for their defence, suitable to their condition, and as allowed by law.
- " 8. That election of members of Parliament ought to be free.
- " 9. That the freedom of speech, and debates or proceedings in Parliament, ought not to be impeached or questioned, in any court or place out of Parliament.
- " 10. That excessive bail ought not to be required, nor excessive fines imposed, nor cruel and unusual punishments inflicted.
- " 11. That Jurors ought to be duly empannelled and returned; and Jurors, which pass upon men in trials for high-treason, ought to be Freeholders.
- " 12. That all grants and promises, of fines and forfeitures of particular persons, before conviction, are illegal and void.
- " 13. And that for redress of all grievances, and for the amending, strengthening, and preserving of the laws, Parliaments ought to be held frequently."

See Rapin, Vol. II. p. 794.

(2) It was at this time suggested in all companies, that the present settlement was illegal and unjustifiable: that King James would shortly return with a powerful army, and settle things on a right foundation: that the interest of the Church of England was involved with that of King James, and the one could not subsist without the restoration of the other. As these insinuations were countenanced by some of the Clergy, Bishop Burnet wrote a pastoral letter to those of his diocese, concerning the allegiance due to King William and Queen Mary, in which, among other topics, he uses that of the right of conquest, which had been always declined by the King, who chose to receive the crown by the determination of the people, as more agreeable to his declaration. This pastoral letter (with another of Charles Blunt, more full to the same purpose) was burnt three years after, by order of the Parliament then sitting. A little before the publication of the Bishop's letter, a libel was dispersed by the disaffected, called, A short history of the Convention, or new-christened Parliaments, against which a proclamation was issued, May 7, promising the reward of a hundred pound for the discovery of the author, printer or publisher.

(3) The Earl of Belcarra, who was a very zealous opposer of the Revolution, has written An account of the affairs of Scotland relating to the Revolution in 1688, as sent to the late King James II. when in France, which was first printed at London in 1714 in 8vo. From this piece it will be proper to make some extracts in these notes, in order that they may be compared with the other accounts of the same facts given in the body of this history. "Never Kings, (says he) succeeded to a crown or throne more with the love and esteem of his subjects than your Majesty did generally to all Scotland, of all professions; nor could any thing have disturbed your happy reign, but the jealousies and fears, that were industriously spread abroad, as if you had designed, by giving a general liberty of conscience, to ruin the religion then established. If that had not been too much believed, and the fears of again encouraging by such a liberty the Fanatics, then almost entirely ruined, there would have been few, that would have refused to comply with all your Majesty's demands in Parliament. But the fears of bringing back the fanatic party, then scattered through the world, that were always lying in wait for every opportunity to ruin the monarchy, and all those, who were faithful in it, made even your faithfullest subjects comply but with an unwilling mind, considering, that such a Toleration would again set up a party, that had cost so much care, time, and treasure, to destroy."

"The Earl of Murray, not succeeding in that Parliament because of these apprehensions, and his small skill in managing such an affair, where there were so many interests to unite; your Majesty dissolved that Parliament, and issued out a proclamation of indulgence and toleration to all persuasions."

"This put the Episcopal Clergy in such a rage, that they could not conceal it neither in discourses nor pulpits; and the Presbyterians grew so insolent with it, upon the letter your Majesty wrote to them, then assembled at Edinburgh, wherein you told them

" your

1689. sed to be dispersed in Scotland, had a great deal of influence upon the body of the people. But the 1689.

" your predecessors had been severe, and ruined several of them, but they might be confident of your protection against all their enemies.

" This and the Earl of Melfort's employing James Stuart to draw most of the publick papers sent down, who was known to be a professed and inveterate enemy to the crown and their order, made the Episcopal Clergy at that time say and do many things, which afterwards they heartily repented, when it was too late; for their dislike of the greatest part of the nation, and their jealousy misfortunately meeting with the inveterate malice of the Presbyterians, gave the greatest advantage could have been wished for to the unbounded ambition of the Prince of Orange; for nothing ever made him make so bold an attempt, but these divisions, and the jealousies, that were industriously spread abroad, few being satisfied. The Episcopal Clergy or Party, out of fear to lose what they had long possessed; and though the Presbyterians for a few months first after the getting their liberty seemed satisfied, yet some grew as malicious as ever, being disappointed of getting the government into their hands, as they hoped, and a revenge on their enemies.

" The order your Majesty sent down commanding all in any office, either civil or military, to give up their commissions, and take up new ones, without taking the test; this made all employments liable to several penalties of the laws, and occasioned a great consternation; but not near to what by another order all in employments were commanded to take out remissions for breaking of the laws, which they had done by your Majesty's command, by which they thought themselves sufficiently warranted; as may appear by a letter the Council sent to your Majesty, wherein not only they, but the Judges gave it as their opinion, that your Majesty's giving a commission was sufficient to hinder any being liable to the law, especially considering, that the penalty was due to yourself. But notwithstanding of this advice, a severe proclamation was sent down by the Earl of Melfort, that all should take out these remissions in three months, and pay for them three pounds sterling to himself, and twenty pounds to James Stuart, who was to give them out; and such as did not take them out, to be pursued for breach of law, and to be rendered incapable for ever thereafter of your mercy. This was thought very hard, even by the loyallest of your subjects, to be paying for such remissions, and especially to be giving so much to Mr. Stuart; that had but some months before got a remission for plotting and contriving against your Majesty and Government, and was generally believed at that time by all, that wished well to your Majesty's Government, to be under-hand betraying it. Nor have their apprehensions been false; for since the Revolution he has bragged to hundreds, that he gave several advices, designedly to ruin it, and to advance the interest of his friends.

" When first this order was read in council, all were silent; but next day a representation was sent up to your Majesty, both by the Council and Secret Committee, to show how inconvenient it would be, if such an order were proclaimed; nor was there any man more against it than your Chancellor, [the Earl of Perth] and those you trusted most. Your Majesty was pleased, on these representations, to discharge its being pressed; but it gave such bad impressions of some, who were employed, that nothing will ever take it off; and it was generally believed, that nothing but your Majesty's own goodness could have hindered a thing, that would have been so advantageous to the contrivers, though dishonourable to all that served you. Nothing vexed the Episcopal Clergy more at that time, than to see some Fanatics put both into Council and Session; but all these contents were but like smothered fire, until the birth of the Prince of Wales, which afterwards broke out more violently; for, after that, several of the Episcopal Clergy were so far misled, that they

" left off in a few weeks the praying for the Prince of Wales, and were so apt, not only to believe the most calumnious reports of that time, but to insinuate in their people fears of Popery and arbitrary Government; which did no small prejudice, and made many, that have appeared since of a far different temper, extremely satisfied at the noise of the Prince of Orange's coming over, being so weak as to believe he had made such an attempt only to secure the laws, and relieve them of their fears. But these discontents of the Episcopal party, though they cannot be justified, yet they proceeded from jealousies more than any ill design against your Majesty's government. But the Presbyterians being encouraged from their friends in England, and the rebels, who fled into Holland, growing then more insolent than ever, being put in hopes again, by another way, of getting entirely the government in their own hands, and a revenge on their enemies, which were the two things they so long wished to have an opportunity for, but would never have attained the same, if the Indulgence granted them had not brought them together from the West-Indies, so that they appeared in far greater numbers, than could well have been believed to be yet remaining after so long a tract of discouragement, they not only were joined together, but many, that never were of that profession before, joined with them, as all the discontented of the nation has ever done since the Revolution; making religion always the pretext of gaining their other ends.

" The jealousy of the Catholics did not a little heighten the discontents of both these parties likewise; and though they were not so afraid of them as of each other, because of their small number; yet with very uneasy eyes they beheld them coming into the chief posts both in civil and military employments. And though the Presbyterians, by the liberty granted to all, had their share; and were also admitted into employments, which they had never before, but when necessity compelled former Kings; yet they were so far from being thankful for it, that both in their pulpits and conversation they openly declared, they thought themselves nothing obliged to any toleration they had, it being given to introduce the Catholics, and ruin Protestants among themselves. Nor were these jealousies and apprehensions only among the Clergy; for after your Majesty had given warrant to the Chancellor, Viscount of Tarbat, and myself, to inquire of all the officers of State, Judges, and officers of the army, their opinion and consent for taking off the Penal Laws and Tests; most of them, though they consented to it, yet had such a cruel apprehension of other things further to be pressed upon them, that it made them extremely uneasy. And the turning out Sir George Mackenzie from being your Advocate, and the Lord Harriss and Edmiston from the session, for refusing to consent to what was offered, heightened extremely the humour; for they were esteemed of the greatest integrity and learning of that judicatory; and it seems not without reason; for though they were humorous, yet after, and since the Revolution, they both behaved themselves exactly well, and refused all the offers of employment which were made them.

" Except for these fears and jealousies, that were spread like a plague through the land; and the too covetous taking of money by some of your servants, (but that I will not meddle with, being resolved to say nothing here but what conflicts with my own knowledge) all other things in the government were as easy, and managed with as much justice as was ever known in any age. For never was a Treasury and Exchequer more favourable in all sorts of compositions, which your Majesty allowed us to do; nor was there ever before in the council or session more justice and quick dispatch of business, nor soldiers better paid, and with less trouble in the country; which the worst of your enemies must acknowledge."

(1) This

1689. the Bishops and Episcopal Clergy being devoted to the Court, had been drawn in to a more than ordinary profession of adherence to King James. For upon the news of the Prince's expedition, they were induced to write the following Letter to the King:

May it please your most sacred Majesty,

Letter of the Bishops to King
James.

"WE prostrate ourselves to pay our most devoted thanks and adoration to the sovereign Majesty of Heaven and Earth, for preserving your sacred life and person, so frequently exposed to the greatest hazards, and as often delivered, and you miraculously prospered with glory and victory, in defence of the Rights and Honour of your Majesty's august Brother, and of these Kingdoms; and that by his merciful goodness the raging of the sea, and madness of unreasonable men, have been stilled and calmed; and your Majesty, as the darling of Heaven, peaceably seated on the Throne of your Royal Ancestors, whose long, illustrious, and unparalleled Line is the greatest Glory of this your antient Kingdom.

"We pay our most humble gratitude to your Majesty for the repeated assurances of your royal protection to our National Church and Religion, as the laws have established them; which are very suitable to the gracious countenance, encouragement, and protection, your Majesty was pleased to afford to our Church and Order, whilst we were happy in your presence among us.

"We magnify the Divine Mercy in blessing your Majesty with a Son, and us with a Prince,

"whom we pray Heaven may bless and preserve, to sway your royal sceptres after you; and that he may inherit, with your dominions, the illustrious and heroic virtues of his august and most serene Parents.

"We are amazed to hear of the danger of an invasion from Holland, which excites our prayers for an universal repentance from all orders of men, that God may yet spare his people, preserve your Royal Person, and prevent the effusion of Christian blood; and to give such success to your Majesty's arms, that all, who invade your Majesty's just and undoubted Rights, and disturb or interrupt the peace of your Realms, may be disappointed, and clothed with shame, so that on your Royal Head the Crown may still flourish.

"As, by the grace of God, we shall preserve in ourselves a firm and unshaken Loyalty; so we shall be careful and zealous to promote in all your subjects an intrepid and steadfast allegiance to your Majesty, as an essential part of their religion, and of the Glory of our holy profession; not doubting, but that God, in his great Mercy, who hath so often preserved and delivered your Majesty, will still preserve and deliver you, by giving you the hearts of your subjects, and the Necks of your enemies. So pray we, who in all humility are, &c. (1)

This Letter was fatal, not only to the Scotch Fatal to Bishops, but even to Episcopacy itself in Scotland; for the distinction was very apparent, in Scotland, the Presbyterians fell in with the Revolution (2), and

(2) Lord Belcarra gives the following account of the circumstances of the Revolution in Scotland. "In this condition [mentioned in the preceding note] was the Kingdom till September 1688, when your Majesty sent down an express to your secret committee, which consisted of your Chancellor, Marquis of Annandale, Viscount Tarbat, Archbishop of Glasgow, Sir George Lockhart, and myself, to let us know, you expected an invasion from Holland; which at first was thought by the generality of the nation to be absolutely impossible, and only a pretext to raise money, or draw the army together for other designs, which added still to former jealousies. But these mistaken fears were quickly suppressed, when they knew of such preparations, as your Majesty was making in England, and were likewise affirmed by seamen coming daily from Holland of great preparations there, and noise of a war quickly to break out. Your Majesty's Council appeared all of them ready and willing to concur in every thing, that could be offered for making the nation as capable as could be for serving

"you. And it seemed for a time the noise of foreign war had banished their jealousies and fears from among them; and from all quarters of the country the Gentlemen and Burghesses sent to the Council new offers of duty. The militia was ordered to be raised and modelled to a fourth part; and the forty days pay, which the country is obliged to of the whole, would have paid this fourth part six months. The castle of Edinburgh, Stirling, &c. furnished; the Gentry modelled into troops with arms, and orders sent to the chiefs of the Highland Clans, to have their men in readiness; which with the standing forces would have made a considerable army.

"On the first notice of the invasion, Captain Mackay, nephew to the Major-General, was taken up upon suspicion of having laid down his employment in Holland, to be the better able to serve the Prince of Orange in what he intended; which was reasonable to believe by a letter found upon him, written by himself to his uncle, wherein he expressed great affection to the service of the Prince of Orange, and desired his uncle to let him know, that though he had quitted his service, yet he hoped, in the condition he was now in, he could be more useful; which he was willing to do with the hazard of his life; and that he wanted only to know, how he might put his intention in execution. He was examined by a secret committee several times, but gave his oath frankly, he knew nothing of any design, nor meant nothing by these expressions but a compliment to the Prince, who had concerned himself in getting him a rich marriage. But after the Prince of Orange's coming over, he bragged of knowing all the Design, and valued himself for swearing frankly rather than discover.

"There was likewise taken one Blackadder, a Doctor of Physic, who was sent over by the banished Lords and Gentlemen in Holland, to encourage their friends, and give them an account of the inclinations

1689. and the episcopal party used their utmost endeavours to obstruct and oppose it. Hence, upon the news of King James's being withdrawn, the Lord Chancellor (the Earl of Perth) resigned imme-“clinations and affections of the people to the Prince of Orange's interest. The only traffick could be made out against him, (for he likewise would disclose nothing, but rather perjure himself of what he knew) was betwixt Lord Murray, son to the Marquis of Anandale, and one Murray of Tippermore. For by a letter taken on him from Mr Murray to the Lord Murray, he told him he had delivered his message to the Prince of Orange, who received it very kindly, and desired Blackadder to give him an account weekly of all that passed, and to let him know, how the Nation stood affected to the Prince of Orange. More might certainly be known from the Doctor, if the Marquis of Anandale, who had been laying in wait from the first noise of the Invasion, for a pretext to appear discontent, had not taken this opportunity. He complained highly, that any, who belonged to him, should be suspected; and that all the work made against Blackadder, was only designed against his Family. So, to satisfy him, the Doctor was no farther meddled with, that he might not have the least ground, at such a time, to complain. But all this did not satisfy him; for in all meetings, both in secret committee and council, he affected an air chagrin and discontent; tho', to please him, we were too indulgent to his humours. Yet a little while after, pretending sickness, he retired into the country, until he was assured of the landing of the Prince of Orange; and then he returned and acted a part more to the prejudice of your Interests, than the most inveterate of your enemies was then able to do. The chief reason he gave for his discontent, was family piques betwixt him and the Earl of Perth, and fears of his doing him ill deeds. But it was known to all the Nation, that his hopes of advancing his interest by the Prince of Orange, on the account of his relation by his Lady, was the chief motive of all his actions, or at the least, by his seeming discontent with the present government, he thought he would secure himself of all that your Majesty had bestowed on him too prodigally. After he withdrew, every thing went on smoothly in council; and even the Western and Fanatick Gentry were contending for employments in the militia troops; but by what afterwards appeared, it was with a design to betray.

“Nor was there any of them more forward in offering their service than Sir James Montgomery, tho' at the same time he was assisting the Lord Lorn to borrow a considerable sum of money to carry him to Holland. The reason given for borrowing this money, was to make a present to the Countess of Melfert; nor could they have found a pretext that would have passed more easily; for it was reasonably believed; otherwise, the lending such a sum by such disaffected persons, at so critical a time, could not have missed to be suspected, and his journey stopped. One Mr. Campbell was sent over by the Lord S, to invite him over by warrant from the Prince of Orange, but I believe told little of the design, tho' Sir James bragged after the Revolution, of his knowing all, and of his having messages from the Prince of Orange, but was contradicted by all, who were intrusted in it, who were few enough. This was the first appearance of Sir James Montgomery; nor had he any manner of influence, except with some few of the most bigotted Fanatics, who had made a party, and exclaimed against the rest of their profession for accepting of the indemnity, or taking any favour from the government; nor would any thing please them, nor could any fix of them agree, being left to their discretion. But notwithstanding these divisions, all parties kept within bounds, until the calling away of the standing forces, when the government was left bare, and at the discretion of their enemies.

“About the beginning of September your Majesty

“ordered the Earl of Perth to let you know, how the Presbyterian Ministers intended to behave themselves at the juncture, judging, as they behaved, their followers would follow their example. But he believing very justly, that they would not use freedom with him, desired me to employ some person to try their pulse. Sir Patrick M—— was one then, that had not attached himself apparently to any party, but was generally well with all parties. I desired him to go to some of the leading men, that were then assembled in town, and tell them, from whom he was sent, and that your Majesty, considering the many favours you had shewn them, expected they would now show their gratitude in influencing their people to join heartily against the unnatural invasion; and that, according to their present behaviour, they might expect favour and protection from you for the future. They answered him dryly, they were but a few then, but in a fortnight there would be a general meeting of them all; that then they doubted not but they would give your Majesty satisfaction, with such answers. When the time came, they put off giving any positive answer, until they had new assurances from their friends in Holland, and made high with expectations, that the Prince of Orange would put all the government both of Church and State in their hands; and then they sent me word by Sir Patrick M——, that they owned God had made the King an instrument of shewing them some favour; but since they were convinced, that what favour was shewn them, was only with a design to ruin the Protestant religion, they would meddle no more with him, nor have any communion with any that belonged to him, especially since he had employed in the chief offices Papists or persons popishly inclined; and so desired to be excused from giving any farther answer, but that they would behave in this juncture as God would inspire them. This answer shewed plainly, what was to be expected from them; and from that time forward, both they and the Gentry of their party took little pains to disguise their resolutions. But still fears of accidents kept them from doing any thing the government could publicly punish; nor were any of them thoroughly in the affair, or trusted in it, so much as to make them venture any thing for what they so much desired. If any was thoroughly trusted, it was the Earl of A——le then at London. At the beginning of the indulgence he turned Fanatick; but in a few months was wearied of it, and came to the Earl of Perth, and told him, it was only his youth that misled him, in joining with such rebellious, mutinous pack; but henceforward he would serve the King heartily; and that he intended to go for London immediately, and to offer his service. Therefore, he desired his recommendation, which he got, and was very kindly entertained by your Majesty, and at first was to have the Earl of A——y's troop of horse; but the Earl of A——y coming up, and not being willing to part with it, he had the promise of a regiment, which he was to raise in the southern counties; but finding your Majesty's affairs in greater disorder than he imagined, he chose rather to join with some of the disaffected Lords in England. The first he proposed to was the Earl of D——k. He told him, he found by the company he kept constantly, that he was not satisfied with the present government, and that he was as much dissatisfied himself as any, though he was forced to dissimble it, until he had got something done he came for: that he was resolved never to draw sword against the Prince of Orange; and that if he and his friends would trust him, he would serve them faithfully, and run their fate. The Earl of D——k told him, he was joined with others, and could not act without their liberty, but he should speak to them of it, and give an answer. The next day he appointed him to meet him

1689. immediately the Great Seal, and endeavoured to escape into France, but being taken was confined in Stirling castle; and the populace of Edinburgh insulted, not only the Papists, but also the

him in the city with the Duke of Ormond, Mr. B——ll and Mr. Maul, who belonged to the Princess of Denmark. After they had dined, the Earl of D——k told him, he had spoke to Prince George, and the rest then with him, of what he had offered: that they all accepted willingly of it, but expected, that he would give an oath of secrecy the most binding way they could demand, which he also readily promised. So Mr. Maul officiated, and gave him the Sacrament, and he took the oath, that he would go in with them to the Prince of Orange, whenever he landed. But when it came to the push, his heart failed him, and he excused himself, that he had got a misfortune, for which, when the Prince of Orange came to London, he was for some days in the messenger's hands, which made him immediately quit them, and join with those intended to serve your Majesty in the following convention.

What more of this kind of treachery was carried on, I cannot be positive, for I believe very few Scotsmen were concerned in it; for I doubt not, if they had, but they would have valued themselves in it with the rest, for several did so, that were not concerned; nor could any such treacherous designs have been concealed, considering the pains both the secret committee and council took to find them out. And how entirely well affected to your Majesty was the little army you had in Scotland, which was so advantageously posted through the kingdom, that even the most disaffected lived peaceably expecting the event? But so soon as your Majesty sent your orders that they should be brought together, and be in readiness to march into England, then all discontented people and fanatics in the nation thought they had hit on their own time, believing your Majesty's affairs in England must be in a miserable condition, when you had need of so small a force, and for it to leave a government naked, and lose a whole country, which otherwise might have been so useful to you.

When first the Earl of Melfort, by your Majesty's order, wrote of it to the secret committee, they immediately sent an express to lay before your Majesty the inconvenience of it; and likewise to propose a design they had with it, and modelled the militia, and a detachment of the Highlanders, to make an army of thirteen thousand men, with half year's pay, to have lain either upon the borders of Scotland, or in the north of England; which certainly would have hindered all those risings in the north of England, which made a noise so far above what really they were, and proved so prejudicial to your affairs. But instead of following this advice, which was the unanimous advice of the whole council, the Earl of Melfort wrote down an order, not subscribed by your Majesty, but only in your Majesty's name, ordering, that the army should immediately march, and that if any of your servants were afraid to stay behind, they might go along with the army. With a sorrowful heart your Majesty's orders were obeyed, for the consequences were too evident; so about the beginning of October they began their march. The council, after that, ordered the modelled militia to be brought together about Edinburgh, and some to be quartered in the suburbs; but the new raised men, that would quickly have been brought into order, if mingled with modelled troops, signified little to keep up the face of authority; nor was their commander Sir George Monro, better at his trade than the rest, having lost any thing he had learned in Germany long ago, nor had he retained any thing, but affected nastiness, brutality, and fanaticism. Necessity, and the recommendation of some, more out of friendship to him than the service, persuaded the council to give him a commission, until your Majesty's pleasure should be known, which afterwards you confirmed.

The Presbyterians and discontented party seeing the miserable and abandoned condition your affairs were in, took their opportunity accordingly; for so soon as the army past the borders, Edinburgh was filled with numbers of them of all degrees, from all places in the kingdom, who then thought it safe to take off their masks, and meet publicly in several clubs, where they deliberated, as formerly, what was fit for them to do in that juncture, as if they had been allowed by authority. And the council and secret committee knew, from some spies they had amongst them, all that past at their meetings; yet they were forced to overlook what they had not force to suppress. The chiefs of these meetings were the Earl of G——n, Earl C——d, Earl D——d, Earl T——s, Lord R——s, Lord M——n, a Fanatic, a few months before put into the Session; Sir J——s M——y, A——r younger, Mr. W——m H——n, Mr. W——m L——t, Mr. y of Philiphaugh, R——n, D——d, B——e of Grenock, M——m, L——n, Master of Burley, Mr. F——s, M——y, Major B——n, of Baillie-Hall, G——s S——g Chirurgeon, one M——s a Merchant, B——e of Bramhall, P——r, R——y L——t, the Master of Melvil, Lord B——y, Sir P——k M——y, O——n, &c. Several joined with them afterwards, but these were the chief beginners and headmen among them, until the banished rebels from Holland met them at London, and eclipsed them. The Presbyterian ministers did not publicly meet them, but, according to their ancient custom, nothing was determined without their advice and approbation. One of the first things they took into consideration, was, how to hinder all correspondence betwixt your Majesty and your council, which Sir James Montgomery undertook, and did it so effectually, that few packets missed him, which was easy to be done, having correspondence both about Berwick and the north of England. Yet notwithstanding all the care they took, some posts came thro', until the rising of the northern countries in England with the Earl of Danby and Lord Lunley; then they opened all packets, and only suffered such letters to pass as they thought fit: Some expresses were sent down by the Earl of Melfort to his brother; but for fear of discouraging, always made things so much better than what was reported by these meetings at Edinburgh, or other letters that came down; that the secret committee was in great perplexity to know the truth. This obliged them also to seize the packet, and open the letters; but it had so often been done before, both by the discontented party in Scotland, and the Lords in the north of England, that there was little or nothing learned by it. For several weeks after there came neither packets nor express; at last one came with an account of the landing of the Prince of Orange, and that your Majesty had marched down to meet him. Still the Earl of Melfort gave his brother all the hopes imaginable; but the Earl of D——e wrote in so different terms to me, that my Lord Chancellor resolved to send one to receive your Majesty's commands, to let him know the truth of what was doing; for which one Baillie Brand, Merchant in Edinburgh, was sent express, and recommended by the Viscount of Torbato as one most proper, being accustomed to travel that road about his own affairs, and so might be the less capable of suspicion. The Chancellor by him gave you an account of the bad state this nation was in since the calling away the forces, and the Presbyterians declaring entirely against you. But the messenger betrayed his trust, and went straight into the Prince of Orange's camp, and was introduced by Dr. Burnet. He told the Prince, he was sent by several to offer his Highness their service. This was no sooner known, out the Viscount of Torbato was extremely suspected to be one of these; but I am convinced he had not at that time any correspondence; for there was 1689. the Episcopal party. The Prince of Orange being informed of these things, and having first dispatched Major-General Mackey, with some troops under his command, into that kingdom, he

" was no man in the nation in such apprehensions of dangers, after he read the Prince of Orange's Declaration, and saw by it he intended to sacrifice all to satisfy the Presbyterians, and those rebels, that did come over with him, and who were for the most part the Viscount of Tarbat's personal enemies.

" This way failing of having your commands, the Council ordered three of their number to wait on your Majesty, viz. the Viscount of Tarbat, the President of the Council, and myself. The other two fearing to get through, and not being able to ride, excused themselves; so I was sent alone.

" Some days before I left Edinburgh, it was spread abroad, that the rabble of the town designed to make an uproar, which was purposely set about by these meetings to frighten those you trusted, and by some, who had a mind to be rid of my Lord Chancellor, to have the government in their own hands, that they might be in a better condition to make their court to the Prince of Orange. The chief of those was the Marquis of Annandale, who thought, that so early an appearance for the Prince of Orange could not but be extremely meritorious; nor could they have done it more effectually, than by stirring up the rabble against the government, and making a public mutiny and exclamation against those things mentioned by him in his Declaration.

" The news of the treachery of your army, and of your Majesty's being come back to London, was no small encouragement to them, that designed to make their court, especially to the Viscount of Tarbat, and Sir J. Dalrymple, who, though the Marquis of Annandale appeared the head of all, yet they were the springs, by which every thing was moved and ordered so well, that he was satisfied with the vanity of the name, whereas they were sure of the profit without hazard. For if your Majesty had succeeded contrary to their expectation, all the strefs of the disorders they could fairly put upon him; and if the Prince of Orange prospered, they knew, they had such friends about him, that they would keep all the honour of ruining the government, and getting the Council to declare for them. Their chief design to get this accomplished was to get rid of the Lord Chancellor. The Marquis of Annandale designed it; both out of family-pique, and to get the government into his hands, as falling due to him after the Chancellor's departure, he being next officer of State. The way he proposed for this was to have all the troops disbanded, which he knew would have all been at the Chancellor's devotion, except their miserable General, and, bad as they were, would have been better than could have been brought against them; for the Council having kept some inferior officers of the Earl of D—s regiment, that came down for recruits, put them in tolerable order. The Viscount of Tarbat proposed in Council, that these troops might be disbanded, being an unnecessary charge, since he believed there would be no more to do with soldiers, and the Prince of Orange had declared in his Declaration the illegality of keeping up forces in time of peace. The Earl of Perth, who was desirous to do every thing to satisfy them, and not considering their design, too easily consented to it, and trusting some of these he saw most earnest for it, next day they were all dismissed except four companies of foot and two troops of horse, for bringing in the publick money. So soon as they had got them dismissed, the Marquis of Annandale and the rest of the Counsellors, that were of his party, came to my Lord Chancellor's own lodging, and told him, they thought themselves no longer in safety to meet in Council where he was, and several others, incapacitate by law. But if he and they would retire, it would soon be seen how rigorously they would act in the King's service, and get all the rabble pacified, and the discontented meeting dismissed. Before he gave them any posi-

Numb. V. Vol. III.

" tive answer, he retired into another room, where the Duke of Gordon, and all the Catholick Counsellors, were met upon the noise of this advice of the Marquis of Annandale; and he told them what had passed. All unanimously advised him to be gone; and that it would look better to do it voluntarily than be compelled, as certainly they would do now when they had begun, and had all the rabble and discontented meetings on their side. Several others likewise, out of concern for him, gave him the same advice, thinking it dangerous for him to trust an enraged multitude. These advices of his friends determined him; so he returned to these Lords, and took his leave of them, and went thither to the country."

The Earl of Belcarras then gives an account of the riots at Edinburgh, and the demolishing the popish chapel there, and plundering of several houses belonging to Papists, " the Council not doing any thing to hinder their disorders; for such as abhorred these barbarities, thought themselves happy to escape the rage of the rabble; others were so far from discouraging these abuses, that it was generally known they were the chief promoters of them. After the noise of the rabble, adds he, was a little abated, the Marquis of Annandale, as next officer of State, called the Council, and proposed an address to be sent up to the Prince of Orange, with the highest acknowledgments of gratitude for his generous undertaking of freeing them from popery and tyranny, and offers of future service; but there were so many, who opposed it, that it was stopped. Those, that hindered for a while the violences of the Marquis of Annandale, and his party, were the two Archbishops, the President of the Session, Sir George Mackenzie, Master of B—s, Mr. C—s, H—s, now Earl, and the Lord L—s. But though they got the address first offered stopt, yet they were out-voted, when it was debated, if it was proper to find a way at all; and so Lord G—s was sent up with an address very short, and in general terms, which was very coldly received, a franker one being promised and expected.—The Marquis and most of the Council began to prepare for going up to make their court; but that they might do it the better, it was voted in the Council, that they should desire the Lord of the Treasury to pay their expences, which was likewise carried. The Marquis and Viscount of Tarbat were very ready to comply, since they were to have their share; but the Earl of Tweeddale (who with these two were all that were in town of the Treasury) was not then in a condition to go up himself, and absolutely refused; so for want of a quorum the whole project was broke, and they were forced to go on their own charges. After the Viscount of Tarbat, Sir George Mackenzie, and the President of the Session were gone, the Marquis of Annandale took upon him absolutely the government. While they staid, there was at least some decency kept; but they were no sooner gone, but the Marquis, like another Maslinello, ordered all at his pleasure, turned out several from their employments about the Treasury, Customs, and other places, and put in creatures of his own; and when he had ordered all he thought fit, he followed the rest of the Council, and left the Earl of S—s, and some others of the Council of his own party, to manage in his absence.

" Never was such a confluence seen on the road of all sorts, degrees, and persuasions, as at that time going up; for no sooner was it known, that your Majesty was gone, and the Prince of Orange come to London, but all that could scrape so much money together, went up; the Presbyterians and discontented Noblemen, Gentlemen, and Ministers, to receive the fruit of their labours and great promises; the Episcopal party, to endeavour to save themselves from the ruin they saw inevitably coming upon them

" by

1689. he assembled such of the Scotch Lords and Gentlemen, as were in London on the 7th of January, and made this speech to them:

My Lords and Gentlemen,

King Wil-Ham's speech to the Scotch Lords.
N^o 1002

THE only reason, that induced me to undergo so great an undertaking, was, that I saw the Laws and Liberties of these kingdoms overturned, and the Protestant Religion in imminent danger. And seeing you are here for many Noblemen and Gentlemen, I have called you together, that I may have your advice, what is to be done for securing the Protestant Religion, and restoring your Laws and Liberties, according to my Declaration."

As soon as the Prince had retired, the Lords and Gentlemen went to the Council Chamber at Whitehall, Feb. 1689.

"by their enemies getting the absolute disposal of the Government both in Church and State. But their number was nothing to be compared to the others, after they had met with their friends from Holland. Every night, after they were once gathered together, they kept their meetings in St. James's Street, at the Ship Tavern. Then they consulted what was next to be done, both to get the government in their hands, and how to hinder all others, who were not of their party.

"One of the first things proposed was, who should be for ever incapacitated for all publick employments. Five only were named at first, and sent with Monsieur Baillon to the Prince of Orange, at the desire of the whole meeting; and these were the Duke of Queensberry, Viscount of Torbet, Sir George Mackenzie, Viscount of Dumder, and myself. But the Prince of Orange absolutely refused, being resolved to put nobody in despair, till once he knew, how they intended to behave for his interest; which stop made us go on no further in that affair, though they intended (as was mentioned) next Parliament, that all should be incapacitated, whoever had served your Majesty in any employment whatsoever. But that took too many in, and so many of themselves and friends being concerned, it was likewise hindered, not only by the Prince of Orange, who desired not to be confined to them, but by most of the leading men among them, who accepted the chief employments, and particularly the Duke of Hamilton, whom I cannot pass by, without giving your Majesty some account of his behaviour, not only in this affair, but a little before; and especially what I was most concerned in myself.

"The day after your Majesty's first going from London I came there; and hearing the unhappy news I thought it was reasonable to desire the advice of all other Counsellors, who were there, what I should write to the council, who had sent me up to receive your commands, and let your Majesty know the condition of the Kingdom, and give you new assurances of loyalty and fidelity, in terms very different from what was alleged by some, before your Majesty went away, as if the council of Scotland had been sending some of their number to join with those, that had petitioned you for the calling a new Parliament. After I had got together all the Counsellors, which were the Earl of A—y, Lord L—n, Viscount of Dumder, Lieutenant General D—s, we went to the Duke of Hamilton's lodging, where I told them on what account I was sent; and now that your Majesty was gone, desired their advice what I should write home, (for all that time we knew nothing of what troubles had happened,) and gave the Duke a letter from the council, wherein they desired he might assist me in receiving your Majesty's commands, and telling you the condition they were in. So soon as he read his own, he desired to see the letter I had brought to your Majesty; otherwise he would not meddle in our affairs. To satisfy him, I gave him a double of it; and though he pressed with all the passion his natural fire and insolent temper could permit; that I might give him the principal, I absolutely refused to do it at all; and I had no reason, since he was not to deliver it, and that your Majesty was gone. This put him into such a fury, that he no more could conceal his design of desiring the letter, and told, that if he had the principal letter, he should give it to the Lords met at Whitehall, to shew them what a letter I had brought up, subscribed by a Chancellor and several other Counsellors still sitting there contrary to law: That he would meddle in nothing, wherein they were concerned; and that he was free himself, having never acted since the last Indemnity; but that he would consult with the English Lords, what was proper next to be done; and so in a rage left us in his own house. But three days after, when he heard of your Majesty's coming back from Feversham, and that things were like not to go on as he expected, he sent for the Viscount of Dumder, and made great excuses for his passion, and desired him to go to us all, and offer his friendship, and in his own lodging prays and intreats us, that we might make no more of it. After your Majesty's coming back, no man, for the short time you staid, appeared more concerned for your service. But your Majesty had no sooner come to Whitehall, than he had his coach ready, and went straight to the Session House to the Prince of Orange, and offered him his service, and was received more kindly than any other, not out of affection, but that he saw him the fittest tool to manage the different interests of the nation; for with the discontented noblemen and gentlemen none appeared more dissatisfied with all that had been done in the former reign, though none had a greater hand in all that was done. With the Presbyterians he always pretended he had been in their interest; and what he did, that looked like compliance with the government against them, was only to keep them from greater misfortunes. With the episcopal Clergy, at least with such as trusted him, who were very few, he begged they might suspend their judgment of him, until a Convention; and then it should be seen, who were most for the interest of the King and nation. With these pretences, which is no hard talk for men that will abandon for their interests all truth, honour, and religion, he caressed a vast number of all persuasions, and made himself thought absolutely necessary; which was the only thing he aimed at both in your brother's reign and your own. And to carry on this the better among the different parties, in appearance he meddled with none of their meetings, for that would declare him too much a party, until he got all things ready for their great meeting at Whitehall, whereof he was chosen President. He proposed the great disorders at home; that all the nation was cast loose without any shadow, or order of government. Therefore it was absolutely necessary, that the government should be lodged somewhere until a Convention of estates were called: The great disorders that had fallen out, and the licentious liberty the mob had taken, made many comply to that proposition, though extremely against their inclinations. And what made it pass the easier was the time of this Convention being prefixed to so short a day as the fourteenth of March 1689. Besides it could hardly be avoided without being imprisoned, all the roads being stopped, and passage absolutely denied, and so would have rendered them incapable of appearing for your interest. In the Convention met then, the Earl of Arran did read over a short paper, wherein he told them, he believed there could be no other means to restore peace and happiness in Britain, but to send to your Majesty, and desire you would return. There were a great many there, who would willingly join in such a proposition; but his Lordship brought it in without letting any of your friends know it. Besides, at that time the Earl of Arran was extremely suspected, 1689. Whitehall, and having chosen the Duke of Hamilton their President, consulted what advice was proper to be given his Highness in this conjuncture; and after some hours debate, they agreed upon the substance of it, and appointed the Clerks, with such as were to assist them, to draw up in writing, what the meeting thought expedient to advise the Prince, and to bring it to them the next day in the afternoon. Accordingly the writing was presented to them; and sometime being spent in consultation about the fittest way of convening a general meeting of the Estates of Scotland, at last they agreed in their opinion, and ordered the advice to be transcribed fair with the amendments. But as they were going to break up for that time, the Earl of Arran proposed to them, "that they should move the Prince of Orange, to desire the King to return, and call a Free Parliament ; which would be the best way to secure the Protestant religion and property, and to heal all breaches." This proposal seemed disagreeable to the whole meeting, and especially to the Duke of Hamilton, their President, the Earl's father; but they immediately broke up. The next day, they met at three of the clock in the same place, and Sir Patrick Hume took notice of the proposal made by the Earl of Arran, and desired to know, whether any person there would second it; but none appearing to do it, he said, "that what the Earl had proposed was evidently opposite and inimical to his Highness the Prince of Orange's undertaking, his Declaration, and the good intentions of preserving the Protestant religion, and of restoring their laws and liberties expressed in it"; and farther desired, "that the meeting should declare this to be their opinion of it." The Lord Cardross seconded Sir Patrick's motion. It was answered by the Duke of Hamilton, their President, "that their business was to prepare an advice to be offered to the Prince; and the advice being now ready to go to the vote, there was no need, that the meeting should give their sense of the Earl's proposal, which neither before nor after Sir Patrick's motion any had pretended to own or second, so that it was fallen out of doors; and that the vote of the meeting upon the advice brought in by their order, would sufficiently declare their opinion." This being seconded by the Earl of Sutherland, the Lord Cardross, and Sir Patrick Hume acquiesced in it; and the meeting voted unanimously the advice following:

Jan. 9.

Advice of the meeting to the Prince of Orange.
Kennet.

"We the Lords and Gentlemen of the kingdom of Scotland, assembled at your Highnesses desire in this extraordinary conjuncture, ture, do give your Highness our humble and hearty thanks for your pious and generous undertaking for preserving the Protestant religion, and restoring the laws and liberties of these kingdoms.

"In order to the attaining these ends, our humble advice and desire is, that your Highness take upon you the administration of all affairs, both civil and military; the disposal of the publick revenues and fortresses in the kingdom of Scotland; and the doing every thing, that is necessary for the preservation of the peace of the kingdom, until a general meeting of the States of the nation; which we humbly desire your Highness to call, to be holden at Edinburgh the 14th day of March next, by your letters or proclamation, to be published at the Market-crosses of Edinburgh, and other Headboroughs of the several Shires and Stewartries, as sufficient intimation to all concerned, and according to the custom of the kingdom. And that the publication of these your letters or proclamation be by the Sheriff's or Stewart-Clerks for the Free-holders, who have the value of lands, holden according to law, for making elections, and by the Town-clerks of the said Boroughs, for the meeting of the whole Burgeses of the respective royal Boroughs, to make their elections at least fifteen days, before the meeting of the estates at Edinburgh, and the respective clerks to make intimation thereof, at least ten days before the meeting for the elections; and that the whole Electors and Members of the said meeting at Edinburgh, qualified as above expressed, be Protestants, without any other exception or limitation whatsoever; to deliberate and resolve what is to be done for securing the Protestant religion, and restoring the laws and liberties of the Kingdom, according to your highness's declaration.

"Dated at the Council-chamber the 10th day of January 1689."

This address being subscribed by above thirty Lords and about eighty gentlemen, was presented in their presence at St. James's by the Duke of Hamilton to the Prince of Orange, who thanked them for the trust they reposed in him, and desired a time to consider upon so weighty an affair. And accordingly upon the 14th of January the Prince met them again at St. James's, and spoke to them as follows:

My Lords and Gentlemen,

"IN pursuance of your advice I will, untill the meeting of the States in March next, give such such

"both for his going in to the Prince of Orange on the first noise of your Majesty's going away, and the great interest his father had with the Prince of Orange, and the fanatic discontented party. The most sensible and best of your friends judged likewise, that though this proposal seemed just and bold, yet it was then ill timed, considering, if any had joined with him, the Prince of Orange would immediately have sent down troops to Scotland; which would inevitably hinder all appearance for your interest in the Convention, which was believed to be the only place proper to appear in; and that at that time no wise man ought to do more, but to get out of the claws of their enemies. In this meeting there was

"nothing else done, but an offer of signing the association, which all refused, who intended to act for your interest. After that was over, both parties made what haste they could to get home, but still the Prince of Orange denied passage until he was declared King; which was thought he did, that all the Scots there might kiss his hand, which would be a kind of acknowledgment. But notwithstanding that Duke Hamilton, and all those who came over from Holland, and several others went and did it; yet many of the Scots, even of those, who were as violent as any, refused it; which was extremely ill taken. Act. of the Aff. of Scot. p. 16, &c.

1689. "such orders concerning the affairs of Scotland, as are necessary, concerning the calling of the said meeting, for the preserving of the peace, the applying of the publick revenue to the most pressing uses, and putting the fortresses in the hands of persons, in whom the nation can have a just confidence. And I do further assure you, that you will always find me ready to concur with you in every thing, that may be found necessary for securing the Protestant religion, and restoring the laws and liberties of the nation."

The Earl of Crawford then desired of his High-nests, that himself, the Earl of Lothian, and others, who came to town since the address had been presented, might be allowed to subscribe it; which was accordingly done; after which the Prince retired, and all shewed great satisfaction with his answer.

On the 14th of March the Convention of Scotland met; and after publick prayers performed by the Bishop of Edinburgh, (wherein he prayed for the safety and restoration of King James) the first thing, which they entered upon, was the chusing of a President. The Marquis of Athol was proposed by the Bishops, and the party which still adhered to the abdicated King, but

(1) The Earl of Belcarras observes, that how to behave in the Convention, puzzled not a few, but all the loyal Party: Some thought they could not in conscience go to any meeting called by the Prince of Orange; that it was a breach of their oath in the Test to sit in any meeting not called by regal authority. "But others judged, says he, that since your Majesty was not in a condition at that time to call a Convention, they might very lawfully go, since it was only to serve you, that they exposed themselves to a victorious and insulting enemy. But your Majesty sending over George Hamilton just at the time when these resolutions were forming, made all your friends resolve to go down; and since they knew you allowed them, to endeavour to make all the interest they could, that Members might be rightly chosen.

"The Marquis of Annandale was come up a little before me, to receive the rewards of his service; but he was drily received, and there were so many enemies about the Prince of Orange, that he began again to look to his old friends, and make great apologies for what was past in Scotland, and promised his assistance in the Convention. There was so much need for help, that he was received, and all your friends joined to go down to Scotland to prepare your friends in the several counties and towns for the election of commissioners. But it was too long before it was resolved on, and many of the loyal gentlemen abominably refused to meet on call, which gave the Prince of Orange's party and fanatics great advantage. Yet notwithstanding of these disadvantages, if forces had not been sent down, and all the aforesaid persons admitted, without any repeal, a thing never heard of before, your interest had been asserted in the Convention.

"The first, that came down of either parties, was the Viscount of Dundee and myself. When we came to Edinburgh about the end of February, we found that city in a great quiet, and generally well affected. The College of Justice, to free themselves, after the Marquis of Annandale left the government, armed themselves, and made up a battalion of very good men, which kept all the disaffected in great awe. But Duke Hamilton believing they would not be for his purpose, got an order sent down with Commissioners to disband them. On our first coming we waited on the Duke of Gordon, who was capitulating to render up the castle of Edinburgh. At our entry into the castle, we met all the Duke's furniture coming out; which gave us small hopes of his keeping it; but we had the good fortune to convince him, that it would be so much for your Majesty's interest, and his own honour, that he promised to keep it out until he saw what the Convention would do. I say not this in the least to disparage any thing he did, for I saw him have very good inclinations to do for your interest. But his never having orders from you, and his hearing all other sorts and places given up, discouraged him extremely. He had likewise a great temptation from the Prince of Orange, for he wrote to him a very obliging letter, with full assurance of indemnity and protection. But notwithstanding of that, and of several advices of such as he believed wished him well, and who

"haunted him constantly to get him to deliver up the castle, yet he resolved to hold out. But the great error he committed (though several others were laid to his charge, that were not true), was, after he had resolved it, he did not get it provided; for then the city of Edinburgh would not have denied him any thing; or, if they had, he could easily have compelled them.

"Some days before the Convention sat down, the Duke of Hamilton and other western lords and gentlemen, brought publicly into town several companies of foot, and quartered them in the city; besides great numbers, that they kept hid in cellars and houses below the ground, which never appeared until some days after the Convention was begun, though they were generally believed to be thrice as many as there were. This was the first error committed by your friends; for in reason they ought all to have left the Convention, and gone, and sitten in some other town by themselves, which they might have done safely; but there was so great hopes of doing well in that meeting, that it made many unwilling, notwithstanding of their hazard, to leave it. Nor can I say, wanted there probability for this opinion; for if several had not left us after all the reiterated oaths imaginable, and others admitted into the Convention by absolute force, we would have been by far the major part. But such injustice was never heard of as was committed in their judging of elections; for if any of your party had had six voices, the other that had had an hundred, signified nothing. Besides, the manner of elections was out of all rules ever before heard tell of, and a new way taken, which was proposed by the Lord Stair, that all protestants, without distinction, should have votes in the election; which put it intirely in the hands of the rabble, which they managed some by promises, and others by a little money. Nor could even all these finistrous arts and tricks have compassed their ends, if your friends could have had an honest man to be president, that was not publicly obnoxious to the fanatics, which forced them, notwithstanding of all that was passed, to pitch upon the Marquis of Annandale not that they had confidence either in his parts or honesty, but that he was the only man could be set against Duke Hamilton. Both parties were extremely concerned, looking on the choice of a President as a decisive stroke; for by it they could know, whom to reckon on. Nor had they small reason for their judgment; for the first day the Duke of Hamilton was chosen president, contrary to their own expectation, above twenty left us, that had engaged to us, and voted for us, seeing we were the weakest party, and that the others would have both forces and vote of authority on their side. The next thing they voted was a committee of elections, which they got filled with their own party, and ended the affair; for by that they saw themselves so strong, nothing could be heard among them, but put it to the vote, which they always carried without debate, and so scandalously, that even Duke Hamilton, who, to give him his due, understood reason and the law of the nation at another rate than any tumultuous carriage, and several times

1689. but the Duke of Hamilton, who was set up in competition with him by those, who were friends to King William, carried it by near forty voices. 1689. The next thing they did was to appoint a committee

"times endeavoured to hinder it. Nor can I say, if "his cause had been good, but he behaved himself,
"until it came to the chief matter, with a great deal
"of prudence and moderation, inasmuch that some "of their own party began to repent of their choice.
"Some few days were taken up in judging of elections,
"which would have taken much longer time, if several,
"who saw there was no manner of justice so much as pretended
"to among them, had not given it over and yielded, which made them grow stronger every day.
"None concerned in that affair of elections behaved so well as Mr. C——s H——e, after his brother the Earl of H——e's death, the title fell to him; but by reason of the debts of the family, he did not take on him the title, fearing to lose a considerable interest, that was left him, with this provision, that if the estate of H——e came to him, then that estate should go to his younger brother. So not pretending to be a peer, he was chosen one of the Commissioners for the shire; but when it was brought before the Convention, he was cast, as one they expected would be none of their friends. So soon as the sentence was pronounced, he told the president, since they had taken away one way of his sitting in that Convention he had a right to, he should try another, which they could not refuse him; and so went out, and took place as Earl of H——e, with the hazard of losing the best part of his estate.

"There was likewise another extraordinary affair of that kind. One Mr. B——e of Tarwoodhead, that had pretended some years before to be Lord Forger, but was summoned before the council for usurping a title he had no right to, and discharged under a considerable penalty never more to pretend to it. But those at London, who had the writing of letters, not knowing his title, or, more likely, believing he would be of their interest, procured him a letter from the Prince of Orange to come to the Convention. So soon as he was challenged by Sir George Mackenzie, he produced his letter, which was voted a sufficient right to sit. Several as unjustly as these were received; I only instance them, to shew how that Convention was constituted, most of the Commissioners having no right. The first thing they took into consideration, after the house was thus constituted, was the getting the castle of Edinburgh into their hands. That which pressed them most to it, there was two pretending to have the government of it, the Earl of L——n and the Earl of L——n likewise. It being the first of any consideration in Britain holding out, the Prince of Orange was very desirous to have it reduced. The Earl of L——n and T——e were sent up to capitulate with Duke Gordon, who promised them he would comply with their desire, and give it up the next day at ten a clock. So soon as the Viscount of Dundee and I heard them give this answer to the Convention, we were mightily alarmed, and sent up one immediately to remember his Grace of his engagement to us, and to lay before him the ruin of your affairs, if once they got the castle into their hands. As irresolution was the cause of his promise to them, so what arguments were used to him on the other side meeting with his desire to serve you, brought him about again. His greatest obstacle then was, how to come fairly off. The Earl of T——e with his flattering insinuating way had got him to go too great a length. For that, it was advised, that next day, when they came to demand the castle, he should tell, he would willingly give it up, but he could not see how he could be safe himself from the rabble of the town, and those that were brought into it. But to free them from all fear that that he should give the Convention any disturbance, he should offer bail for twenty thousand pounds to live peaceably in it. But though he was very well satisfied with this advice, yet that night he grew again irresolute, and sent to tell us, that except we "came to him immediately, he would not keep his word. This was impossible to do, for they having placed the town-companies of Edinburgh upon the castle-hill, suffered none they suspected to go up; yet one ventured to him, to know what he had to say to us. He sent us word, that notwithstanding of all that was past, he would deliver it up, except we both gave it under our hands, that it was of absolute necessity for your affairs not to yield it up; which we both did that night; and the next morning the Viscount of Dundee got into the castle, and confirmed him absolutely in his resolution of keeping it out, by telling him the resolutions were taken by your friends of leaving Edinburgh, and setting up at Sterling. So next day, when they expected to have the castle at the hour appointed, he refused again, and hostilities went on.

"Being thus left by many of those we trusted, and despairing of doing any thing in that Convention, next day we resolved in our general meeting, that we would quit it, and call a Convention at Sterling; which your Majesty had given power to the Archbishop of St. Andrews, the Viscount of Dundee, and myself, to do by a letter you sent us from Ireland by one Mr. B——n. But before we could determine that, it was absolutely necessary to be secured of the Earl of M——r and Marquis of Annandale, the one having command of Sterling castle, and the other, that he might bring us Highlanders to be a guard to the town. The Earl of M——r had all along appeared one of the firmest in your interest from the time he came to London; for he gave us all the assurances imaginable, that he would do according as the major part thought fit. The Marquis of Annandale also consented to leave Edinburgh, and go straight to Sterling; but he never continued six hours in one resolution, which broke all our design; for his wavering made our departure be put off, still expecting he would be brought about to do it. At last a positive hour was condescended on, and several made themselves ready, whom we hardly expected. After it was resolved to be gone, it was thought fit by all your friends, that one should be sent to let you know the reason of our leaving the Convention, and receive your commands, which the Laird of Cullin undertook.

"Before we were to go off, just as the Convention was setting down, there came one to the Viscount of Dundee, telling him, that there were six or seven men in a house intended to murder him and Sir George Mackenzie; and that if he would get a warrant, he might instantly carry them to the house where they were. So soon as the Convention met, he told this to the Duke of Hamilton, who proposed it to the Convention; but they absolutely refused to meddle in it, but went to other affairs. This made the Viscount of Dundee press yet the more to be gone than before, so evident a piece of justice being refused him, though he offered to prove it at the Bar. Neither was there any of your friends, who could think themselves longer safe; which certainly the other party was extremely glad to see, for all they desired was to have the house alone. It is not to be doubted but they made several such things to pass purposely to frighten us; but it was hard trusting men, who had the power in their hands, that they would stop to put in execution what so many of them have professed, and at least not condemned by the most moderate of the party, when their interest or revenge was concerned. But after all of us were fully determined to make the best of our way the next morning to Sterling, the Marquis of Annandale's heart failed. So some, who went down to him, thinking to get him to go along, he desired we might go to the place we ordinarily met in, and stay yet another day, which we all consented to; and that we might the better cover our design of going away, we resolved to go for that day to the Convention. Just as we were almost 1689. mittee of five out of every state, for examining controversed elections, which happened to be not above twelve. After that, for the safety of the assembly, they took into consideration the cattle

“ most dispersed and gone to the house, the Viscount “ of Dundee came in, who knew nothing of the “ Marquis of Annandale's delay, nor of your friends “ resolution to stay a little longer for him, but expect“ ed all were just a going. He was mightily surpris“ ed at their resolution, and told me, notwithstanding “ of that, he would go before; and if any got out of “ town, he would wait for them. It was very evi“ dent his going away would give the alarm, which “ made me extremely earnest, that he might stay
“ one day longer; but he had before made an appoint“ ment with some to go with him, so he went strait “ away with about fifty horse. As he was riding near “ the castle of Edinburgh, the Duke of Gordon made “ a sign to speak with him at the West side of the cas“ tle, where, though it be extremely steep, yet he “ told the Duke all that was resolved upon, and beg“ ged he might hold out the castle till your friends “ might get him relieved, which he positively pro“ mised to do. Whilst they were speaking, some “ of those, who were set to blockade the castle, per“ ceived them, and came running into the Conventi“ on, and told them, that there was a great number “ of horse gathering together, and that the Viscount “ of Dundee was talking with Duke Gordon, which “ they looked on as a horrid crime, after they had “ outlawed him. Their fears also increased, believing “ it was a general design against them; and that “ which augmented their fright the more, was, that “ several messengers brought word after each other,
“ that they were still increasing. At last the Duke “ of Hamilton in a mighty fury told the Convention, “ that now it was time to look to their own safety,
“ since the Papists and enemies to the settling the go“ vernment were so bold as to gather together. That “ he doubted not but there were several there among “ them who were on the design. Therefore it was “ his opinion, that the door should be immediately “ bolted, and the keys laid on the table: That some “ of their number should be sent out to beat the drums,
“ to gather together all those well affected to religion “ and liberty. That he had brought some foot from “ the West country, fearing the designs of their ene“ mies, to defend them. What he said was approv“ ed of by all their party: several of them also bragged
“ of the numbers they had brought, and called them “ thrice as many as they were. The Earl of L——n “ was pitched upon to go out and gather them to“ gether; which when he had done, there was never “ so miserable a parcel seen; nor is it to be doubted, “ if your friends had known their own strength, and “ not believed your enemies to be far stronger than “ they really were, they might, with all the ease “ imaginable, that day have effectually vindicated your “ right and defeated your enemies.

“ Such of your friends as were locked within the “ house, and guarded likewise without, looked on “ themselves as undone; and the thing, that saved “ them, was, that they could come to no resolution “ among themselves. But I cannot say much of their “ intentions, having it from some, that changed par“ ties so often, that I can assert nothing on their cre“ dit. The fear being a little over, and that they “ saw they had most of your friends in their power, and “ that there was no tumult in town, nor that the “ Viscount of Dundee grew any stronger, but was “ marching away; so they ordered Major B——n
“ to gather all he could together, and follow him, “ which he did, but never came within sight of him.
“ After that they had secured the town, and thought “ themselves out of hazard, Duke Hamilton dismissed
“ the Convention, to the great satisfaction of all your “ friends, little expecting they would come off so easi“ ly, and all this noise ended in nothing. But with “ that also ended all hopes of settling up another Con“ vention at Sterling, for the Marquis of Annandale “ gave it quite over, Earl of M——r made a feint to “ get out of the town, but went by the only post,

“ that was guarded, and was stopped there, and brought “ back, and gave his parole not to stir out of Edin“ burgh without leave of the Convention. These “ two giving it over, every body, that was apprehen“ sive, shifted for themselves, and lurked in Edinburgh; “ next day there was a mighty change; for several,
“ either out of fear or interest, left us. Those of “ note were the Earl of M——r and Annandale “ who changed thoroughly, and went along with “ every thing, that could be proposed. Several also “ both of Barons and Burgeesses did the like; so that “ by such of their friends, as left the house, which “ did likewise some of the Bishops, they got their “ meeting almost unanimous.

“ The night thereafter they searched the town for “ some officers they suspected, yet found none, but “ one, that had a mind to be taken, Lieutenant Gen“ eral D———. When he went to England with “ the army, he certainly knew nothing of any de“ sign among them; but he had not converted long “ with the Lord C———, K———, and some “ others, but he grew one of the hottest of the par“ ty, inasmuch that he proposed to my Lord to be“ tray and carry in his regiment, as I was informed “ by the Viscount a while after. Before he made the “ proposition, he told him, he had an affair of great “ consequence to them both to tell, if he would give “ him his oath never to reveal it; which when he “ had done, though he abhorred the motion, yet he “ thought himself obliged in honour to conceal it. So “ soon as he had cleared himself to Duke Hamilton of “ any design he had against them, he was dismissed.
“ This he could easily do; for none in all the Revo“ lution acted a blacker part, for he not only sent in “ a Battalion of the Scots guards, but was in all the “ designs of betraying, and above all laid down his “ employment to get the greater credit with your “ friends, and at the same time was engaged to the “ Prince of Orange, to let him know what passed and “ was designed by his enemies.

“ Being now free of most of those that obstructed “ them, some having quitted the House, and others “ joined with them, they fell heartily to work with “ the affair, upon which they had met; but fearing, “ lest the Prince of Orange should think they went “ slowly on, they sent up the Lord R———, with a “ letter containing the reasons of their delay; which “ were, that now they were free from those, that had “ opposed the settling the nation, and doubted not but “ to come shortly to conclusion to his satisfaction.
“ Next they chose a committee for settling the go“ vernment, and another for considering the present “ state of the nation. What was done or failed in “ either, I cannot give a full account; having first “ left the House; so can say little but from other “ hands. And both parties being concerned, the one “ against the other at that time, a considerable allow“ ance must be given to both their reports, if one de“ sires to know the truth impartially. But still there “ remained some of your friends, that gave them some “ trouble, particularly Sir George Mackenzie, the “ Archbishop of Glasgow, and Mr. O———, who “ behaved themselves extremely well, when the chief “ affair came in of settling the government. But “ reason signified little to men, that were resolved to “ go through with what they had begun; nor could it “ have signified much upon another account: for “ among them all, generally speaking, there was never “ seen such a set of men gathered together; for they “ had few, save Sir James Montgomery, and John “ Dalrymple, that could make the least reply, but “ only put it to the vote, which they were sure to “ carry among themselves. Likewise there were some “ divisions: some would have the crown declared im“ mediately vacant, as was done in England, and the “ Prince of Orange proclaimed. Others, who were “ cautious, and would willingly have seen a little better “ about them before they made so bold a step, pro“ posed

1689. castle of Edinburgh, which was yet commanded by the Duke of Gordon, a Papist, whom they required to put that castle into their hands. The Duke desired an indemnity for all that was past, and security for the future; which the Convention condescending to, so far as he had acted as a Papist, they sent the Earls of Tweeddale and Lothian to him with a pardon in writing, both for himself and all who were with him; whereupon he desired twenty-four hours time to consider of it, which was likewise granted. On the 15th, the two Earls were again sent to require him to deliver the castle upon the terms demanded by him, and agreed to by the Convention; but instead of standing to that, he demanded twelve days more, both to consider of it, and to receive an answer to the proposals he had sent to the Prince of Orange; and after several messages had past on both sides, he at last declared, that he would not surrender the castle. Upon this, the Convention sent the heralds at arms, to charge him immediately to deliver up that fortress; which he persisting to refuse, the heralds went to the Market-cross, and solemnly proclaimed him a traitor and rebel.

The 16th, one Crane, an Englishman, who was said to be a servant to King James's Queen, delivered a letter from that Prince to the Convention; and at the same time the President acquainted the assembly, that the Lord Levin was arrived express with another letter from King William. This occasioned a debate, which of the two letters should be read first; but it being represented, that they were conveyed by the King of England, and that King James's letter might enjoin the dissolution of their assembly, the majority carried it for King William, whose letter was read with great applause in manner following:

My Lords and Gentlemen,

"WE are very sensible of the kindness and concern, which your nation has evinced towards us, and our undertaking for the preservation of your Religion and Liberty, which were in such imminent danger. Neither can we in the least doubt of your confidence in us, after having seen how far so many of your Nobility and Gentry have owned our Declaration, countenancing and concurring with us in our endeavours, and desiring us, that we will take upon us the administration of affairs

"civil and military, and to call a meeting of the Estates, for securing the Protestant Religion, and the antient laws and liberties of your kingdom, which accordingly we have done.
"Now it lies in you to enter into such consultations, as are most probable to settle you on sure and lasting foundations; which we hope you will set about with all convenient speed with regard to the publick good, and the general interest and inclinations of the people; that, after so much trouble and great suffering, they may live happily and in peace; and that you may lay aside all animosities and factions, that may hinder so good a work.

"We are glad to find so many of the Nobility and Gentry, when here in London, were so much inclined to an union of both kingdoms; and that they did look upon it as one of the best means for procuring the happiness of both nations, and settling of a lasting peace among them; which will be advantageous to both, they living in the same island, having the same language, and the same common interest of religion and liberty; especially at this juncture, when the enemies of both are so restless, endeavouring to make and increase jealousies and divisions, which they will be ready to improve to their own advantage and the ruin of Britain. We being of the same opinion as to the usefulness of this union, and having nothing so much before our eyes as the glory of God, establishing the reformed religion, and the power and happiness of these nations, are resolved to use our utmost endeavour in advancing every thing, that may conduce to the effectuating the same.
"So we bid you heartily farewell."

From our court at Hampton-Court, the 7th day of March 1688.

After the reading of this letter, a committee was named to draw up an answer to it in the most thankful and dutiful manner; and then, before they would admit of the letter from King James to be opened, an act passed by the almost unanimous consent of the House, asserting and maintaining the lawfulness of the convention, notwithstanding any thing, that might be alleged in the said letter to the contrary; and declaring, that they would not dissolve, but continue sitting, until the government, religion, laws, liberties, and properties were settled and established.

"posed an union with England, and took all the pains imaginable to engage your friends into it, and so bring them back to the House, alledging there would be nothing so much for your interest as the gaining of time; and if that this proposal did not go on, the government would be presently settled; but if it were once set on foot, and your friends assist it, several months would be spent before any such treaty could be ended.

"The chief of these, who managed the affair, were the Viscount of Yarbat, and the Lord S---. Your friends soon perceived, that they only designed to do this as effectually for the Prince of Orange by an union; for all, that were for this, have consented to the Prince of Orange's being King, and to all that was done in England. Thus to free themselves of the odium of such a deed, your Majesty's business succeeded and ended. Then they wanted not apprehensions; for your affairs in

"Ireland were vastly magnified both by your friends and by your enemies. This prospect took extremely with those, that had a mind to trim, or were not in hopes of employments. But there were two different interests in the House against it; for Duke Hamilton, and all he had influence upon, who expected the great employments for himself and children, as the reward of his service; then the bigoted Fanatics, who feared that such an union, where the Church of England was the strongest party, might be of ill consequence to their Kirk, which they designed not only to establish upon the old foot, but, according as they did before, endeavour the reformation of their brethren in England. The two parties were by far stronger than the Trimmers, especially since your friends would not meddle; so that they never ventured to propose it publicly." Account of the affairs of Scotland, p. 56, &c.

1689. established. After this King James's letter was read, containing, "That having been informed, that the Peers and Representatives of Shires and Boroughs of this his ancient kingdom, were to meet together at Edinburgh, by the usurped authority of the Prince of Orange, he thought fit to let them know, that as he had at all times relied upon the faithfulness and affection of them, his ancient people, so much, that in his greatest misfortunes heretofore he had recourse to their assistance, and that with good success to his affairs; so now again he required of them to support his interest, and expecting from them what became loyal subjects, generous and honest men, that they would neither suffer themselves to be cajoled and frightened into any action misbecoming true-hearted Scotsmen; and that to maintain the honour of the nation, they would condemn the base example of disloyal men, and eternize their names by a loyalty suitable to the many professions they had made to him. That in doing of this they would chuse the safest part, since thereby they would avoid the danger they must needs undergo, the infamy and disgrace they must bring upon themselves in this world, and the condemnation due to the rebellious in the next. And that they would likewise have the opportunity to secure to themselves, and their posterity, the gracious promises he had so often made of securing their religion, laws, properties, liberties, and rights; which he was still resolved to perform, as soon as it was possible for him to meet them safely in a Parliament in that his ancient kingdom. In the mean time he exhorts them, not to fear to declare for him the lawful Sovereign, who would not fail, on his part, to give them such speedy and powerful assistance, as should not only enable them to defend themselves from any foreign attempt, but put them in a condition to assert their rights against his and their enemies, who had depressed the same by the blackest of usurpations, the most unjust as well as most unnatural of attempts; which though Almighty God might for a time permit, and let the wicked prosper, yet the end must bring confusion upon such workers of iniquity. He farther let them know, that he would pardon all such, as should return to their duty before the last day of that month [March] inclusive; and that he would punish with the rigour of his laws, all such, as should stand out in rebellion against him or his authority. So not doubting, that they would declare for him, and suppress whatever might oppose his interest; and that they would send some of their number with an account of their diligence and the posture of his affairs there, he bid them heartily farewell."

This menacing letter, which was dated from on board the St. Michael, March 1. 1689, was the more ungrateful by being counterfeigned by the Earl of Melfort, a person odious to all the Presbyterians of Scotland, who made up the major part of the Convention; so that, instead of serving the interest of King James, it rather provoked that assembly to be the more unanimous and forward in settling the government after the example of England. The messenger, who brought the letter, was first secured, and then, not being thought worth detaining, dismissed with a pass instead of an answer.

The next care of the Convention was to put the kingdom in a posture of defence; for which purpose they ordered a proclamation to be published, requiring all persons from the age of sixteen to sixty to be in a readiness to take arms. They likewise changed a great many officers of the militia all over the kingdom; appointed Sir Patrick Hume, who came over with King William from Holland, to command the militia of horse of his county, notwithstanding his attainer for the business of the Earl of Argyle was not yet taken off; and ordered eight hundred men to be levied under the command of the Earl of Levin, who came also over with his Majesty; and these were raised and armed in a few hours, and appointed to guard the city of Edinburgh.

On the 19th of March they passed an act, approving the address of the Scots Nobility and Gentry in London; by which they thankfully acknowledged the great benefit done to their nation by the Prince of Orange, in delivering them from the eminent encroachments on their laws and fundamental constitution, and from the near dangers, which threatened an overturning of the Protestant Religion; and also desired his Highness to accept the administration of the government of that kingdom. The same day, upon reading of some letters from several Lords and Gentlemen in Ireland, desiring assistance of the Convention, they ordered two thousand muskets and twenty barrels of powder to be immediately sent them; that a further provision of arms and ammunition should be bought up for them in Holland; and that two small frigates should cruise between Scotland and Ireland, for mutual intelligence betwixt both kingdoms.

Whilst the Convention was thus providing for their own security, and the relief of their Protestant brethren in Ireland, the Lord Viscount Dundee held a private conference with the Duke of Gordon at the postern-gate of the castle of Edinburgh, at which they concerted measures to disturb the publick tranquillity. The Convention being informed of this violation of their orders, by which they had forbid all manner of correspondence with the Duke, ordered Dundee to appear before them; but he retired with thirty or forty horse to Linlithgow (1). Upon this a party of horse was sent after him; and the Convention apprehending, that he might surprize the castle

(1) He had been some time before at London, and had fixed a correspondence both with England and France, though he had employed Dr. Burnet to carry messages from him to King William, to know what security he might expect, if he should go and live in Scotland without owning his government. The King's answer was, that if he would live peaceably, and at home, he should be protected; to which he replied, that unless he were forced to it, he would live quietly. But he returned to Scotland with other resolutions; and all the party determined to submit to his command; and upon his retiring from Edinburgh, he went up and down the Highlands, and sent his agents about to bring together what force they could collect. Burnet II. 22. The Earl of Belcarrai tells us that a few days after the Convention were certain, that the Viscount of Dundee had gone by Sterling to his own house, they sent an herald and a trumpet to command him and my Lord L—n to return, under pain of being denounced rebels to the State. My Lord L—n obeyed, and was imme-

And the House finding, that the Attorney-General Macckenzie, five Bishops, the Earls of Hume, Dumferling, Lauderdale, Birley, and Callender, the Viscounts Dundee, Stourmont, and several other disaffected members, to the number of fifty, did absent themselves, sent their maces to require their attendance; and it was proposed, that such as had refused to sign the act, asserting the lawfulness of their assembly, should be expelled the House. But these being few in number, that motion was not pursued.

On the other hand, the Duke of Gordon, in order to cover his real design, having beat a parley, and desired to capitulate, some persons were appointed to treat with him. But it appeared at last, that he only intended to amuse the Convention, and did not design to quit the possession of the castle, till he should be forced to it. For on the 22d of March he acquainted the Magistrates of Edinburgh, that he had received advices from Ireland of King James's being landed there; and that to express his joy upon the occasion, he should be obliged to fire all his cannon; but bid them not be alarmed at it, since he designed no hurt to the city. The Convention being informed of this message, ordered the castle to be blocked up; and upon the 23d, an act was passed and proclaimed for securing all suspected persons. The same day the answer of the Convention to King William's letter was read and signed in a meeting of the whole House, very few excepted, and ordered to be sent away immediately by the Lord Ross, who took post, and presented it to his Majesty, importing:

"That as religion, liberty, and laws, are the deepest concerns of mankind, so the deep sense of the extreme hazard, these had been exposed to, must produce suitable returns from the kingdom to his Majesty, whom in all sincerity and gratitude they acknowledged to be, under God, their great and seasonable deliverer; and they heartily congratulated, that as God had honoured his Majesty to be an eminent instrument for the preservation of his truth, so he had rewarded his undertaking with success, in the considerable progress, which he had made in delivering them, and in preserving to them the Protestant religion. That they returned their most dutiful thanks to his Majesty for his accepting the administration immediately dismissed, being then no member of the house, and they having nothing to lay to his charge. The Viscount of Dundee wrote a letter, excusing his not obeying their order, wherein he gave the reasons, for which he left the Convention, which were, "that he could stay no longer in that place, after that he had told in full Convention of so many of his enemies, who designed to murder him, yet could have no justice. He told also, he could not think that Convention any more free, wherein there were so many brought in from the Western countries to overawe its members, nor where they were guarded with foreign troops; (for just at this time Mackay was come down from England with four Dutch regiments;) but if they would do him justice, and give him assurance of liberty, he promised to return immediately. I have given this account the more full, because it was insinuated, after my Lord Dundee went to the Highlands, that several of your friends broke their engagements to him, and did not go along, but were so far from being in any such engagements, that they would have disobeyed you, if they had gone; for your positive commands were sent with George H—, that if we saw there could be nothing done in the Convention, then we should quit it, and keep as quiet as we could till farther orders, and until you could send us assistance from Ireland; but the design of going to Sterling made the one go for the other; so that was ruined by the faint heartedness of the Marquis of Annandale and some others. All that knew your commands, endeavoured to retire home and save themselves; nor did ever the Viscount of Dundee resolve to meddle, until he had your orders, except he had been obliged to save himself from a party, that came to apprehend him. Notwithstanding of the difficulties your friends had met with, some of them did not give over hopes of breaking the design of the Convention, and get another to meet in some safe place. That which raised this, was the coming down of the Duke of Queensberry. The Duke, upon the noise of the invasion, had appeared sincerely in your interest; and I must do him the justice to say, I never saw any man more concerned than he was for the steps his son made in England, after your Majesty was gone. He joined in all the meetings we had for your service, and employed what interest he could to get Commissioners for the shires he was concerned in choosing, as we wished; nor could any thing be complained of him, but his too "long stay at London; for if all your friends had appeared, as they promised, the first day of the Convention, they had been by far the strongest, and if Scotland had then declared for you, when you was almost master of Ireland, the Prince of Orange had passed his time ill in England, considering he had France to deal with on the other side. This made us extremely concerned, since that we could do no more in that Convention, either to get another to counter-act them, or to get them forced from Edinburgh, which would have made a great delay before the time they could have another Convention established, and which they intended to set up at Glasgow, if they had been forced from Edinburgh. The only thing could be thought of by all your friends to get this done, was to engage the Duke of Gordon to fire upon the town, which certainly would have broke up the Convention; for they always suspected some design of forcing them from Edinburgh. In this resolution no man seemed so forward as the Marquis of Annandale, for it was of great concern to have him so; for after the Earl of M— had intirely quitted us, and by that they had got Stirling in their hands, there was no man in the nation (considering how well affected his Highlands were) could be so useful, if your friends had retired northwards, as was intended, till they had received your orders from Ireland. And that, which made us depend on him (for all the escapes he made) was the great influence the Earl of D— had with him; and he applied all his endeavours to keep him to his duty, and acted in all your concerns with as much zeal and affection, till he was made prisoner, as any ever served you.

"The Countess of E—, who had kept intelligence with Duke Gordon from the time the castle was blocked up, undertook to let him know our advice; which accordingly she did; but he absolutely refused to do any thing but defend himself until he had your Majesty's orders. So our whole designs were broke; for since there was no way found out to make them leave Edinburgh, all of us seeing that there was no more to be expected, either from the Convention, or from those, that pretended to be our friends, left the town, and retired home, such as the Earl of H—, Viscount of S—, Viscount of O—, Lord S—, Earl of S—, Earl of P—, Mr. Henry Maul his brother, the Sheriff of B—, and several others. That they should with all convenient diligence take his gracious letter into their consideration; hoping shortly, by the blessing of God, to fall upon such resolutions, as might be acceptable to his Majesty; secure the Protestant religion, and establish the government, laws, and liberties of that kingdom upon solid foundations, most agreeable to the general good and inclinations of the people. That as to the proposal of the Union, they doubted not but his Majesty would so dispose that matter, that there might be an equal readiness in the kingdom of England to accomplish it, as one of the best means for securing the happiness of these nations, and settling a lasting peace. That they had hitherto and still should endeavour to avoid animosities or prejudice, which might disturb their councils: That as they designed the publick good, so it might be done with the general concurrence and approbation of the nation. And that in the mean time, they desired the continuance of his Majesty's care and protection towards them in all their concerns, whereof the kind expressions in his gracious letter had given them full assurance."

The forces, which King William had sent into Scotland under Major-General Mackay, and which consisted of four regiments of foot and one of dragoons, being arrived there, the Convention ordered them to be quartered in Leith and the suburbs of Edinburgh; and gave a commission to that General to be commander in chief of such militia, or other forces, as should be raised for the safety of that kingdom in the present juncture. And at the same time the Lord Levingston and Viscount Dundee, with design to amuse the Convention, wrote letters to the Duke of Hamilton, their President, giving an account of their withdrawing from Edinburgh.

On the 26th of March a committee was named for settling the government, which was composed of eight Lords, eight Knights, and eight Burgesses, and out of which the Bishops were left, as having disgusted the generality of the State, by their former compliance with King James's arbitrary government, by their prayers at the beginning of the session, and other passages in their behaviour, that discovered their affection to King William, and the accident then about to be made. This committee, after five or six days sitting, followed the precedent of the English Convention, in declaring the throne vacant (1); and to support this declaration, had recourse to King James's violations of the fundamental laws and constitutions, and appointed a sub-committee to draw up an account of the particular instances of those violations. Upon this, three parties were formed; one composed of all the Bishops and some of the Nobility, who affirmed the proceedings to be contrary to their laws and oaths. Others thought, that their oaths were only to the King, as having the executive power to support him in that; but that if he set himself to invade and assume the legislature, he renounced his former authority, by subverting that, upon which it was founded; for which reason they were for a declaratory judgment. The third party was of those, who agreed with the former in their conclusion, but not in coming to so speedy a determination. They were of opinion, that it was the interest of Scotland to be brought under the laws of England, and to be united to the Parliament of England; and that this was the properest time for doing that to the best advantage, since England would be obliged, by the present state of affairs, to receive them upon good terms. They were therefore willing to proceed against King James; but they thought it not reasonable to make too much halt in a new settlement, and were for maintaining the government in an Interregnum, till the union should be perfected, or at least put in a probable way. This was specious, and many went into it; and since it tended to the putting a stop to a full settlement, all, who favoured King James, joined in it, because by this more time was gained. To this project it was objected, that the union of the two kingdoms must be a work of time, since many

Three parties formed. Burnet.

(1) The Earl of Belarras observes, that a few days after many of King James's friends had left the Convention the committee prepared all that was intended in the Convention, but found great difficulties how to declare the Throne vacant. Some were for abdication, as had been done in England, but that could not pass among the most violent of them, for it could not be imagined, that your Majesty had left Scotland. Others were for making use of an old story, and saying, that the Duke of Hamilton, used for a bird's forsaking her nest. But Sir John Dalrymple ended the debate by such reasons against both, that they agreed to his new proposal, which was that they agreed, by committing such acts as he named, forfeited your right to the crown; making this childish distinction, that they intended not to forfeit you as a traitor, but only declare you forfeit: 1, which would make the affair clear, and take off any pretensions the Prince of Wales might afterwards have. This immediately was taken and voted the next day by all present, except five, the Archbishop of Glasgow, Sir George Mackenzie, Lord B---, Mr. O--- and one B---. All the rest, which did intend to go along, had left the house.

After the Throne was declared vacant, Duke of Hamilton proposed filling it again, (although as Pres---, and as a peer, he was obliged to vote,) and that the humble offer thereof should be made to the Prince and Princes of Orange. This was done more un-animously than the other; for the Duke of Queensberry and Marquis of Annandale, who had been absent from the first vote, came and assented to the second, and told the house, that they were not fully convinced of their right in declaring the Throne vacant; but since they had done it, they acquiesced, and none deserved so well to fill it as the Prince of Orange; and afterwards went with the rest to the market cross of Edinburgh, where they were declared King and Queen of Scotland, where the Duke of Hamilton, to shew his zeal, did the meanest action, that ever could be heard tell of in a Duke, for he officiated as clerk, and read from the cross to the people the act of Convention. Next they voted Lord L---, Sir James Montgomery, and Sir John Dalrymple to carry up their offer, with their grievances and claim of right, which were the conditions pretended as giving him the crown. And that they might be in greater safety during the adjournment, which they were to make, until they knew, whether the Prince and Princes of Orange had accepted of their present, they voted a full power to Duke Hamilton to imprison whomsoever he suspected, until the return should come back, fearing if such a power were lodged in many, some advertisements might be given. 1689. many difficulties would arise in any treaty about it; whereas the present circumstances were critical, and required a speedy decision, and quick provision to be made for their security; since, if they continued in such a neutral state, they would have many enemies, and no friends; and the zeal, that was now working amongst them for Presbytery, must raise a greater aversion than ordinary in the body, that was for the Church of England, to any such treaty with them. At last the whole House, except twelve, approved of what the committee had done, and passed the following Act: The Estates of the kingdom of Scotland find and declare, that King James VII being a professed Papist, did assume the royal power, and acted as a King, without ever taking the oath required by law, and had, by the advice of evil and wicked counsellors, invaded the fundamental constitution of this kingdom, and altered it from a legal and limited monarchy to an arbitrary despotick power; and had governed the same to the subversion of the Protestant religion, and violation of the laws and liberties of the nation, inverting all the ends of government; whereby he had forfeited the crown, and the throne was become vacant.

Immediately after this the Estates ordered, that the committee for settling the government should bring in an act for settling the crown upon their Majesties William and Mary; and to consider the terms of the destination of the crown; and likewise to prepare an instrument of government, to be offered with the crown for redressing the grievances, and securing the liberties of the people (1).

The small number of those, who adhered to King James, endeavoured to prevent the passing of this act; and among the rest, the Bishop of Elin-

(1) According to this vote the committee drew up an act, reciting the methods, by which King James had invaded the constitution of that kingdom: "1. By erecting public schools and societies of the Jesuits; and not only allowing mass to be publicly said, but also converting Protestant chapels and churches to public mass-houses, contrary to the express laws against saying and hearing mass. 2. By allowing Popish books to be printed and dispersed by a patent to a Popish printer, designing him printer to his Majesty's Household, College, and Chapel, contrary to law. 3. By taking the children of Protestant noblemen and gentlemen, sending them abroad to be bred Papists, and bestowing pensions upon priests to pervert Protestants from their religion by offers of places and preferments. 4. By discharging Protestants, at the same time he employed Papists in places of greatest trust, both civil and military, &c. and intrusting the forts and magazines in their hands. 5. By imposing oaths contrary to law. 6. By exacting money without consent of Parliament or Convention of estates. 7. By levying and keeping up a standing army in time of peace, without consent of Parliament, and maintaining them upon free quarter. 8. By employing the officers of the army as Judges throughout the Kingdom; by whom the subjects were put to death without legal trial, jury, or record. 9. By imposing exorbitant fines to the value of the parties estates, exacting extravagant bail and disposing of fines and forfeitures before any process or conviction. 10. By imprisoning persons without expressing the reason and delaying to bring them to trial. 11. By causing several persons to be prosecuted, and their estates to be forfeited, upon stretches of old and forfeited laws, upon weak and frivolous pretences, and upon lame and defective proofs; as particularly the late Earl of Argyle, to the scandal of the justice of the nation. 12. By subverting the rights of the royal boroughs, the third estate of Parliament, imposing upon them not only magistrates, but also the whole town-council and clerks, contrary to their liberties and express charters, without any pretence of sentence, surrender, or consent. So that the Commissioners to Parliaments being chosen by the magistrates and councils, the King might in effect as well nominate the estate of Parliament. Besides that many of the magistrates by him put in were Papists; and the Boroughs were forced to pay money for the letters imposing those illegal magistrates upon them. 13. By sending letters to the chief courts of justice, not only ordering the Judges to stop sine die, but also commanding how to proceed in cases depending before them, contrary to the express laws; and by changing the nature of the Judges patents ad vitam or culpa in a commission de bene placito, to dispose them to a compliance with arbitrary courses, and turning them out of their offices, if they refused to comply. 14. By granting personal protections for civil debts, contrary to law.

"All which were miscarriages of King James; utterly and directly contrary to the known laws, freedoms, and statutes of the realm of Scotland. "Upon which grounds and reasons the estates of the Kingdom of Scotland did find and declare, that King James VII, being a professed Papist, did assume the regal power, &c. whereby he had forfeited the rights of the crown, and the Throne was become vacant. "Therefore in regard his Royal Highness, then Prince of Orange, since King of England, whom it pleased God to make the glorious instrument of delivering these Kingdoms from Popery and arbitrary power, by advice of several Lords and Gentlemen of the Scots nation then at London, did call the estates of this kingdom to meet upon the fourteenth of March last, in order to such an establishment, as that their religion, laws, and liberties might not again be in danger of being subverted; the said estates being at that time assembled accordingly in a full and free representative of the nation, taking into their most serious consideration the best means for attaining the ends aforesaid, did in the first place, as their ancestors in like cases had usually done, for the vindicating and asserting their antient rights and liberties, declare, that by the law of Scotland no Papist could be King or Queen of the realm nor bear any office therein; nor that any Protestant successor could exercise the regal power, till they had sworn the Coronation oath. 2. That all proclamations asserting an absolute power to null and disenable laws, in order for erecting schools and colleges for Jesuits, converting Protestant Churches and chapels into mass-houses, and the allowing mass to be said, and the allowing Popish books to be printed and dispersed, was contrary to law. 3. That the taking the children of noblemen and gentlemen and others, and keeping them abroad to be bred Papists; the making funds and donations to Popish schools and colleges; the bestowing pensions on priests; and the seducing Protestants from their religion by offers of places and preferments, was contrary to law. 4. That the disarming of Protestants, and employing Papists in the greatest places of trust, both civil and military, &c. was contrary to law. 5. That the imposing an oath without authority of Parliament, was contrary to law. 6. That the raising of money without consent of Parliament or Convention, was contrary to law. 7. That employing the officers of the army as judges &c. was contrary to law. 8. That the imposing extraordinary fines &c. was contrary to law. 9. That the imprisoning of persons without expressing the reasons, &c. was the same. 10. That the prosecuting and seizing men's estates as forfeited, upon stretches of old obsolete laws &c. was contrary to law. 11. That the nominating and imposing magistrates &c. upon boroughs, contrary to their express charter, was the same. 12. That the sending letters to the courts of justice, ordaining "the 1689. Edinburgh represented, that it related many unlawful acts, of which that King was innocent, and which were wholly to be charged on his Ministers: That supposing him to be guilty, they were not competent judges of his misdemeanors, being illegally convened; and therefore that the best method the Convention could follow for the good of the nation, was to desire and favour his Majesty's return into his dominions, who out of gratitude would not fail to redress all their grievances. This speech was answered with great force and spirit by one of the members; so that the act being read and agreed to in the Convention, the same day their Majesties were crowned King and Queen of England, they were also proclaimed King and Queen of Scotland.

*Remission
the clause of rights
Burnet.*

The fatal blow, which by a clause in this act was given to Episcopacy, not only occasioned great discontents in Scotland, but very much increased those of England, and rendered the union of both nations desperate. And indeed it was thought an absurd thing, that this clause, whereby it was declared, that Prelacy in the Church was a great and insupportable burthen to the nation, should be inserted in a claim of rights, for which not only they had no law, but which was contrary to many laws then in being; so that tho' they might have offered it as a grievance, there was no colour for pretending it was a national right. But they had a notion among them, that every article, that should be put into the claim of rights, became an unalterable law, and a condition, upon which the crown was to be held; whereas grievances were such things, as were submitted to the King and Parliament to be redressed, or not, as they should see cause. But the Bishops, and those, who adhered to them, having left the Convention, the Presbyterians had a majority of voices to carry every thing, as they pleased, how unreasonable soever, and upon this the abolishing of Episcopacy was made a necessary article of the new settlement.

It may here be observed, that soon after the King came to St. James's, the Episcopal party in Scotland had sent up the Dean of Glasgow, to know what the Prince of Orange's intentions were with relation to that party; and the Prince answered, that he would do all he could to preserve them, granting a full toleration to the Presbyterians. But this was, in case they concurred in the new settlement of the kingdom; for if they should oppose that, and if by a great majority in Parliament, resolutions should be taken against them, he could not make a war for them, though he would do all that was in his power to maintain such of them, as should live peaceably in their functions. This the Prince ordered Dr. Burnet likewise to write back, in

"the Judges to desist from determining of causes, and ordaining them, how to proceed in causes depending before them, &c. was contrary to law. 13. That the granting of personal protections was the same. 14. That the forcing the subjects to depose against themselves in capital causes, however the punishments were restricted, was contrary to law. 15. That the using torture without evidence or in ordinary crimes, was contrary to law. 16. That the sending of an army in a warlike manner into any part of the kingdom in time of peace, and exacting locality and free quarters, was the same. 17. That charging the subjects with law-boroughs at the King's instance, and imposing bonds without authority of Parliament, and the suspending advocates for not appearing, when bonds were offered, was contrary to law. 18. That the putting garrisons into private men's houses, in time of peace, without authority of Parliament was illegal. 19. That the opinions of the Lords of the sessions in the two cases following were illegal, viz. that the concerning the demand of the supply of a defaulted person, although not given, was treason; that persons refusing to discover their private thoughts in relation to points of treason, or other men's actions, are guilty of treason. 20. That the fining husbands for their wives withdrawing from church, was illegal. 21. That Prelacy, and superiority of an office in the church above Presbyters, is and has been a great and insupportable burthen to this nation, and contrary to the inclinations of the generality of the people, ever since the reformation, they having reformed Papery by Presbytery, and therefore ought to be abolished. 22. That it is the right and privilege of the subject to protest for remedy of law to the King and Parliament against sentences pronounced by the Lords of the sessions, provided the same do not stop executions of the said sentences. 23. That it is the right of the subject to petition the King; and that all prosecutions and imprisonments for such petitioning were contrary to law.

"Therefore for the redress of all grievances, and for the amending, strengthening, and preserving the laws, they claimed that Parliaments ought to be frequently called and allowed to sit, and freedom of speech and debate allowed to the members. And then they further claimed and insisted upon "all and sundry the premises as their undoubted rights and liberties, and that no declaration or proceedings to the prejudice of the people in any of the said premises ought, in any wise, to be drawn hereafter into example; but that all forfeitures, fines, loss of offices in imprisonments, banishments, prosecutions, and rigorous executions be considered, and the parties redressed.

"To which demand of their rights, and redress of their grievances, they took themselves to be encouraged by the King of England's declaration for the Kingdom of Scotland in October last, as being the only means for obtaining a full redress and remedy therein.

"Therefore so far as they had an entire confidence, that his Majesty of England would perfect the deliverance so far advanced by him, and would still preserve them from the violation of the rights, which they had asserted, and from all other attempts upon their religion, laws and liberties; the said Estates of the kingdom of Scotland had resolved, That William and Mary, King and Queen of England, be declared King and Queen of Scotland, to hold the crown and royal dignity of the said kingdom to them the said King and Queen during their lives, and the longest liver of them; and that the sole and full exercise of the power to be only in and exercised by him the said King, in the names of the said King and Queen during their lives. And after their decease, that the said crown and royal dignity be to the heir of the body of the said Queen; which failing, to the Princess Anne of Denmark, and the heirs of her body; which also failing, to the heirs of the body of the said William King of England.

"And then withal they prayed the said King and Queen to accept the same accordingly. It was also declared by the instrument, that the following oath,

I A. B. do sincerely promise and swear, that I will be faithful, and bear true allegiance to their Majesties King William and Queen Mary. So help me God.

should be taken by all Protestants, by whom the oaths of allegiance, or any other oaths and declarations, might be required by law instead of it; and that the oath of allegiance and all other oaths and declarations should be abrogated.

1689. in answer to what some Bishops and others had writ to him upon that subject. But the Viscount Dundee, when he returned into Scotland, possessed them with such an opinion of another speedy Revolution, that would be brought about in favour of King James, that they resolved to adhere firmly to his interests; and thus declaring in a body, with so much zeal, in opposition to the new settlement, it was not possible for King William to preserve Episcopacy there; all those, who expressed their zeal for him, being equally zealous against that order.

Amongst those, who appeared in this Convention, none distinguished himself more than Sir James Montgomery, a Gentleman of good parts, but of a most unbridled heat and of a restless ambition. He bore the greatest share in the whole debate, and promised himself a considerable post in the new government. The Duke of Hamilton presided with remarkable discretion and courage; so that the bringing the settlement so soon to a calm conclusion was chiefly owing to him.

On the 13th of April the Convention ordered a proclamation to be published, forbidding all persons to own the late King James VII. for their King, or obey, assist, or accept any commissions, that might be given out by him, or any way to hold correspondence with him; and requiring all the ministers of the gospel within the kingdom publicly to pray for King William and Queen Mary. This proclamation was partly occasioned by the coming over of one Bradley from Ireland, with commissions from King James, and letters from his Secretary the Earl of Melfort to the Earl of Belcarras, and others (1), discovering the designs of his master and his adherents. Bradley being taken and examined, some expressions were found in these letters, which highly offended the Convention. You will ask me, without question, says Melfort to Claverhouse, how we intend to pay our army; but never

(1) "The first, says the Earl of Belcarras, that found the effects of this power [of the Duke of Hamilton to imprison whomsoever he pleased] was the Viscount of Dundee and myself, occasioned by your Majesty's sending over one Mr. Bradley with letters from Ireland, wherein you gave us the same orders, that before you had done with Mr. H——y; which was to do nothing until your further orders, and that five hundred foot and three hundred horse, which you had ready to send, were landed. These letters were taken by the folly of Mr. Bradley, for he had told all his business to one Mr. T——n, who came over with him out of Ireland on purpose to betray him; and even after he had discovered him to Duke Hamilton, and that he was seized on and searched, they could find nothing about him, all his letters being hid in a false bottom of his wallet; nor had they any suspicion where they were, until he eased all their minds, by telling all he knew of the matter from whom and to whom he came, which had never been known but by him, the letters having no directions. Duke Hamilton, by virtue of the power given him, immediately ordered the Earl of L——n to send over one hundred foot to my Lord Dundee, and as many to me; but his house being twenty miles farther off than mine; besides having the river of Tay betwixt him and them, and having a good party of his own regiment constantly with him, they found it not so safe to apprehend him. But I was taken and brought to Edinburgh, and put in a common goal. I had the liberty of it at first, for some days that the Convention did not sit; but as soon as they met, and read the letters, there were never men in greater rage than generally the whole house was against me. Upon reading of one from the Earl of Melfort to me, wherein after he had given us assurance of speedy relief, he expressed himself much after this manner; That he wished some had been cut off, that he and I spoke about, and then things had never come to the pass they were at; but when we get the power again, such should be hewers of wood and drawers of water. This Duke Hamilton took as meant of himself; but what the Earl of Melfort's intentions were in these expressions, I cannot determine; but to justify him and myself, I do declare, that he never in his life made the least insinuation to me of any such proposition. But whatever he intended by them, nothing could have been more to the prejudice of your affairs, nor for my ruin, than this, which did shew, that nothing but cruelty would be used, if ever your Majesty returned. These letters were printed both in Scotland and England, and were like to have their designed effect; for when they were read in the Convention, though I had N. 5. Vol. III.

"many relations there, yet few appeared my friends, except the Duke of Queensberry, which was the more generous in him, for we had been in very ill terms, and until your Majesty's departure, I saw his inclinations sincerely to follow you. He told the house, he doubted not but the Earl of Melfort had writ those letters on purpose to ruin me; and if letters coming to me could be made criminal, it was in the power of every man's enemies to expose him to what they pleased. That which inclined the Duke of Queensberry to believe this the more was, that he knew of my concurring with many of your faithful servants, (notwithstanding of my friendship and relation to the Earl of Melfort) to desire your Majesty by Mr. L——y, Capt. C——n and C——n who were sent to you to intreat, that the Earl of Melfort should not come along with you, for at that time there was never a man in any nation so abhorred; inasmuch that whatever came from your Majesty, if he was thought to be the least concerned in it, there needed no more to give all the Isle of Britain a prejudice against it. This I confess, made many of us desire your Majesty, that he might not come along with you. That there were some, that did this out of perfect spite, I cannot deny; but these were but a few to the vast number, that did otherwise sincerely for your Majesty's service, finding how obnoxious he was to all parties: nor had he greater enemies in the nation, than the generality of the Roman Catholics. Though what the Duke of Queensberry said did shew his inclinations, yet it did signify nothing to allay the heat, for Duke Hamilton told him, he had as little reason as any to satisfy me, for he doubted not but he himself was also meant. And generally all of them thought they were comprehended under hewers of wood and drawers of water. So I was voted close prisoner, where I was kept fourteen weeks, till after the battle of Edinburgh was surrendered, at which time I was put in there. Nor did they limit their rage and malice to me; only by all they thought I was concerned in this, and likewise must feel it; and to make the greater noise, they apprehended several gentlemen, whom they thought my friends, and put them likewise in a common goal; and it was proposed by the Earl of C——d, that the Lord Leche, who was one of those taken with me, should be made close prisoner; he said, he was sure, (considering the friendship I had for him) he knew all, that was designed, or had been acted in the late civil government. But this even Duke Hamilton did not incline to; but the other urging, it was brought to a vote, and carried in the negative only by three."

In another to the Lord Belcarras he says, The estates of the rebels will recompense us. Experience has taught our illustrious master, that there are a good number of people, that must be made Gibeonites, because they are good for nothing else. You know, that there are several Lords, that we marked out, when we were both together, that deserve no better. These will serve for examples to others. After the reading of these letters, the President of the Estates addressing himself to the assembly, said, You hear, Gentlemen, our sentence pronounced; and that it becometh us either to defend ourselves, or die. Upon which the Lord Belcarras, the Lord Lochore, and Lieutenant-Colonel Balfour were committed to prison, and several others bound to their good behaviour on sufficient security. And being thus made sensible of their danger, the Estates ordered four new regiments of foot and ten troops of horse to be immediately levied, besides the forces, which several of the Nobility offered to raise. Garrisons were put into the castle of Dumfries, Ardnhill, and Arran; and a ship sent from Ireland with six thousand arms, which were designed for the rebels in the north of Scotland, was seized on the western coast, whither she was driven by a storm.

Ibid.

After the Estates had received the King's answer to their letter, they gave another to their commissioners for tendering the crown to King William and Queen Mary; wherein they desired their Majesties to sign and swear the oath, which the law had appointed to be taken by the Kings and Queens at their accession to the crown, till such time as affairs should allow that kingdom the happiness of their presence, in order to their coronation. They declared, that they were sensible of his Majesty's kindness and paternal care in promoting the Union, which they hoped was reserved for him to accomplish. They thanked his Majesty for sending those troops, that might help to preserve them; and assured him, that as it was the interest of England to contribute towards the security of Scotland; so they should not be wanting on their parts to give their assistance for the reducing of Ireland.

Burnet

The commissioners from the Convention, who were the Earl of Argyle for the Lords, Sir James Montgomery for the Knights, or, as they call them, the Barons; and Sir James Dalrymple for the Boroughs, being arrived at London upon the 11th of May, met in the Council-chamber, and from thence were conducted by the master of the ceremonies to the Banqueting-house, where their Majesties were prepared to receive them, sitting on their thrones. They first presented the letter from the Estates to his Majesty; then the instrument of government; next, a paper containing the grievances, which they desired might be redressed; and lastly, an address to his Majesty for turning the Convention into a Parliament. All these being read to their Majesties, the King returned to the commissioners the following answer: "When I engaged in this undertaking, I had particular regard and consideration for Scotland; and therefore I did emit a Declaration in relation to that, as well as to this kingdom, which I intend to make good and effectual to them. I take it very kindly, that Scotland hath expressed so much confidence in, and affection to me. They shall find me willing to assist them in every thing, that concerns the weal and interest of that kingdom, by making what laws shall be necessary for the securing of their religion, property, and liberty, and to ease them of what may be justly grievous to them."

After this the coronation-oath was tendered to their Majesties, which the Earl of Argyle spoke word by word distinctly, and the King and Queen repeated it after him, holding up their right hands all the while, after the manner of taking oaths in Scotland. The commissioners, by the authority of the Estates, represented to his Majesty, "That the clause of the Kennet, oath, in relation to the rooting out of Hereticks, did not import the destroying of Hereticks; and that by the law of Scotland no man was to be persecuted for his private opinion; and even obstinate and convicted Hereticks were only to be denounced rebels, or outlawed, whereby their moveable estates are confiscated." Hence his Majesty, at the repeating that clause in the oath, did declare, that he did not mean by these words, that he was under any obligation to become a persecutor. To which the commissioners made answer, that neither the meaning of the oath, nor the law of Scotland, did import it. Then the King replied, that he took the oath in that sense, and called the commissioners there present, to be witnesses of his so doing.

On the 5th of June the Duke of Hamilton acquainted the Convention, that his Majesty had been pleased to appoint him his Commissioner; and that he was impowered to give his consent to an act for the turning the meeting of the States into a Parliament, in which his Majesty's farther pleasure was, that the Earl of Crawford should preside. This act was accordingly passed the same day; and the Parliament was prorogued to the 17th of June.

His Majesty being now King of Scotland, as well as of England, resolved to form a Ministry for that kingdom (1). He determined to rely chiefly for advice on Dalrymple the father, who

A Ministry for Scotland. Burnet.

(1) "During the adjournment of the Convention, says the Earl of Belcarras, all appeared very quiet, though at that time humours and discontents began to arise among themselves, the Prince of Orange not being able to satisfy the pretensions and avarice of them all. And those, that had appeared early for his interest, and had been the chief instruments of raising the rabble in Edinburgh, and had shewn their zeal for him in the Convention, thought they had better pretensions than those, who came over with him, they having only acted what they had done out of necessity, being for the most part forfeited persons.

"The Prince of Orange, till he had got his business done, managed both parties, so that each believed he had all to expect; but after the Convention, they quickly found their mistake, for his own inclinations were entirely for those that came over with him, and he got the Lord Melville, a creature of his own, made sole Secretary of State for Scotland, and the council named as he had a mind, at least of such as he, if they could do him no good, they could signify as little against him, by which his power would be the greater. In it were named some, more for shew of their families, than any kindness for their persons or esteem for their parts; such as 1689. had been recommended to him, before he left the Hague, by the Pensioner Fagel. And though he had heard great complaints of him, (as indeed there was some ground for them,) yet since his son Sir John Dalrymple was one of the three commissioners from the States of Scotland, he concluded from thence, that the family was not so much hated, as he had been informed; and therefore continued still to be advised by him. The Episcopal party were afraid of Sir James Montgomery's being made Secretary of State, from whom they expected nothing but extreme severities; for which reason they used their utmost endeavours to prevent his preferment to that post; and the Lord Melvil, who had married the Duchess of Monmouth's sister, and had continued from the year 1660 firm to Presbytery, and had been of late forced to leave the kingdom, being looked on as an easy man, who would have credit enough to restrain the fury of that party, he was made sole Secretary. But this proved a very unhappy step; for as he was by his principles bigotted to Presbytery, and ready to sacrifice every thing to the humours of that party; so he proved to be in all respects a narrow-hearted man, who minded his own interests more than either that of the King or of his country. This choice gave a great distaste; and that was followed by a Ministry, in the framing of which he had the chief hand, who were weak and passionate men. All offices were split into commissions, that many might have some share; but it rendered them all contemptible. And though Montgomery had a considerable post offered him, yet his mistaking that, which he aimed at, sunk deep in his mind, and began to work in him an aversion to the King, which broke out afterward into much fury and plotting against him. Nor did the Duke of Hamilton think, that he was considered, in the new model of the Ministry, as he had deserved, and might justly have expected.

raised in Scotland.
Burnet.

The Parliament in Scotland was opened, on the seventeenth of June with much ill humour; and they resolved to carry the redress of grievances very far. Lord Melvil hoped to have gained the Presbyterian party, by sending instructions to the Duke of Hamilton, to open the session with an act in favour of Presbytery; but the majority resolved to begin with their temporal concerns, and the first grievance, to which redress was desired, was the power of the Lords of the articles, that relating so immediately to the Parliament itself. The King consented to a proper regulation, as that the number should be enlarged and changed, as often as the Parliament should desire it; and that the Parliament might bring matters before them, though they were rejected by the Lords of the Articles. This answered all the just complaints, that had been made of that part of the constitution; but the King thought it was the interest of the crown to preserve it thus regulated. Yet it was pretended, that, if the name and shadow of that were still kept up, the Parliament would in some time be insensibly brought under all those restraints, that were now to be provided against; for which reason they moved to take it quite away. The Duke of Hamilton wrote long letters both to the King and to the Lord Melvil, giving a full account of the progress of an ill humour, that was got among them, and of the ill consequence it was like to have. But he had no answer from the King, and Lord Melvil wrote him back dark and doubtful orders; upon which the Duke took little care how matters went, and was not ill pleased to see them go wrong. The revenue was settled on the King for life; and they raised the money, which was necessary for maintaining a small force in Scotland, though the greatest part of an army of six thousand men was paid by England. But even the Presbyterians began to carry their demands high; they proposed to have the King's supremacy, and the right of patronage, taken away; and they asked to high an authority to their Church government, that the Duke of Hamilton, though of himself indifferent as to those matters, yet would not agree to them. He thought these broke in too much on their temporal concerns, and would establish a tyranny in Presbytery, that could not be easily borne. He wrote to Bishop Burnet, who spoke sometimes to the King on those subjects, his design being chiefly to shelter the Episcopal Clergy, and to keep the change, that was now to be made, on such a foot, that a door might still be kept open. But the torrent was so strong, that it was not possible for the King, had he been ever so zealous for Episcopacy, to have preserved it at that time, and yet all the king's enemies in England, continually charged him for the alterations then made in Scotland.

A new debate was likewise set on foot in that Parliament concerning the Judges. By the law there, when the King names a Judge, he ought to be examined by other Judges, whether he is qualified as the law directs. But in the year 1661, because the Bench was to be filled with a new set of Judges, so that there was none to examine the rest, the nomination, which the King then made, was read in Parliament; and no objection being made to any of them, they did upon that fit and act as Judges. It was expected, that the same method should be followed at this time. But, instead of that, the King continued such a number of the former Judges, as was sufficient to examine those, who were now to be advanced; so that was ordered to be done. Upon this, those, who opposed every thing, pretended, that the nomination ought to be made in Parliament; and they had prepared objections against

" Marquis of D—, Earl of M—, Earl M—, Earl of E—, and Earl of E—, who, though they were not fanatics, yet were sure not to contradict any thing, that was to be done. Yet this dissatisfied extremely the Presbyterians, who now thought none should have been admitted, but such as had given proof of their conversion, and so enraged several, that had pretensions, particularly Sir James Montgomery, who thought nothing less due to his merit than to be Secretary. Duke Hamilton

" was little better satisfied to see, that all the employments were neither at his disposal, nor given to his children and friends, for whom he had made so many fruitless attempts both in your brother's reign and in your own. But the discontents and jealousies were generally known, yet they did not publicly declare against one another till at the first session of the Parliament in June 1689 where Duke Hamilton was Commissioner and the Earl of Cratcliffe a President." Act. of the Aff. of Scotland. p. 96.

(1) " Your

1689. against every one, who was in the list; intending by this to put a publick affront on one of the first and most important acts of the King's government. But the Duke of Hamilton had a positive instruction sent him, not to suffer this matter to be brought into Parliament; yet he saw the party was so strong, that they had a clear majority. Nor did he himself very much approve of the nomination, especially that of the elder Dalrymple, soon after made Lord Stair, to be President. And therefore he discontinued the Parliament.

While these animosities were thus fomented, Viscount Dundee had got together a considerable body of Gentlemen, with some thousands of Highlanders. He sent several messengers over to Ireland, pressing King James to come either to the north of England, or to Scotland; but at the same time desired, that he would not bring the Lord Melfort over with him, or employ him in Scots business; and that he would be contented with the exercise of his own religion. It may be easily supposed, that all this was very disagreeable to King James; and that the Lord Melfort disparaged all the Viscounts undertakings. In this he was much supported by the French about that King, who had it given them in charge, as a main instruction, to keep him up to an high owning of his religion, and of all those, who were of it; and not to suffer him to enter into any treaty or conditions with his Protestant subjects, by which the Papists should in any fort suffer, or be so much as discouraged. The Irish were willing enough to cross the seas to England, but would not consent to the going over to Scotland. The Viscount therefore was only furnished from Ireland with some small store of arms and ammunition, and had kind promises encouraging him, and all, who joined with him.

Lieutenant General Mackay commanded the English forces in Scotland. He followed the Viscount Dundee's motions, who was less encumbered with cannon and baggage, and so marched quicker than it was possible for Mackay to follow. His men were for the most part new levied, and without experience; but he had some old bodies, on whom he depended. The heads of the clans among the Highlanders promised to join him; but most of them went over to the Viscount Dundee. At last, after many marches and motions, they came to an engagement on the 26th of May, at Killcranky, some few miles above Dunkell. The ground was narrow, and Lord Dundee had the advantage. He broke Dundee through Mackay's army, who fled; and probably, if the Viscount had outlived that day, the victory might have been pursued very far. But a random shot put an end to his life, and to the whole design (1); for Mackay rallied his men, and made such a stand, that the other side fell into great disorder, and could never be formed again into any considerable body. And a fort was soon after built at Innerlochy, which was called fort William, and served to cut off the communication between the northern and southern Highlanders.

The siege of Edinburgh was likewise carried on with such vigour, that the Duke of Gordon seeing his ammunition spent, his house entirely ruined by the bombs, great breaches made in the walls by the cannon, and the besiegers advanced to the ditch; and despairing of relief, since the Lords Dunmore, Tarbat, and Lovat, with whom he held intelligence, were secured, he delivered up that important fortress on the 13th of June to Sir John Lamer, and surrendered himself and his whole garrison to King William's discretion, upon condition that their lives should be secured.

Thus

(1) "Your affairs, says the Earl of Belcarras to King James, suffered prejudice by the victory, considering the great loss of the Viscount of Dundee, who was the man the most proper for any such undertaking in the nation; for he well understood the different tempers of those he had to deal with, and knew well when and to whom it was fit to shew kindness. And though he was naturally more sparing of his money, than profuse, yet wherever your Majesty's service or ambition prompted, he stuck at nothing, but distributed frankly whatever he could command, which gained him intirely the hearts of those who followed him, and brought him into such a reputation, that if he were to be put in all private affairs, that the Prince of Orange could neither have gone nor sent into Ireland; by which, your Majesty would have been intire master of that Kingdom, and in a condition to have landed what forces you pleased in Scotland, which was the only thing all your friends most desired. Next day after the fight, an officer riding by the place, where my Lord Dundee fell, found lying there a bundle of papers and commissions, which he had about him. Those, who stripped him, thought them but of small concern, so they left them there lying. This officer a little after did shew them to several of our friends, among which there was one paper did no small prejudice to your affairs, and would have done much more, had it not been carefully suppressed. It was a letter of the Earl of Melfort's to my Lord Dundee, when he sent him over your Majesty's Declaration, in which was contained not only an Indemnity, but a Toleracion for all persuasions. This the Earl of Melfort believed would be shocking to Dundee, considering his hatred to fanatics; for he writes, that notwithstanding of what was promised in your declaration, that you would be a toleracion to each other, so, that you would break them when you pleased; nor would you think yourself obliged to stand to them. This not only dissatisfied him, but also many of your friends, who thought a more ingenious way of dealing better both for your honour and interest.

"Never were men in such a consternation as Duke Hamilton and the rest of the Parliament then at Edinburgh, when they heard from those that fled, of the defeat of Mackay. Some were for retiring into Ireland; others into the Western shires of Scotland; nor knew they whether to abandon the government, or stay a few days, until they saw if my Lord Dundee came nearer, for they never imagined he was so near. Some were for making them more close; the last was resolved on. So we were all in great confusion, but a great liberty was granted to each other's friends, yet we never had to many visits of your enemies, all making excuse for their absence, protesting they always wished us well, as we should see, whenever they had the opportunity. The fright of those who fled, and the loss of Col. L— and several others, to excuse themselves, told all was cut off, when a few days after several came to Edinburgh, who, they said, had been killed; and there being no more of the Viscount Dundee, we were all much relieved, and to take a little more heart, and soon after they got notice of his death, which put them out of all apprehension; for they knew, that with the loss of him in the army could make use of the victory, which soon appeared." Ann. of the Aff. of Scot. p. 127.

Thus the whole island of Great Britain acknowledged the sovereignty of King William, and submitted to his government; but Ireland was far from following the example of Scotland, and it was more than two years before that kingdom was entirely reduced to obedience,

Affairs of Ireland.
King.
Burnet.
Moyer.

The Earl of Tyrconnel had been made Lord Lieutenant of Ireland in the beginning of King James's reign, on purpose to carry on his designs for the establishment of Popery in that kingdom (1). The Earl of Clarendon (whom Tyrconnel succeeded) had given publick and solemn assurance that King James would maintain their act of settlement. But Tyrconnel went roundly to work. He turned all the English Protestant officers out of the army, and placed Irish Papists in their room. So an army paid by virtue of the act of settlement to secure it, was put into the hands of those who were engaged both in religion and interest to destroy the settlement, and those concerned in it, which was such a violation of the law, as could not be any way palliated. Upon this the Protestants of Ireland looked on themselves as in mercy, since the army was now made up of their enemies. Fitzton, a zealous Papist, and who knew no other law but the King's pleasure, was at the same time made Lord Chancellor. This struck all people with great terror, to see a man of Tyrconnel's temper, entirely depended on by the Irish, capable of the boldest undertakings, and of the most cruel execution, in full possession of the government. It was visible, father Peter and the Jesuits were throwing King James into desperate measures, and that in case all other methods failed, and his English army deserted him, he should think of accomplishing his designs by the assistance of France and an Irish army. In these circumstances was Ireland, when the Prince of Orange landed in England. Tyrconnel gave out new commissions for levying thirty thousand men; and reports were spread all over the Island, that a general massacre of the Protestants was designed in November. Terrified at this, the Protestants began to run together for their defence both in Munster and Ulster. They had no great strength in Munster, having been disarmed; nor any store of ammunition for the few arms they had. So despairing of defending themselves, great numbers came over to England, full of dismal apprehensions for those left behind. They moved earnestly that a speedy assistance might be sent them. In Ulster the Protestants had more strength, but they wanted a leader. The Lords of Granard and Montjoy, in whom they most confided, kept still such measures with Tyrconnel, that they would not take the conduct of them. However, London-derry, the chief town in the north of Ireland, had taken arms before the Prince of Orange reached London, as had also Imiskillin, Slego, Coleraine, Kilmore, and some others of less note. As soon as the Prince came to St. James's, the Nobility and Gentry of Ireland, who were then in London, met at the Duke of Ormond's house, and drew up an address to be presented to him, with draughts of the chief ports of that kingdom, praying him to take them into his protection, which the Lords and Commons of England had before desired.

There was at this time, a great variety of opinions about the affairs of Ireland. Some thought that the leaving Ireland in so dangerous a state, might be a means to bring the Convention, to a more speedy settlement of England, and that therefore the Prince ought not to make too much haste to relieve Ireland. This advice was generally believed to be given, by the Marquis of Hallifax. The truth was, the Prince did not know whom to trust. The English army was discontented, and probably, if he had sent any of them they would have joined Tyrconnel: Nor could he send away any of his Dutch troops, on whom he chiefly trusted for maintaining the quiet of England. Then the magazines were so exhausted, that till new stores were provided, there was little ammunition, to spare. The raising new troops was a work of time, nor were there any ships of war in those seas to secure the transports. And to send a small company of officers with some ammunition, which was all that could be done on a sudden; seemed to be exposing them to the enemy. These considerations inclined him to take another method. It was thought by some, that Ireland would certainly follow the fate of England. This was managed by an artifice of Tyrconnel's, who, by deceiving and threatening the most eminent Protestants in Dublin, got them to write over to London, and give assurances that he would deliver up Ireland, if he might have good terms for himself. The Earl of Clarendon was much depended upon by the Protestants in Ireland, who made all their applications to the Prince by him. Those who were employed by Tyrconnel to deceive the Prince, said, Tyrconnel would never resign, unless he was assured, that Clarendon was not to succeed. Upon which the Prince avoided speaking to Clarendon about the Irish affairs, who having possessed himself with the hopes of Tyrconnel's post, and seeing them frustrated, became a violent opposer of the new settlement, reconciled himself to King James, and remained ever after a warm promoter of his interest. The Prince being under difficulties how to relieve Ireland, hearkened to a proposition made him; which was, to send over Lieutenant General Hamilton, one of the officers that belonged to Ireland, and a sort of prisoner of war to the Prince. Hamilton who had served in France with reputation, had great credit with Tyrconnel, and though a papist, was believed to be a man of honour. He undertook to prevail with Tyrconnel to resign, and promised to return, in case he did not succeed. But instead of persuading Tyrconnel to submit, Hamilton advised him to stand out, for that all things in England were turning very fast in favour of King James. This step had a very ill effect, for before Hamilton came to Dublin, Tyrconnel was in such despair, as looking on all as lost, that he seemed to be very near a full resolution of getting the best terms he could. This appears the more probable from what passed at an extraordinary council, to consider the state of affairs, held by Tyrconnel in the castle of Dublin the day after King James retired from Rochester into France, which he could not have heard of. At this council Chief Justice Keating, the only Protestant judge in the Kingdom, made a speech to this purpose; "That it would be in vain to contend with the forces, which the Prince of Orange had brought to England, and which had mastered all opposition, or rather had met none in their march from the West to London; and that they would certainly find their work as easy in Ireland. That they should call to mind the misfortunes they lay under by their last rebellion, and the consequences, that would attend another by the utter forfeiture of all their lands and estates. That in the North the Protestants were already in arms, and would readily join with any other Protestants, who should be sent to their assistance. That the government of England being in the Prince of Orange's hands, there was no succour to be expected from that Kingdom; nor had they any fund of money to maintain a war, the revenue of Ireland not being sufficient to discharge the publick expence; and that this revenue would decrease daily. Therefore, concluded he, as I am called to give my advice on this extraordinary occasion, so I will not be answerable for any of the miseries, that may ensue upon your non-compliance, but exhort your Excellency to make a wise, timely, and honourable accommodation, which I doubt not you may obtain for yourself and people. May Almighty God direct your intentions for the good of the publick."

Tyrconnel heard the Judge with patience, who was seconded by some of the more moderate Papists; and at length moved in council, that if they would stand by and declare for the King and the Protestant religion, he would immediately make the Earl of Granard, President of that council, Lieutenant General, and the Lord Montjoy, Major General of the army of that Kingdom; which the Earl of Granard declining, Tyrconnel left the council abruptly without coming to any resolution. But Hamilton's arrival and persuasions secured him to King James, though he saw he must manage so as to gain as much time as he could, that the Prince might not make too much haste before a fleet and supplies came from France. Accordingly several letters were sent over to England giving assurances that Tyrconnel was fully resolved to treat and submit.

King James came into France in December 1688, where he was received with great civility by Lewis XIV., but the meanness of his discourse and his whole appearance and behaviour soon gave disgust to that court; and his constant application to hunting made him considered as a Prince, who from a cowardly despair resigned himself up to fortune, and abandoned a crown, which he found himself too weak either to recover or even to wear. In short, the more the French saw of him, the less pity they had for his misfortunes. He was perpetually surrounded by the Jesuits, affecting to declare himself of their society; and his bigotry was so excessive, that it exposed him to contempt; so that the Archbishop of Rheims, brother to Monfieur de Louvois, seeing him come from mass, could not avoid saying with an ironical tone, there goes a very honest gentleman, who has abandoned three Kingdoms for a mass. However the King of France assured him, that as they had both the same interests, so he would never give over the war, till he had restored him to his Throne. The only prospect which King James now had, was to keep up his party in Ireland and Scotland. Tyrconnel sent him private messages, earnestly pressing him for speedy supplies, though at the same time to carry on his pretended design to submit to the Prince of Orange, and to disguise his real intentions, he persuaded the Lord Montjoy to go with the chief Baron Rice, to King James, to represent to him the weakness of Ireland, and the necessity of yielding to the time, and waiting a better opportunity of serving himself of his Irish subjects. He swore most solemnly, that he was in earnest in this message, and that he knew the Court of France would oppose it with all their power; for said he, that Court minds nothing but their own interest, and they would not care, if Ireland were sunk to the pit of Hell, so they could but give the Prince of Orange but three months diversion. But, added he, if the King be persuaded to ruin his faithful friends to do himself no service, only to gratify France, he is neither so merciful nor so wise as I believe him to be. If he recover England, Ireland will fall in course, but he can never expect to conquer England by Ireland. If he attempts it, he ruins Ireland to do himself no kindness, but rather to exasperate England the more against him, and make his restoration impossible. He intimated likewise, that if the King would not do it, he would look on his refusal to be forced on him by those, in whose power he was, and that he should think himself obliged to do it without his consent. Every body told the Lord Montjoy, that this was all an artifice to amuse the Protestants, and to get him, who was the likeliest man to head them, out of the way; notwithstanding which, he was prevailed upon, contrary to the general opinion of all the Protestants in Ireland, to undertake the business, having first had these concessions made him in behalf of the Protestants. 1. That no more Commissions should be given out, or new men raised. 2. That no more of the army should be sent into the North. 3. That none should be questioned for what was passed. 4. That no private house should be garrisoned or disturbed with soldiers. He was no sooner set out from Dublin with the Chief Baron Rice, but Tyrconnel, according to his usual method of falsehood, denied these Concessions, and refused to observe any of them; and the Lord Montjoy, immediately after his arrival at Paris, instead of being heard to deliver his message, was committed prisoner to the battile, on account of the great zeal, which he had lately shewn for the Protestant interest; and this further exasperated the Protestants of Ireland against King James, and made them look upon him as a violator of publick faith to his subjects. However Tyrconnel gained his point, which was a good deal of time. Those who advised the sending over of Hamilton, were now out of countenance, and the Earl of Clarendon loudly exclaimed against it. Sir William Temple's son, secretary at war, who had raised 1689. raised in the Prince a high opinion of Hamilton's honour was terribly affected with his treachery, and soon after, without any other visible cause of melancholy, went in a boat on the Thames near the bridge, and leaped into the river and drowned himself.

Whatever disposition Lewis XIV. had to support King James, the French Ministry was at that time much divided. Louvois had the greatest credit, and was very successful in all his counsels; so that he was most considered. But Seignelay was believed to have more personal favour, and to be more entirely united to Madam Maintenon. These two were in a high competition for favour, and hated each other. Seignelay had the marine, as the other had the army, for his province. King James therefore having the most dependance on the marine, and looking on the Secretary for that post as the most powerful favourite, made his chief application to him; which induced Louvois to cross and retard every thing, which was proposed for his service; so that matters went on slowly and very defectively. There was likewise another circumstance in King James's affairs, that did him much hurt. The Count de Lauzun, (who was once designed for the husband of Mademoiselle de Montpensier, daughter of Gaston Duke of Orleans, though Lewis XIV. thought proper to break off the match, after he had consented to it) had come over to England to King James, and offered him his service, and had attended on the Queen, when she retired to France. He had obtained a promise from King James of the command of such forces, as the King of France would assist him with. Louvois hated Lauzun; nor did the King of France like to employ him; and therefore Louvois sent to King James, desiring him to ask of the King of France, Sourray, a son of his, whom he was educating to serve in war, to command the French troops. But King James had so engaged himself to Lauzun, that he thought he could not in honour depart from it. From that moment therefore, it is said, Louvois studied by all the ways he could think of, to disparage him, and all the propositions he made. However, King James obtained about five thousand Frenchmen to be sent over with him to Ireland (1), but no considerable supplies of money. But when Mem de Lauzun, who was to have the command of these forces, was to depart, he demanded to be made a Duke of France, and proposed that affair first to Seignelay, who mentioning it to Lewis XIV., the King was extremely angry with the demand, and when Lauzun spoke of it to him, expressed himself with great severity. Upon this Lauzun excused himself, by alledging, that King James had ordered him to solicit that honour; and he requested that King and his Queen to declare the same to the King of France, which they both did. But he being refused the title, thought proper to lay aside all thoughts of going to Ireland, though King James soon after made him a Knight

(1) Sir John Reresby tells us, that the French King furnished him with a squadron of fourteen men of war, six lesser frigates, and three fireships, all well manned and fitted; as also with a sum of two hundred thousand livres in ready money, and fifty thousand pistoles, as a present for his pocket, together with plate, tents, and a most royal and splendid equipage. He assisted him likewise with eight experienced field-officers, one hundred of inferior note, a guard of one hundred Swiss, a band of skilful pioneers, fifteen thousand of his own natural subjects, arms for forty thousand men more, cannon and ammunition in a great abundance, and over and above made him an offer of fifteen thousand of his French troops; but King James excused himself, saying, He would succeed by the help of his own subjects, or perish in the attempt. Sir John likewise informs us, that on the first of March 1688-9, a Lady of his acquaintance, who had been intrusted with some jewels of King James's, shewed him a letter from that King, dated the 17th of February N. S. intimating, that he was to set out next day for Ireland, and depended upon his old friends to assist him in his cause. This Lady, adds Sir John, told me, the French King had supplied him with a great treasure of money, and six thousand Swiss Protestants; that he intended to go though Ireland for Scotland, there to call a Parliament, instead of the proposed Convention; and that from thence he would march into England, and put himself entirely into the hands of the Protestant interest. She added, that as she had a friendship for the Lord Privy Seal, [the Marquiss of Halifax] she had a mind to disclose herself to him, if with any safety she so might do. I told her I would speak to his Lordship that very night, and let her know farther. Having an opportunity of speaking to him accordingly, I failed not to be as good as my word, though I must own, the topic being of so nice and tender a sort, I did it with great caution. However, I give him plainly to understand, that the chief motive, which induced the Lady to desire a meeting with him, was, to impart to him what might be for his own good, and the service of the publick. Hereupon he began to be “ more free and open with me than he had hitherto “ been on this chapter; and I told him in general, “ that great designs were on foot. He said, he be“ lieved it; and that though men seemed to be for “ the present interest as most prevalent, it was not al“ together discreet to venture too far: That if mat“ ters really were as I had said, it was but safe to car“ ry it fair with those in the opposition, and so let some “ people know he spoke always with great respect of “ King James: That if we came to blows, it was “ uncertain who would strike hardest: and that he “ should be glad to meet the Lady at my house, when“ ever she pleased. But his Lordship however said, “ all imaginable care would be taken to ward off any “ danger, that might threaten us: That an army of “ twenty thousand men would be presently raised:

“ That all suspicious persons would be secured, the “ Parliament intending to invest the King with a “ power to imprison whom he pleased, and to keep “ them in safe custody till they came to a trial; and “ in fine, that the Parliament would most plentifully “ furnish the King for the prosecution of the war. At “ this time several Lords and Gentlemen of both “ Houses withdrew to their several countries; and I “ was told, that some, who were outwardly great “ friends to the present government, were treating for “ terms on the other side; which I particularly com“ municated to his Lordship, and particularly made “ mention of some he little suspected. Whereupon “ his Lordship said, that if King James was actually “ driving on at the rate reported, the Papists would “ certainly contrive some how or other to assassinate or “ kill King William; well knowing, what a task it “ would be to defend the crown on the head of a wo“ man; with much to the same effect.—On the “ 3d of March Lord Halifax met the Lady I just “ now mentioned to have received a letter from King “ James. She dealt very frankly with him, but durst “ not tell him all she knew. However, he desired “ her to be his friend, if any alteration of affairs should
“ by any means be brought to pass.” Reresby's Mem.

The rest of the officers were Maumont, Captain of the guards, in the post of Marechal de Camp; Puiguan, Colonel of the Regiment of Languedoc, as Brigadier of the foot; Ley Gar, Brigadier of the horse; and Bosclaw, Captain of the guards, as Major General. Besides these officers there were sent likewise an hundred Captains and an equal number of Lieutenants. When King James took his leave of the King of France, the latter told him; that the best thing he could wish him, was never to see him again. He took shipping at Brest, and landed at King'sale in Ireland on the 12th of March 1688-9. The next day he went, with a numerous attendance, to Cork, where he was received by the Earl of Tyrconnel, who caused one of the magistrates to be executed for declaring for the Prince of Orange. On the 24th of March King James entered Dublin in a triumphant manner, and the next morning having called a council turned out the Earl of Granard the Chairman, and Chief Justice Keating; and in their rooms, placed Cartwright, Bishop of Chester; and Lieutenant Colonel Dorrington and Count D'Avaux the French Ambassador, who under another title was Governor of Ireland for the King of France. In short the officers and domesticks of King James, were almost all French.

A secret Treaty with the King of France.

These circumstances gave some colour to a report then current, that there was a secret treaty between him and the French King, by which King James obliged himself, as soon as he should be restored to his Kingdoms, to renounce all claim to the title and arms of France; to resign the sovereignty of the narrow seas, and the honours of the flag: To furnish France at his own charge with thirty ships of the line, and twenty thousand land forces, when he should be required: To make no treaty or alliance, without the consent of the King of France; to have an army constantly on foot, and to keep in his pay ten thousand French, and five thousand Catholic Swiss; to yield up Ireland to Lewis, who in return, engaged to conquer for him Sicily and Sardinia; and lastly, in case the two Princesses King James's daughters, should become widows, to put them into the hands of the French King, in order to be married to whom he should think proper, upon condition, that the eldest son that should be born of such marriage, should be King of Scotland and Ireland, England and it's dominions in America remaining to the Prince of Wales. The French were to have as a security for the performance of these conditions a garrison in Dover castle, and at Portsmouth and Plymouth. And by the additional articles to this treaty, it was resolved to suppress the Protestant religion in Ireland. This treaty appeared so improbable, that the reality of it was doubted by many, but it must be owned that King James's conduct in Ireland, confirmed the suspicions of others that he had actually entered into such an engagement.

King James publishes five proclamations.

Boyer.

Kennet.

Upon his arrival at Dublin, he ordered five proclamations to be published: one seemingly in favour of his Protestant subjects, who had lately left that Kingdom, requiring them to return home, with assurance of his protection; and further requiring all his subjects, of what persuasion soever, to join with him against the Prince of Orange. A second, commending all his Roman Catholic subjects for their vigilance and care in arming themselves; yet whereas it had encouraged some robberies, it required all but such, who were actually under command and pay in the army, to lay up their arms in their several abodes. A third, inviting the country to carry provision to his army. A fourth raising such monies, as were current in Ireland; and a fifth, calling a Parliament to meet at Dublin on the 7th of May. At the same time he created the Earl of Tyrconnel a Duke, and bestowed the Royal Regiment on Colonel Dor- a Duke. ington in the room of the Duke of Ormond.

The Protestants were so little inclined to trust King James's promises, that they chose to stand upon their defence; and gathering into one body, made a shew of oppoling his forces in the open field. But being routed by Lieutenant General Hamilton (1) at a place called Drummore, their resistance and defeat gave occasion to King James and Tyrconnel to use those in their power with redoubled severity, and to march towards the North with an army of about twenty thousand men, to force the rest out of their strong holds.

King William being sensible of the desperate condition of his Irish subjects, had already sent Capt. James Hamilton, with ammunition and arms to Londonderry, and named Col. Lundee, on whose fidelity he depended, Governor of that town. But it soon appeared, how much he was mistaken in his choice. On the 13th of April Mr. George Walker, Rector of Donab- moore in the county of Tyrone, who had raised a regiment for the defence of the Protestants, receiving intelligence, that King James having taken Coleraine and Kilmore, after a stout resistance, was drawing his forces towards Londonderry, hastened thither to give Lundee an account of it. The Governor at first believed it to be only a false alarm, but was soon convinced of the contrary, the enemy being advanced to Cledysford. Walker returned to Lysford, where he joined Col. Crafton, and afterwards according to Lundee's directions, took his post at the Long Causey, which he vigorously maintained a whole night; but being over-powered by the enemy's numbers, retreated to Londonderry, where he vainly endeavoured to persuade Lundee to take the field. On the 17th of April Col. Lundee thought fit to call a council of war, and that Col. Cunningham and Col. Richards, who two days before came into the river of Lough-Foyle with their regiments from England, should be members of it. Accordingly they met, and with other gentlemen either equally disaffected, or at best, as little acquainted with the condition of the town, or the inclination and resolution of the people, they at last concluded, "that there was no provision in the town of Londonderry for 1689. "for the present garrison, and the two regiments on board, for above a week or ten days at most; and it appearing, that the place was not tenable against a well appointed army; therefore it was not convenient for his Majesty's service, but the contrary, to land the two regiments under Colonel Cunningham. That considering the present circumstances of affairs, and the likelihood the enemy would soon possess themselves of that place, it was thought most convenient, that the principal officers should withdraw themselves, as well for their own preservation, as in hopes, that the inhabitants, by a timely capitulation, might make terms the better with the enemy." After this resolution, an instrument was prepared to be subscribed by the Gentlemen of the Town-Council, and to be sent to King James, who was advanced in person with his army as far as St. John's Town; and it was recommended with this encouragement, that there was no doubt, but upon surrender of the town, King James would grant a general pardon, and order restitution of all that had been plundered from them. Some Gentlemen were influenced by these considerations to subscribe; others not only refused, but began to conceive some jealousies of their Governor; and some, though they did but guess at their proceedings, expressed themselves after a ruder manner, threatening to hang both the Governor and his Council. However, Captain White was sent out to the King to receive proposals from him; and it was at the same time agreed with Lieutenant-General Hamilton, that he should not march the army within four miles of the town. But contrary to this agreement, King James, upon the confidence given him, the town would surrender at the sight of his formidable army, advanced on the 18th of April at the head of it before the walls, where meeting with a warm reception, which put his men in some disorder, he retired to St. John's Town. In the mean time Mr. Muckeridge the Town-clerk, saw it absolutely necessary to give the people some intimation of the proceedings at the council of war; which discovery so enraged them against the Governor and his Council, that the latter finding themselves in danger, made their escape in confusion, though not without some hazard to their persons, from the soldiers themselves, who were under great discontent to be deserted by those, who had engaged them in difficulties, which they were then under. The Governor could not so easily retire, being more obnoxious than any of the rest, and therefore thought it convenient to keep his chamber. A council being appointed there, Mr. Walker and Major Baker endeavoured to persuade him to continue his government; but he positively refusing to concern himself, they, out of respect to his commission, thought it a duty to contribute to his safety, and suffered him to disguise himself, and in a sally for the relief of Culmore, to pass in a boat with a load of match on his back; from whence he went to Scotland, where he was secured, and sent to London, to answer for the miscarriages laid to his charge.

The garrison of Londonderry being thus effectually encouraged by Mr. Walker to maintain the town against King James, they unanimously resolved to chuse both him and Major Baker to be their Governors during the approaching siege. But these Gentlemen considering the importance as well as uncertainty of such an office, acquainted by letter Colonel Cunningham, (whose business they had reason to think it was to take care of them) with this matter, and desired him to undertake the charge; but he pretending, that by his instructions he was obliged to obey the orders of Colonel Lundee, refused the proposal, and return to England, where both he and Colonel Richards were deservedly cashiered. Upon this refusal Mr. Walker and Major Baker accepted the government of the garrison, and regimented the men in the town, to the number of seven thousand and twenty, under eight Colonels, and three hundred and thirty-three inferior officers.

It was certainly a bold undertaking in this *Dis-Boyer p. vine and Major Baker to maintain against a formidable army, commanded by a King in person, an ill-fortified town, with a garrison composed of poor people, frightened from their own homes, and without a proportionable number of horse to sally out, or engineers to instruct them in the necessary works. Besides, they had not above twenty guns, and not one of them well mounted; and not above ten days provision, in the opinion of the former Governor; so that several deserted every day; and others not only gave constant intelligence to the enemy, but industriously endeavoured to betray the Governors. On the 20th of April King James invested the place; and the next day began to batter it; of which the Governors sent advice to England by Mr. Bennet, acquainting his Majesty with their resolutions to defend themselves to the last, and imploring a speedy assistance. In the mean time several attacks were made by the besiegers, and as many sallies by the besieged, in both which the besieged had always the advantage; and they would have had less reason to fear either the number or rage of their enemies without, if they had not had within both famine and sickness to oppose.* 60.

On the 29th of April King James retired from the camp (1) to meet his Parliament at Dublin. King James and the besiegers finding their attempts still attended with ill success, removed their main body from St. John's town, and pitched their tents upon Bely-warry hill about two miles distant from Londonderry, for the closer guard of the town, to hinder the besieged from coming to the wells of Water. On the 17th of June the besiegers made an assault on that part of the place, which they thought most accessible, but were repulsed with great slaughter; and the next morning they began to batter the walls with the usual ill success. On the other hand the besieged began to be reduced to the last extremity, when they espied three ships, that fired at Kilmore castle, and attempted to come up the river, which however was prevented by the enemies shot. Not long after they discovered a fleet of thirty fail 1689. fail in the Lough, which they believed came from England to their relief, though they could not propose any method to get intelligence from them, the enemy watching them more narrowly, and having raised batteries opposite to the ships, lined both sides of the river with musketeers, and contrived in the narrow part of the river, where the ships were to pass, a fort of flaccado, being a boom of timber joined by iron chains, and strengthened by a cable of twelve inches thickness twisted round it. Notwithstanding these difficulties, one Reck boldly adventured to get to the water-side over against the town, and then swimming cross the river gave the besieged an account, that Major General Kirk (1) was come to their assistance with men, provision, and arms; and how much he desired to get with his ships up to the town. With this messenger Kirk had sent another, one Crummy, a Scotsman, to give them the same account, and to know the condition of the garrison; but he being taken by the enemy, was by them intrusted to frame a message much differing from the other. Thereupon the besiegers invited the garrison to a parley, telling them, that they were under great mistakes about the Major General, and their expectations from England, where things were all in confusion; and that they might have leave to inform themselves further from the messenger, whom they had taken. The besieged sent some to that purpose, who soon discovered the cheat, and returned with other particulars of his treachery. The Governors received further intelligence by a little boy, who with great ingenuity brought two letters from the Major General at Inch, the one tied in his garter, and the other within a cloth-button. By the latter the General assured Mr. Walker, "that he would endeavour all means imaginable for their relief, but found it impossible by the river, which made him send a party to Inch, whither he was going himself to try, if he could beat off the enemies camp, or divert them so, that they should not press the town. That he had sent officers, ammunition, arms, great guns; &c. to Imiskillin, who had 3000 foot and 1500 horse, and a regiment of Dragoons, that had promised to come to their relief; and at the same time he would attack the enemy by Inch. That he expected six thousand men from England every minute, they having been shipped eight days before. That he had stores and victuals for the town, and was resolved to relieve them. That England and Scotland were in a very good posture, and all things there very well settled. That they in the town should be good husbands of their victuals, and, by God's help, they should overcome those barbarous people. That several of the enemy had deserted to him, who all assured him they could not stay long."

All this while the besieged were not a little weakened by the raging famine; and though many bold attempts were made to reach the ships in the river, they were still frustrated by the enemies shot. About this time Major Baker being taken very ill, and made incapable to act as Governor, Col. Michelburn was chosen to assist Mr. Walker, that if one should fall, the town might not be left without a government, and to the inconveniences of a contested election. On the other side the arrival of Marshal Rosen, the French General, who was appointed to command in chief in the Irish camp, very much spirited the besiegers. This General having viewed the fortifications of the town, and finding, how little his men had advanced in the siege, expressed himself with great fury against the besieged, and swore he would level the place with the ground, and bury those, who defended it in its ruins, putting all to the sword, without consideration of either age or sex, and would study the most exquisite torments to lengthen the misery of such, as he should find obstinate. But neither his threats nor his fair promises, of both which he was very liberal, had any effect upon those, who had so absolutely devoted themselves to the defence of their city, their religion, and the interest of King William and Queen Mary. And lest any should contrive to surrender the town, or move it to the garrison, the Governor made an order, that no such thing should be mentioned upon pain of death. On the 20th of June died Governor Baker, to the great loss and affliction of the besieged. Three days before Lieutenant-General Hamilton sent some plausible offers to the garrison, to which they seemed to hearken, till they had used that opportunity to search for provisions; and though they were reduced to the necessity of feeding upon horse-flesh, dogs, cats, rats, and mice, tallow, starch, dried and salted hides; in a word, on the most loathsome things, that men in their condition ever used for sustenance; yet they unanimously resolved to eat the Irish, and then one another, rather than surrender; and their answer to Hamilton was, "that they much wondered he should expect they should place any confidence in him, who had so unworthily broke faith with King William, their Sovereign: that he was once generously trusted, though an enemy, and yet betrayed his trust; and they could not believe he had learned more sincerity in an Irish camp." This bold answer so enraged the French General, that he published an order directed to the Governors and Garrison of Londonderry, importing, "that if they did not deliver the town to him by the first of July, according to Lieutenant-General Hamilton's proposals, he would dispatch his orders as far as Ballyshannon, Charlemont, Belfast, and the Barony of Imphoven, and rob all, protected as well as unprotected, Protestants, that were either related to the garrison, or of their faction; and that they should be driven under the walls of Londonderry, where they should be suffered to starve.

(1) The employing of him was not at all approved of. Though he had deserted King James, it was feared, that he was so conscious of his sanguinary conduct, after the defeat of the Duke of Monmouth at Marston, that, as the English Protestants would never be reconciled to him, so he must therefore do something to regain the good will of their enemies. However, this is certain, that he lay six weeks in the Lough without attempting to relieve the garrison of Londonderry, who were all the while reduced to the utmost distress. Oldmixon, p. 21. This agrees with what Bishop Burnet says, that Kirk made not that haste to relieve them that was necessary, considering the misery they were in, II. 12.

But he concluded, "that if they would return to their obedience, and surrender the town upon any tolerable conditions, he would cause the capitulation to be punctually observed, and protect them from all injuries." But the besieged received this letter with the same contempt and indignation, as they had done Hamilton's proposals.

The news of this order being brought to Dublin before it was executed, the Bishop of Meath went immediately to King James, to see, if he could prevail with him to prevent such a barbarous proceeding. The King very calmly said to the Bishop, that he had heard of it before, and that he had sent orders to stop it: that General Rosen was a foreigner, and used to such proceedings, as were strange to us, though common in other places; and that if he had been his own subject, he would have called him to account for it. Yet he continued that General still in employment, whose dragoons and folders executed his orders against the Protestants with the utmost rigour. They first stripped and drove the whole country for thirty miles round before them, not sparing nurses with their sucking children, women big with child, nor old decrepit persons; some women in labour, and some who were just brought to bed, were driven among the rest. The very popish officers, who executed the thing, confessed that it was the most dismal sight they had ever seen; and that the cries of the poor people seemed to be still in their ears. They owned, that they gathered above four thousand, others said, seven thousand; and that they kept many of them without meat or drink for a whole week; that several hundred died in the place before they were dismissed, and many more on the way as they went home again to their houses: Nor were they better, when they came there; for the straggling soldiers, rapparees, and pilferers, who followed the army, had left them neither meat, drink, household stuff, nor cattle, but had taken away all in their absence, so that the generality of them afterwards perished for want, and many of them were knocked on the head by these soldiers. This shocking proceeding confirmed the besieged in their resolution never to yield to such barbarous people; and it made them set up a gallows in view of the besiegers, and threaten to hang all the prisoners they had taken during the siege, if their friends were not immediately dismissed; and they acquainted the enemy, that they might send priests to their friends to prepare them for death after their own methods. The prisoners declared, they could not blame the garrison for putting them to death, since their own people exercised such cruelty on innocent persons, who were under their protection; but desired leave from the Governor to write a letter to Lieutenant General Hamilton, which being allowed, they sent him a letter signed by Netterville, Butler, Aylmer, Macdonel, Darcy &c. acquainting him, that the lives of twenty prisoners lay at stake, and therefore, they made it their request, that he would represent their condition to the Marshal General Rosen. That they were all willing to die with swords in their hands for his Majesty, but it was hard to suffer like malefactors; nor could they lay their blood to the charge of the garrison, the gover- nor and the rest having treated them with all civility imaginable. To this letter the Lieutenant General answered, that what those poor people were like to suffer, they might thank themselves for, being their own fault; which they might prevent by accepting the conditions, that had been offered them. And if, added he, you suffer in this, it cannot be helped, but shall be revenged on many thousands, of those people, as well innocent as others, within or without that city. However the sight of the gallows, and the importunity of some friends of those, who were to suffer prevailed upon Hamilton; so that on the 4th of July the poor half starved Protestants had leave to return to their habitations, after they had been kept under the walls of the town three days without meat. The garrison now consisted of five thousand seven hundred and nine men; and to lessen that number yet more, the Governors crowded five hundred of their useless people among the Protestants under the walls, who passed undistinguished with them, though in exchange they got some able and strong men out of their numbers.

By this time the scarcity of the vilest eatables was increased to such a degree, that the garrison and inhabitants had nothing left, unless they could prey upon one another. And it is remarkable, that a certain gentleman, who had preserved himself in good case, whilst the generality were reduced to skeletons, conceived himself in the greatest danger, and fancying several of the soldiers looked upon him with a greedy eye, thought fit to hide himself for three days. Mr. Walker, the Governor, being with good reason apprehensive, that these discouragements might at length overcome that resolution, which the garrison had so long expressed, considered of all imaginable methods to support them; to this end he preached on the 30th of July, in the Cathedral, and endeavoured to confirm their constancy by reminding them of what "importance it was to the Protestant religion at that time; and told them that they need not doubt, but that God would at last deliver them from the difficulties they were under." In this he proved a true prophet, for about an hour after the sermon, the garrison discovered three ships, which Major General Kirk had sent, according to his promise, "that when they could hold out no longer, he would be sure to relieve them, to the hazard of himself, his men, and ships" The Montjoy of Londonderry, commanded by Captain Browning; and the Phoenix of Coleraine, commanded by Captain Douglas; both laden with provision, were conveyed by the Dartmouth frigate. The enemy made a most furious fire upon them from Culmore, and both sides of the river, which they received and returned with the greatest bravery. The Montjoy made a little stop at the boom, occasioned by her rebound, after striking and breaking it, so that she was run a ground. Upon this the enemy gave the loudest and most joyful shout, and the most dreadful to the besieged, fired all their guns upon her, and were preparing their boats to board her. The trouble and concern of the besieged to see their last hopes disappointed are not to be expressed; but the Montjoy firing a broad side, the shock loosened the ship so, that she got clear, and passed the boom. Captain Douglas all this while was engaged and the Dartmouth gave the enemy warm

133. warm entertainment, till at length the three ships got up to the town to the inconceivable joy and transport of a garrison, which reckoned only upon two days life, having nothing left but nine lean horses, and a pint of meal to each man. Hunger and the fatigue of war had so far prevailed amongst them, that of seven thousand five hundred men regimented, they had now alive but four thousand three hundred, of whom at least a fourth part were rendered unserviceable. This brave and successful undertaking to discourage the enemy, that on the last of July they raised the siege in the night-time with great confusion, and in their retreat made a miserable havoc in the country, robbing and burning all before them for several miles. They lost between eight and nine thousand men before the walls of the town and an hundred of their best officers, most of whom fell by the sword, the rest of fevers and fluxes, and the French pox, which was very remarkable upon the bodies of several of their dead officers and soldiers. Upon their retreat they first incamped at Strabone; but hearing of the defeat of their forces under Lieutenant General Mackarty by the Inniskillin men, they removed their camp further off. Major General Kirk being come to Londonderry was received by the Governor and the whole garrison with the greatest joy and acclamations; and the next day Mr. Walker complimented him with his own regiment, that after doing the King all the service in his power, he might return to his own profession. But the Major General desired him to dispose of it as he pleased; and accordingly he bestowed it on Captain White, a Gentleman of experienced valour and known merit. The same day a Council was called at Londonderry, wherein Mr. Walker was desired and prevailed on immediately to embark for England with an address of thanks from the garrison and inhabitants to their Majesties; and upon his arrival at court received that welcome and reward, which his eminent services had merited (1).

Account of Inniskillin, another town in the north of Ireland, signalized itself no less than Londonderry in the Protestant cause; for upon notice, that Derry 1689. had denied entrance to the Lord Antrim's regiment they resolved not to admit any Irish garrison; and having raised a regiment of twelve companies, gave the command of it to Gustavus Hamilton, a person of conduct and resolution, whom they likewise chose for their Governor. The townsmen being thus in some posture of defence, proclaimed King William and Queen Mary on the 11th of March; but the Lord Gilmer declaring for King James some time after his arrival at Dublin, summoned the Governor of Inniskillin to surrender that place to him, with a promise from the King to grant them better terms than they might ever expect from him afterwards. A Council being called, it was unanimously agreed to stand firm to their former resolutions of defending the Protestant religion, and maintaining King William's title. Whereupon the Lord Gilmer landed all his forces towards Crom, a castle sixteen miles from Inniskillin, and possessed by the Protestants, which was besieged sometime by part of his troops; but the Inniskilliners having thrown a relief of two hundred men into the castle, forced him to raise the siege, and to retreat to Belturbet. On the 24th of April a detachment of the garrison of Inniskillin, headed by Lieutenant-Colonel Lloyd, made an excursion into the enemies country, took and demolished the castle at Angbor, and returned home with a considerable booty. Several other skirmishes and encounters passed between the two parties, wherein the Inniskilliners always came off with advantage; but the most remarkable of those actions was that which happened, the day before Londonderry was relieved, wherein two thousand Inniskilliners fought and routed six thousand Irish, at a place called Newton-Butler, and took their commander Mackarty (commonly called Lord Monestiel) with the loss only of twenty men killed, and fifty wounded (2).

Pursuant to King James's proclamation, the King Irish Parliament met at Dublin (3) the 7th of James's May; and the same day he made a speech, wherein speech to the Irish Parliament.

(1) Colonel Michellburn, who commanded one of the regiments in Londonderry during the siege, claimed to himself a considerable share in the defence of that town, and drew up a memorial wherein he complained of the injustice done him both by Colonel Baker and Mr. Walker, in assuming to themselves all the honour of it, and taking little or no notice of him, who, according to that memorial, was from the first to the last of that siege as forward and as serviceable as they, and particularly in advancing considerable sums of money for the use of the garrison, which they were not so well able to do; and which he himself wanted afterwards so much, that in Mr. Harley's ministry he lay in the Fleet prison for a debt contracted while he was soliciting the payment of the arrears coming to him, which were paid at last, but in a manner far short of the merit of so gallant an action in the defence of Londonderry. Oldmixon.

(2) This is the account of Story in his Continuation of the wars in Ireland; and it is probable, that Mr. Burchet means the same action, when he tells us that "about the time of raising the siege of Londonderry, the King's forces commanded by Colonel Berry, near Linaskea, had a signal victory over the enemy, inasmuch that with the number killed by the army, and those which were knocked on the head by the country people, they lost not less than four thousand men; and their cannon, with most of "their surviving officers, were taken, among whom "was Major-General Mackarty, who was shot through "the thigh, and run into the back." Burchet, B. IV. c. 2. p. 319.

(3) Bishop King observes, that every body foresaw, what a kind of Parliament that would be, and what was like to be done in it. "Our constitution," says he, lodges the legislative power in the King, Lords, and Commons: and each of these is a check on the other; that if any one attempt a thing pre-judicial to the kingdom, the other may oppose and stop it. But our enemies had made all these for their purpose; and therefore no law could signify any thing to oppose them, it being in their power to remove any laws when they pleased, by repealing it. "The King was their own, both inclined of himself, and easy to be prevailed on by them, to do what they would have him; so that we could promise ourselves no help from his negative vote." The Bishop then shows what methods were taken to fill the House of Lords with Popish Peers, so that there were only four or five Protestant Lords Temporal, and four Spiritual Lords in it; several acts being passed not by the consent of these last, though it was pretended in the preambles to them; and that the House of Commons was filled in such a manner, that only two Protestants, such as deserved that name, were in it. By this means "the Parliament openly proclaimed itself a "slave

1689. he told them, "That the exemplary loyalty, which that nation expressed to him, at a time when others of his subjects so undutifully misbehaved themselves to him, or so basely betrayed him; and their seconding their deputy, as they did, in this bold and resolute asserting of his right, in preserving that Kingdom for him, and putting it in a posture of defence, made him resolute to come to them and to venture his life with them, in defence of their liberties and his own right. That to his great satisfaction he had not only found them ready to serve him, but that their courage had equalled their zeal. That he had always been for liberty of conscience, and against invading any man's right or liberty, having still in mind that saying of holy writ, Do you as you would be done unto, for this is the law and the prophets. That it was this liberty of conscience he gave, which his enemies both at home and abroad dreaded to have established by law in all his dominions, and made them set themselves up against him, though for different reasons, seeing that if he had once settled it, his people, in the opinion of the one, would have been too happy, and in the opinion of the other, too great. That this argument was made use of to persuade their own people to join with them, and so many of his subjects to use him as they had done; but nothing should ever persuade him to change his mind as to that, and whereforever he was master, he designed, God willing, to establish it by law, and have no other test or distinction but that of loyalty, expecting their concurrence in so Christian a work, and in making laws against profaneness and against all sorts of debauchery. That he should most readily consent to the making such good and wholesome laws, as might be for the good of the nation, the improvement of trade, and relieving such as had been injured by the late act of settlement, as far forth as might be consistent with reason, justice, and the publick good of his people. That as he should do his part to make them happy and rich, he made no doubt of their assistance, by enabling him to oppose the unjust designs of his enemies, and to make the nation flourish. That to encourage them the more to it, they knew with how great generosity and kindness the most Christian King gave sure retreat to the Queen, his son, and himself, when they were forced out of England, and came to seek for protection and safety in his Kingdoms; how he embraced his interest, and gave him such supplies of all sorts, as enabled him to come to them, which without his obliging assistance he could not have done; and that this he did at a time, when he had so many considerable enemies to deal with, and still continued so to do." He concluded as he had begun, and assured them, that he was as sensible as they could desire of the signal loyalty they had expressed to him; and that he should make it his chief study, as it had always been, to make them and all his subjects happy."

This speech being ended, and the King withdrawn, Sir Richard Neagle Attorney General, who was chosen Speaker of the Commons, extolled to that house their obligations to the King of France and the Duke of Tyrconnel for that glorious meeting, and how proper it was for both houses to return his Majesty thanks for his gracious speech, and to desire Count D'Avaux, the French Ambassador, to do the same to his most Christian Majesty, on their behalf, for his generous assisting King James. These addresses were drawn up and presented immediately; and then a bill was brought in, containing a recognition of the King's title, and an abhorrence of the Prince of Orange's usurpation, and detection of the English. The next day his Majesty published the following Declaration, addressed to all his loving subjects in the Kingdom of England.

"James Rex.

"Altho' the many calumnies and dismal stories, by which our enemies have endeavoured to render us and our government odious to the world, do now appear to have been advanced by them, not only without any ground, but against their own certain knowledge, as is evident by their not daring to attempt to prove these charges to the world; which we cannot but hope hath opened the eyes of our good subjects, to see how they have been imposed upon by designing men, who, to promote their own ambitious ends, care not what slaughter they reduce our kingdoms to; yet we cannot but rejoice, that we have had an opportunity to demonstrate the falshood and malice of their pretences, since this our arrival in this our Kingdom of Ireland, by making it our chief concern to satisfy the minds of our Protestant subjects, the defence of their religion, privileges, and properties is equally our care with the recovery of our rights. To this end we have preferred such of them, of whose loyalty and affection we are satisfied, to places both of the highest honour and trust about our person, as well as in our army. We have, by granting our Royal protection to such, whose minds were shaken by the arts of our rebellious subjects, dispelled their apprehensions, and effectually secured them against the attempts even of their private enemies. Our ear hath always been open to their just complaints; and so far hath our royal mercy been extended to those, who were in arms against us, that we have actually pardoned several hundreds of them; and most notorious criminals are kept in an easy confinement, as they themselves acknowledge. We have taken care, that our subjects of the church of England be not disturbed in the exercise of their religion; and all Protestant dissenters enjoy liberty of their consciences without any molestation. And, out of our Royal care for the prosperity of our people, we have recommended to our Parliament as the first thing necessary to be dispatched, to settle such a security and liberty both in spiritual and temporal matters,

"slave to the King's will, and he was looked on as factiously and rebelliously inclined, that would dare to move any thing after any favourite in the House No. 6. Vol. III.

as may put an end to these divisions, which have been the source of all our miseries; being resolved, as much as in us lies, to entail liberty and happiness upon our people, so far as to put it out of the power of our successors to invade the one, and infringe the other. And this, we take God to witness, was always our design, of which we see our good subjects here are more and more convinced by the great numbers of those, who having been seduced or frightened by the restless importunities of our enemies, are returned to their country and habitations, and who assure us daily more would follow, if the ports were open. But the Usurpers know too well the sincerity of our intentions to permit the repassage of our said subjects, fearing nothing more than that their experience should undeceive the rest, who are restrained more through ignorance than any ill intention; and therefore deny them that liberty, which we afford to all, whose designs, we are satisfied, tend not to the disturbance of the peace. By this our gracious and royal care of our Protestant subjects, where the greatest part of our nation is Catholic, and have, as well as we, received the highest provocation from their fellow-subjects of contrary persuasions, so that nothing but our inclination to justice, and desire to see our people flourish, could move us to such a proceeding, we hope our subjects in England will make a judgment of what they may expect from us; and we do hereby promise and declare, that nothing shall ever alter our resolutions to pursue such, and no other methods, as by our said subjects in Parliament shall be found proper for our common security, peace, and happiness. And that none may be debarred of assisting us in recovering our rights, and redeeming of our people from their present slavery, out of any apprehensions from past miscarriages, we do hereby assure all our subjects of what quality soever, let their crimes against us be ever so great, that if in twenty four days after our appearance in person in our kingdom of England, they return to their obedience, by deserting our enemies, and joining with us, we will grant them our full pardon, and all past miscarriages shall be forgot; so little do we delight in the blood or ruin of our people. But if after this our gracious condescension they shall yet continue to assist our enemies and rebels, we do, before God, charge all the blood, which shall afterwards be shed, upon them and their adherents; and we doubt not, by the blessing of God upon our arms, to force the most obdurate to their duty; though, as we have made appear, in reducing our rebellious subjects in this Kingdom, we desire to use no other than lenity and mercy."

How ill King James's proceedings agreed with this declaration and speech was quickly seen, for on the 12th of May a bill was brought in to the house of commons by the Lord Chief Justice Nugent (1) for repealing the act of settlement; which, without any opposition, was read three times, and sent to the Lords. By this bill two thirds of the Protestants of the Kingdom, who held their estates by virtue of the acts of settlement and explanation, were deprived of them. There was no consideration had, how any man came to his estate; for though he purchased it at ever so dear a rate, he must lose it, and it was to be restored, without exception, to the proprietor or his descendant, who had it before October 22d 1641, upon what account soever he lost it; though they themselves did not deny, but many deserved to lose their estates; and even the son of Sir Phelim O Neile, the great murderer and rebel, was restored. In the upper house the Bishop of Meath very learnedly argued against this bill, alledging, among other objections, that no penalty was provided on such as should enter estates without injunctions; no considerations for improvements; no saving for remainders; no time given tenants and possessors to remove their flock and corn; no provision for protestant widows; and that it allowed only reprisals for original purchase-money, which was hard to make out, and was an injury to the second or third purchaser. He shewed likewise, that the bill was unjust, and not for the public, or even the King's advantage; but would ruin the Kingdom and destroy the public faith, as well as inconvenient in point of time. And he concluded with these words: "My Lords, either there was a rebellion in this Kingdom [in 1641], or there was not. If there was none, then we have been very unjust all this while in keeping so many innocent

Act of settlement repealed
State of Justice Nugent (1) for repealing the act of settlement 174-

(1) This Gentleman, who was afterwards created Baron of Riverstown, was the son of one, who had been Earl of Wiltshire, but had lost his honour and estate for being an actor in the rebellion begun in 1641. He had never been taken notice of at the bar, when he was advanced by King James to the post of Chief Justice of the King's Bench, and pitched upon to judge, whether the outlawries against his father and his fellow-rebels should be reversed; and whether the settlement of Ireland founded on those outlawries should stand good. It was a demonstration to the Protestants, what the King intended, when he assigned them such a Chief Justice; and indeed this Gentleman did not fail to answer the expectation conceived of him. He reversed the outlawries as fast as they came before him, notwithstanding a statute made in point against it; and in all causes, that ever came before him, wherein the plaintiffs and defendants were Papist and Protestant, he was observed always to give sentence for the former. Nay, it was shrewdly suspected, that he went farther in some considerable causes, and not only appeared for them on the Bench, but also secretly encouraged and fomented them. Before him, a deed should be judged forged or not forged, according as it served a Popish interest. And a Protestant needed no more to gain a cause against another Protestant than to turn Papist. He signalized himself likewise in another respect, which was by committing and persecuting persons for feigned offences and treasons, and by countenancing and encouraging, and after discovery, protecting false witnesses against Protestants. Many were brought in danger of their lives by his contrivances; and when the accused were acquitted on trial, by a palpable demonstration that the witnesses were perjured, he declared that they neither could nor should be prosecuted, for they only swore for the King, and he believed the accused persons guilty, though it could not be proved. In short, he shewed all the venom and rigour against them he could; he was set up to destroy them, and he went as far in it as his power could reach; his weakness, not his inclination, hindered him from carrying it further." King's State of Protestants, p. 63, 69.

1689. "cents out of their estates; and God forbid, that I should open my mouth in defence of so gross an injustice. But then what shall we say to his Majesty's Royal father's declaration in his Icon Basilike, who there owns, that there was a rebellion; and in pursuance of that opinion, passed an act to secure such as should adventure money for the suppressing of it; Nay, what shall we say to the two Bills, that have been brought into this house, the one by an honourable Lord, which owns it fully; the latter from the Commons, which owns a rebellion, but extenuates it? I take it then for granted, there was a rebellion; and if so, it was either a total or a partial one. If it was a general one, then all were guilty of it, and none can pretend to be restored to his estate farther than the King in his mercy shall think fit to grant it him. If it was a partial one, then some discrimination ought to be made between the innocent and the guilty; the innocent should be restored, and the guilty excluded from their estates. But here is a bill, that makes no distinction between them, but innocent and nocent are to fare alike; the one is to be put in as good a condition as the other. And can your Lordships imagine, that it is reasonable to do this, when we all know, that there has been a Court of Claims erected for the trial of innocents; that several had put themselves upon the proof of their innocence; and after a full hearing of all that they could offer for themselves, have been adjudged nocent?" But notwithstanding the force and evidence of the Bishop's reasons, supported by an address in behalf of the purchasers under the act of settlement, presented to the King by the Earl of Granard, and drawn up by the Lord Chief Justice Keating; yet the Lord Chancellor Fitzton's (1) arguments prevailed, and the bill received his Royal assent, and passed into an act.

Nor indeed could it be expected otherwise, when the greatest part of both houses were Roman Catholics, and consisted of the sons and descendants of those persons, who had forfeited their estates by the rebellion in one thousand six hundred and forty one, men, who had no freeholds or estates in the Kingdom, but were purposely elected to make themselves estates by taking them away from Protestants. And by these means the English Protestants lost more in Ireland than all King James's party in England and Scotland at that time were worth.

But to make a final extirpation of the Protestants, there was an Act of Attainder passed in Parliament, by which all Protestants, whose names they could find, of both sexes, and all ages and degrees were attainted of high treason, and their estates vested in the King, upon pretence of their being out of the kingdom at the time of passing the act. And lest some should be forgotten of those, who were absent, and not put into the bill of Attainder, there was contrived a general clause in the act of repeal, by which the real estates of all, who dwelt or staid in any place of the three kingdoms, which did not own King James's power, or corresponded with any such as were termed rebels, or were any ways aiding, abetting, or assisting to them from the first day of August 1688, are declared to be forfeited and vested in his Majesty; and that without any office or inquisition found thereof. By which clause almost every Protestant, who could write, in the kingdom, had forfeited his estate; for the packets went from London to Dublin, and back again, constantly from August to March 1688, and few had friends in England, or in the north, but corresponded with them by letters; and every such letter is made by this clause a forfeiture of estate. They had intercepted and searched every packet, that went or came the latter part of this time, and kept vast heaps of letters, which were of no consequence at all to the government;

(1) He had been detected of forgery, not only at Westminster and Choster, but likewise fined by the House of Lords in Parliament, and laid many years in prison, whence he was taken by King James, and advanced to the office of Lord Chancellor of Ireland; though he wanted law and natural capacity, as well as honesty and courage, to discharge such a trust, and had no other quality to recommend him besides his being a convert Papist. But the mystery of this promotion was easily discovered. The Papists of Ireland had gone a great way to retrieve the estates, which they had forfeited by the rebellion in 1641, by counterfeit settlements, forgeries, and perjuries; and to do their business in a great measure, there needed no more than to find a judge, who would be favourable to and countenance such proceedings; and where could they find a more favourable judge than one, who was notoriously involved in the same guilt, and who probably in some cases did not esteem such arts unlawful? But besides this, there is requisite to a Chancellor a peculiar quickness of parts and dexterity, to penetrate into the contrivances of cheats and forgeries; for which Sir Alexander Fitton's natural slowness and heaviness incapacitated him. But this very defect, together with his zeal for Popery, fitted him to execute the King's design as effectually as any that could have been found. He could not understand the merit of a cause of any difficulty, and therefore never failed to give sentence according to his inclination, having no other rule to lead him. And how he was inclined towards Protestants, appeared from his declarations on all occasions against them. He did not flick, on a hearing, to declare, that they were all rogues, and that amongst forty thousand there was not one, who was not a traitor, a rebel, and a villain. For this reason he would not allow the guardianship of a child to the Protestant mother, but gave it, against the positive words of the law, to the Popish relations. For this reason he refused to hear so much as a demurrer in the case of Mr. Strafford, the Popish Dean of Christ Church. For this cause he over-ruled both the common rules of practice of the courts, and the laws of the land, declaring in open court, "that the Chancery was above all laws, and that no law could bind his conscience;" and he acted accordingly in many cases, where the Protestants were concerned. After hearing a cause between one of them and a Papist, he would often declare, that he would consult a Divine before he gave a decree; that is, he would have the opinion of a Popish Priest, his Chaplain, educated in Spain, and furnished with distinctions to satisfy his conscience, how far he should do justice to Protestants. Many Papists came and made affidavits of being in possession, when they never were, and got injunctions and orders without any more trouble to quiet their possessions. But a Protestant though never so palpably disturbed, could not procure any order, but was sent to the common law to recover his possession by a Popish jury, returned by a Popish Sheriff, before a Popish Judge; that is, he must expect law from Judges and Officers who fate and acted in defiance of law. If at any time the Chancellor was forced to grant an injunction or a decree, it was with all the difficulties and delays that could be; and, often the thing was lost and destroyed before the order came for recovering it. King's State of the Protestants in Ireland, p. 65—67. &c.

1689. ment; and these letters were produced as evidences in the House of Commons against those, who appeared in behalf of their absent friends, or opposed the attainting of such Protestants, as they had some kindness for; and they were further reserved to prove a correspondence against the few men of estates, who were in the kingdom. Besides, it was the end of September 1688, before they heard any thing of the Prince of Orange's design to make a descent into England; and yet to have been in England or Scotland at any time in the month before, or to have corresponded with any there, was made a forfeiture of estate by this act. And left the children and descendants of the Protestants thus attainted, who had estates before 1641, should come in and claim them after the death of the attainted persons, by virtue of the settlement made on valuable considerations, and upon marriage, all such remainders and reversions were cut off. When this Bill of Attainder was presented to the King for his assent, Sir Richard Neagle, the Speaker of the House of Commons, told him, that many were attainted in that act upon such evidence, as satisfied the House; and the rest of them, upon common fame. By this act near three thousand Protestants were attainted, and among these two Archbishops, one Duke, seventeen Earls, seven Countesses, twenty-eight Viscounts, two Viscountesses, seven Bishops, eighteen Barons, thirty-three Baronets, fifty-one Knights, eighty-three Clergymen, two thousand one hundred and eighty-two Esquires and Gentlemen; and all of them declared traitors, and adjudged to suffer the pains of death and forfeiture.

The severity of this act exceeded even that of the famous proscription at Rome, during the last Triumvirate. For more were condemned in the little kingdom of Ireland, than were proscribed at that time through the vast extent of the Roman Empire. And to make this of Ireland yet the more terrible and unavoidable, the act left no room for the King to pardon after the last day of November 1689; and if the pardon was not enrolled before that time, it was declared absolutely void and null; and at the same time the act itself was concealed, and no Protestant allowed a copy of it till the time limited for pardons was past at least four months; so that the state of the persons attainted was desperate and irrecoverable, except an Irish Parliament should think proper to relieve them; for the King took care to put it out of the power of any English (as well as out of his own) to help them, by consenting to another act of this Parliament, intituled, An act declaring, that the Parliaments of England cannot bind Ireland, and against writs of errors and repeals out of Ireland into England.

The Parliament of Ireland having made some other acts, and among the rest, one for Liberty of Conscience, was prorogued on the 20th of July to the 12th of January ensuing; and so ended this Session, whose proceedings occasioned no less disturbance in that kingdom, than the war itself.

It was not thought enough, that Tyrconnel had stop'd the maintenance of the University of Dublin; but upon King James's arrival, the Vice-President, Fellows and Scholars, were all further proceeded against and ejected; their furniture, library, and communion-plate seized, and every thing that belonged to the college, and to the private Fellows and Scholars, taken away.

All this was done, notwithstanding that when 1689. they waited upon King James at his first coming to Dublin, he promised them, That he would preserve them in their liberties and properties, and rather augment than diminish the privileges and immunities granted to them by his predecessors. In the House they put a popish garrison, turned the chapel into a magazine, and many of the chambers into prisons for Protestants. One Moore, a Popish Priest, was nominated Provost, and one Macarty Library-Keeper, and the whole designed for them and their fraternity; and three of the former Collegians were forbid to meet together on pain of death. One Archbishopprick, several Bishopricks, and a great many other dignities and livings of the Church were designedly kept vacant; and the revenues first paid into the Exchequer, and afterwards disposed of to Popish Bishops and Priests, while in the mean time the cures lay neglected. So that it plainly appeared, that the design was to destroy the succession of the Protestant Clergy. At length things were carried to so great an height, that most of the churches in and about Dublin were seized upon by the government; and Colonel Luttrell, Governor of that city, on the 18th of June 1690, issued out an order, commanding all Protestants, who were not house-keepers, to depart out of the said city; and all such as were house-keepers, to deliver up their arms, both offensive and defensive; and likewise forbidding above five Protestants meeting any where upon pain of death, or such other punishment, as a Court-martial should think fit. And being asked, whether this was designed to hinder their meeting in churches? He answered, that it was intended to prevent their assembling there, as well as in other places, and accordingly all the churches were shut up, and all religious assemblies forbid throughout the kingdom, upon pain of death.

While King James was pursuing these violent measures, King William, among other objects of his care, was consulting the general good of Europe, and endeavouring to check the exorbitant power of France. It has been observed, War declared that the King of France had violated the peace clared of Nimeguen of 1678, and the twenty years truce gainst of 1684, by his sudden invasion of the Empire of 1688. The Diet of Ratisbon incensed at this invasion, and the cruel devastation of the Palatinate, unanimously resolved in March 1689, By the to make a vigorous war "upon the enemy, not of Ratisbon. "only of the Empire, but of all Christendom; "and even a greater than the Turk himself with "whom he was joined in a league against the "Emperor."

The United Provinces had in some measure By the U. proclaimed war against France, by their Manifesto- nited Pro- to which they had published October 28, 1688; containing the reasons of their assisting the Prince of Orange in his expedition to England, wherein they said, that having considered the good understanding between the Kings of Great-Britain and France, and that there was a strict and secret alliance between them, it was to be feared, if the King of Great-Britain should attain to an arbitrary power over his people, the two Kings, being united in interest and hatred of the Protestant religion, would endeavour to overturn, and if possible destroy their State; and therefore they had resolved to assist the Prince in his design of going over to England, not, as he declared, to invade the Kingdom, or dethrone the King, but

By Spain. On the 3d of May 1689, Spain provoked at the proceedings of the French King and his unjust declaration of war of April 15, ordered the Marquis of Castanaga, Governor of the Netherlands, to proclaim war against France, as the common disturber of Christianity. The Elector of Brandenburg had also declared war the 13th of April. In this situation of affairs, the Emperor's Envoy, the Spanish Ambassador, and the Dutch ministers earnestly pressed the King to proclaim war against the common enemy, especially as he had openly espoused the cause of King James, whom he had sent into Ireland with a considerable body of French forces. To these solicitations so agreeable to his inclinations, the King readily yielded, and Mr. Hampden made a motion in the House of Commons, for an address to his Majesty for a war with France; which address was voted unanimously by three hundred and fifty members, and presented by the House in a body in the following terms (1).

The Commons address for a war with France. Pr. H. C. 130 April 26. "WE your Majesty's most loyal and dutiful subjects, the Commons in this present Parliament assembled, most humbly lay before your Majesty our earnest desire, that your Majesty would be pleased to take into your serious consideration, the destructive methods of late taken by the French King against the trade, quiet, and interest of this your Kingdom; and particularly the present invasion of the Kingdom of Ireland, and supporting your Majesty's rebellious subjects there. Not doubting in the least, but that through your Majesty's wisdom, the alliances already made, with such as may hereafter be concluded on this occasion by your Majesty, may be effectual to reduce the French King to such a condition, that it may not be in his power hereafter to violate the peace of Christianity, nor prejudice the trade or prosperity of this your Majesty's kingdom.

"To this end we most humbly beseech your Majesty, to rest assured, upon this our solemn and hearty engagement, that when your Majesty shall think fit to enter into a War against the French King, we will give your Majesty such assistance in a Parliamentary way, as may enable your Majesty (under that protection and blessing God Almighty has ever afforded you,) to support and go through with the same."

To which address the King gave this answer.

The King's answer. Pr. H. C. P 305. "I receive this address as a mark of the confidence you have in me, which I take very kindly, and shall endeavour, by all my actions, to confirm you in it.

"I assure you, that my own ambition shall never be an argument to incline me to engage in a war, that may expose the nation either to damage or expence. But in the present case

"I look upon the war so much already declared, in effect, by France against England, that it is not so properly an act of choice, as an inevitable necessity in our own defence.

"I shall only tell you, that as I have ventured my life and all that is dear to me, to rescue this nation from what it suffered, I am ready still to do the same, in order to the preserving it from all its enemies. And as I do not doubt of such assistance from you, as shall be suitable to your advice to me, to declare war against a powerful enemy; so you may rely upon me, that no part of that, which you shall give for the carrying it on with success, shall be diverted by me to any other use."

Upon this resolution of a war with France, the King published A Proclamation for the encouraging French Protestants to transport themselves into this Kingdom; declaring, "that finding, in his subjects, a true and just sense of their deliverance from the persecution lately threatening them for their religion, and of the miseries and oppressions the French Protestants lay under; such of them as should seek their refuge in, and transport themselves into this kingdom of England, should not only have his royal protection, but he would so aid and assist them in their several trades and ways of livelihood, as that their being in this realm might be comfortable and easy to them." Some persons, who were absolutely divested of charity, were displeased with this invitation given to foreigners to settle here; but the generality highly applauded it, not only out of tenderness for their persecuted brethren, but also out of regard to the advantage of England; justly considering, that the kind entertainment, which Queen Elizabeth gave to the Walloons, whom the inquisition had driven out of the Low Countries, had vastly improved the woollen and silken manufactures of this nation; and that the Dutch daily increased in riches, and strength, by the favour which they shewed to the French refugees, some of whom were wealthy merchants, and the rest either laborious and industrious artificers, or brave and experienced officers and soldiers, who would cheerfully venture their lives in the defence of the Protestant religion, and of those States, which afforded them protection. At the same time another proclamation prohibited the importation of all sorts of manufactures and commodities whatsoever of the growth, production, or manufacture of France.

Not long after the French Papists, seeing the countenance given to the Protestants of their removing nation, became very insolent; publicly traducing the present government, and dispersing several sorts of libels and seditious papers. The House of Lords being informed of their audacious behaviour, and suspecting they might proceed to more dangerous attempts, ordered an address to be presented to his Majesty, desiring he would issue out a proclamation, that no

"Being therefore thus necessitated to take up arms, and relying on the help of Almighty God in our just undertaking, we have thought fit to declare, and do hereby declare war against the French King; and that we will, in conjunction with our allies, vigorously prosecute the same by sea and land, since he hath so unrighteously begun it; being assured of the hearty concurrence and assistance of our subjects in support of so good a cause; hereby willing and requiring our General of our forces, our Commissioners for executing the office of High Admiral, our Lieutenants of our several counties, Governors of our forts and garrisons, and all other officers and soldiers under them by sea and land, to do and execute all acts of hostility in the prosecution of this war against the French King, his vassals and subjects, and to oppose their attempts; willing and requiring all our subjects, to take notice of the same, whom we henceforth strictly forbid to hold any correspondence or communication with the said French King or his subjects. And because there are remaining in our Kingdoms many of the subjects of the French King, we do declare and give our royal word, that all such of the French nation, as shall demean themselves dutifully towards us, and not correspond with our enemies, shall be safe in their persons and estates, and free from all molestation and trouble of any kind.

Treaty with the States for a joint fleet.
Ap. 29.
Col of Tr.
I. 269.

The King had just before made a treaty with the States, by which a joint fleet of fifty English and thirty Dutch men of war, besides frigates and fireships, was to be fitted out and equipped for one year. The fleet was to be divided into three squadrons, one to serve in the Mediterranean, another in the Irish seas and Channel, and the third consisting only of frigates, to cruise from between Dover and Calais, as far as Yarmouth on one side, and Walcheren in Zealand on the other.

Sea-fight at Bantry-Bay.
May 1.
Burchet,
p. 415.

Some days before this proclamation the war was more effectually declared by an engagement between the English and French fleets in Bantry Bay. For Admiral Herbert having received notice, that King James was landed in Ireland, hastened to that coast with all the strength, which could possibly be collected, in hopes to intercept the ships of war, which were his convoy, in their return; and commanded the rest of the fleet to follow him; and that they might lose no time, to sail singly, without waiting for one another, the places appointed for rendezvous being the coast of Ireland, or ten leagues west of Scilly. He came before Cork the 17th of April with only twelve ships of war, one fire ship, two yachts, and two smacks; and was there informed, that King James, who had been conducted over by twenty two ships from France, had landed at Kinsale above a month (1). This induced him to cruise first before Brest, and then in the soundings, in hopes of meeting these ships. But not succeeding, he returned to the Irish coast the 29th of April, and discovered in the evening, near Kinsale, a fleet of forty four sail, of which he lost sight the next day; but judging them to be to the Westward, he bore away, with the wind Easterly, for Cape Clear, and in the evening saw them standing into Bantry Bay. He lay before the Bay until morning, and then stood towards them, having increased his strength to nineteen ships of war; but the Dorimouth, a small frigate, was one of the number. The French were at anchor, being twenty eight, most of them from sixty to seventy guns, and some larger, with five fire ships, and the transports which had carried to Ireland about five thousand men, were at some distance plying to windward. Upon sight of the English ships, those of the enemy got under sail, and when Admiral Herbert had, not without difficulty, worked up within two miles of them, they bore down on him in a very orderly line; and one of their ships being within musket-shot of the Defiance, which led the van of the English fleet, they two began the fight, and were followed by the rest as soon as possible. The Admiral endeavoured to gain the wind of the enemy, or at least to engage closer than they seemed willing to do; but finding he could not do either, and that it was not advisable to maintain in such a manner so unequal a fight, he stretched off to sea, not only to get his ships into a regular line, but to gain the wind, if possible. But the French were so very cautious in bearing down, that he could not meet with an opportunity of doing it; so that continuing the fight upon a stretch until about five in the afternoon, the French Admiral tacked and stood in towards the shore; and as the English ships had suffered so much in their masts and rigging, that above one half of them were unfit for farther action; so doubtless the French received considerable damage. How far their Admiral was restrained by orders, is not known; but it is certain, that he made very little use of the greatest advantages; for as he had the wind, so had he double the force, besides fireships. Considering therefore all circumstances, and that most of the English ships were very ill manned, they came off more fortunately than could reasonably have been expected; for there were no more than ninety men killed, and two hundred and seventy wounded, Captain George Aylmer of the Portland being the only Captain slain in the action. After the engagement, Admiral Herbert repaired to his rendezvous, ten leagues west from the Islands of Scilly, where he was in hopes of meeting with such an additional strength, as might have enabled him to proceed in search of the French; but being disappointed, he returned to Spithead. The French indeed assumed to themselves the honour of the day, and rejoicings were made on that account in France.

(1) Mr. Burchet is mistaken in saying about two months, since King James landed on the 12th of March.

1689. Father Daniel tells us, that Count de Chateau Renaud, Lieutenant General of the French fleet, being ordered to carry to Ireland a considerable convoy of provisions and ammunition, with three thousand men, while he was landing them, received advice, that Admiral Herbert, was approaching to attack him. The two fleets were pretty near equal; and the Count advanced to receive the English, whom he defeated and pursued, till night gave them an opportunity of escaping. The Count returned to Brest, where he was welcomed with the loudest acclamations of joy, having landed his troops, defeated the English fleet, taken seven Dutch vessels richly laden, in his return; brought back his own fleet in as good condition as he carried it out, and all this within the space of eleven or twelve days. It is reported, that when King William received the news of this sea-fight, he said, Such an action was necessary in the beginning of a war, but would have been rash in the course of it.

A fortnight after the King went to Portsmouth, both to hasten the refitting of the fleet, and to distribute rewards to the officers and soldiers, who had distinguished themselves in the engagement. Admiral Herbert was soon after made Earl of Torrington; Captain John Ashby, commander of the Defiance, and Captain Cloudesly Shovel of the Edgar, received the honour of Knighthood; and each seaman a gratuity of ten shillings. And besides this donative to the living, the King's bounty extended to the relics of those, who had lost their lives in their country's service.

Being returned from Portsmouth, the King went with the Queen to view the Earl of Nottingham's house at Kennington, which he designed to purchase, and make his residence during the sitting of the Parliament, upon account of its situation in an healthful air, and in the neighbourhood of London. The house being approved of, the purchase was soon after agreed upon with the Earl for twenty thousand pounds.

To return to the proceedings of the Parliament. The rest of this session was chiefly employed in raising supplies for the wars in Ireland and with France, in reversing attainders and judgments passed in the late reigns, and inquiring after the authors of the late illegal proceedings and present misconduct of affairs.

Pr. H. C.
II. 289.

As to the supplies, besides what has been already mentioned, six hundred thousand pounds was given for the maintenance of the forces to be employed in Ireland, and seven hundred thousand pounds towards the charge of the navy. For raising these sums, an additional excise of nine-pence a barrel was laid upon beer, ale, and other liquors, (which by a committee appointed for that purpose was estimated at twelve hundred thousand pounds); and a tax was voted upon all ground-rents for new buildings, upon new foundations, within the bills of mortality, since March 25, 1660, except such as were within the walls of the city; and an estimate was ordered to be taken of them, and of the forfeited estates, which estates (not including Bedfordshire, Lincolnshire and Cardiganhire, from whence no lifts had been sent in) the committee stated at three hundred and forty-eight thousand pounds, but of the ground-rents they could not as yet make any estimate. A poll-tax was also passed, and in order to defray the extraordinary expenses of the French war, a supplemental bill to the poll-tax was voted by the Commons, and sent up to the Lords for their concurrence; but the Lords adding a clause to it for Peers to name commissioners to rate themselves, the Commons would not agree to it. After some debates, the Lords positively adhering to their clause, the bill was dropped, and instead of it another was passed for an aid of twelve-pence in the pound. The friends to the Revolution imagining the business would soon be at an end, gave in to the assessors the full value of their estates, which being made the standard in all future assessments, during both the French wars, they continued to pay to that value, whilst those who were not so zealous came much more easily off. The Speaker, upon presenting this bill to the King, made a speech, setting forth "the burden the French King had laid upon our manufactures, his attempts against our religion and liberties, by encouraging those that designed their subversion, and his devaluations in the countries of our allies." Another money-bill passed the Commons, for an additional duty on coffee, tea and chocolate; but the Lords adding a proviso for a draw-back on exportation, to warm a dispute arose between the two Houses, whether the Lords had power to alter and rate a tax given by the Commons, that the bill did not pass this session.

The attainders reversed this session were those of Lord Russell, grandfather to the present Duke of Bedford, (whose death is in the act declared a murder) of Algernon Sidney, Cornish, and Alicia Lisle, widow of John Lisle, who was one of the commissioners of the Great-Seal in the time of the Commonwealth, and was afterwards assassinated in Switzerland. She had been most unjustly condemned by Jefferies, contrary to three verdicts of the Jury.

The case of the Earl of Devonshire was also taken into consideration by a committee of privileges appointed by the Lords (1), who having examined the matter, reported, "That they

(1) The Duke had been a zealous promoter of the bill of Exclusion against the Duke of York; which rendered him extremely obnoxious to that Duke, who took occasion to make him feel the effects of his displeasure after he came to the crown. The Earl had been very rudely insulted within the verge of the court by Colonel Culpepper, for which he contained himself, and only worked out the satisfaction of giving him his pardon, upon condition, that he should never more appear in Whitehall. But immediately after the defeat of the Duke of Monmouth, the Colonel was encouraged to shew himself at court, and was rising into a creature of it. The Earl of Devonshire meeting him in the King's presence-chamber, and receiving from him, as he thought, an insulting look, he took him by the nose, led him out of the room, and gave him a contemptuous blow with the head of his cane. For this bold act the Earl was prosecuted in the King's Bench upon an information, and had a fine of thirty thousand pounds imposed upon him, and was committed, though a Peer, to the King's Bench prison, till he should pay it. But he, who was never able to bear any confinement that he could break from, escaped only to go home to his seat at Clatsworth. Upon the news of his being there, the Sheriff of Derbyshire had a precept to apprehend him, and bring him with his posse to London. But he invited the Sheriff, and kept him a prisoner of honour, till he had compounded for his 1689. "were of opinion, that the proceedings against the Earl of Devonshire in the Court of the King's Bench in Easter term in the third year of King James II. (upon an information for an assault upon Mr. Culpepper, wherein his Lordship's plea of privilege of Parliament was over-ruled, and he was fined thirty thousand pounds, and thereupon committed to the King's bench in execution) was a great violation of the privileges of the peers of this realm. And those judges, who sat in the said court when the said judgments were given, and the said commitment made, should be required to attend at the bar of this House, to answer for the great offence, which they have committed thereby." Accordingly on the 6th of May, Sir Robert Wright and Sir Richard Holloway being brought to the bar, and Mr. Justice Powell being in his place, they were severally asked what they had to say for themselves in this business. Mr. Justice Powell said to this effect, "That it was his great misfortune, that he was misguided by some books, which he looked on as authorities, which he found by their Lordships judgment were not so: And he humbly begged their Lordships and the Earl of Devonshire's pardon. As to the fine, he looked upon three thousand pounds to be a fine enough; and that his silence in that business was his greatest fault, for which he also begged pardon."

Then Sir Robert Wright alleged, "That as to the breach of privilege, they were misguided by precedents. As to the fine, which is usually set according to the quality and estate of the person fined, it came from the puny judge thirty thousand pounds, and so to him last, according to the course of the court; and if he was mistaken, he begged pardon, for he never had the least disrespect to the Earl of Devonshire." Lastly, Sir Richard Holloway spoke to this effect; "That he as second Judge pronounced the fine thirty thousand pounds, which was set nemine contradicente; and if a lesser fine had been proposed, he should have accepted it; and did not justify the proceedings, but looked on it as an excessive fine, and begged my Lord Devonshire's pardon, and submitted all to their Lordships." The Lords asked them, whether they had no discourse together before, concerning the said fine. Sir Robert Wright denied it, and Sir Richard Holloway declared, that he had no discourse from either the King or Lord Chancellor concerning the said fine. But Mr. Justice Powell appealed to the memory of Sir Richard Holloway, that there was a discourse of the fine, five or six days before at the Lord Chancellor's; where Sir Robert Wright, Sir Richard Holloway, Sir Richard Allibone, and himself were. This, Sir Richard Holloway pretended he did not remember, and Sir Robert Wright denied that they were there purposely about the said fine. These two being withdrawn, Mr. Justice Powell was asked, what discourse they had at the Lord Chancellor's? To which he answered, "That the Chancellor first proposed twenty thousand pounds, and afterwards said, it would be better, if thirty thousand pounds, and then the King might abate ten thousand pounds. And he declared his dislike of this to the other Judges, tho' not before the Lord Chancellor." After the examination, notice having been given to the King's council, that if they had any thing to offer, Whether a Peer of this realm might by law be committed in execution for a fine? They might propose it; but they offering nothing upon that question, the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, upon a full consideration of the several cases and precedents, wherein the privileges of Peers had been concerned, declared and adjudged on the 15th of May, "That the court of King's-bench, in over-ruling the Earl of Devonshire's plea of privilege of Parliament, and forcing him to plead over in chief, it being within the usual time of privilege, did thereby commit a manifest breach of privilege; and that the fine of thirty thousand pounds imposed by the court of King's-bench upon the said Earl was excessive and exorbitant, and against Magna Charta, the common right of the subject, and the law of the land; and that no Peer of this realm, at any time, ought to be committed for non-payment of a fine to the King."

The next judgment that was reversed, was that of Mr. Samuel Johnson, Chaplain to the unfortunate Lord Russel, and author of several traits which had given offence to the courts of King Charles II. and James II. His sufferings being reported to the House of Commons (1), it

his own liberty, by giving bond to pay the full sum of thirty thousand pounds; which bond being found among the papers of King James after his abdication, it was given up to the Earl by King William. It is said, that the Countess Dowager of Devonshire, his mother, being uneasy to see him under so great an hardship, waited on King James to beg her son's pardon; and, for the discharge of the fine, humbly desired, that his Majesty would accept of her delivering up bonds, and other acknowledgments, for above sixty thousand pounds lent by her husband and his mother to his royal father and brother in their greatest extremities; but this request was rejected. Kennet's Memoirs of the family of Cavendish, p. 136—138.

(1) This report was made by Mr. Christy on the 24th of June 1689, and was as follows:

That in Trinity-Term, secundo Jacobi Regis, information was exhibited against the said Mr. Johnson in the King's-Bench, in the name of Sir Robert Sawyer, the King's Attorney General, for making, printing, and publishing a scandalous and seditious libel, intitled, An Numb. VII. Vol. III.

2. To stand in the pillory three days, in three several places, viz. the Palace-Yard Westminster, Temple-Bar, and the Old-Change.
3. To be whipt by the common hangman from Newgate to Tyburn.

Oates.

May 25.

Titus Oates likewise took the opportunity now of the indignation of the Parliament, against the illegal proceedings of the late reign, to apply to the Lords, for a reversal of the two judgments against him on the point of perjury; for which he had suffered more by the cruelty of the papists, than any other man ever endured with life. Whilst this business was depending, Oates printed a paper (which he owned before the Lords, and for which he was confined, being voted to contain matters tending to breach of privilege) wherein he alleged, "that in the year 1678, he had discovered a horrid Popish conspiracy for the destruction of the late King Charles II. his present Majesty, then Prince of Orange, and the Protestant religion, within these Kingdoms; and proved it so fully, that several Parliaments and Courts of justice, before whom he gave his testimony, declared their belief of it by public votes; and the condemnation of several of the conspirators, accused not only by him, but by several other witnesses. That the house of Lords being sensible of the great service of Oates, gave him their thanks in a most public manner, and addressed King Charles II. to grant his royal protection to the said Oates, and give him a subsistence, till the Parliament considered of a reward suitable to his great and public service to the King and Kingdom. 1689.

"That the said Oates discovered the traitorous conspiracy, which Coleman held with La Chaise, Confessor to the French King, which gave both Houses of Parliament full satisfaction of the Popish Plot; and other letters were produced by a person of quality, by which the Government was satisfied of the under-hand dealing of a great minister of State at that time, in order to procure a sum of money to put off the Parliament, all which did still justify the said Oates, and did verify the truth of his discoveries. That the Duke of York having a great influence upon King Charles II., as also several other of the Popish party, did prevail upon him to suffer the said Oates to be indicted of perjury, in two several indictments six or seven years after he had given his testimony concerning the Popish plot, and brought the same to a trial in 1685, in the reign of King James II., with an addition of some other witnesses, but all Papists, and brought up at St. Omer's, excepting one, who had likewise his education at St. Omer's, but was turned Protestant, as he pretended, and was made a minister by the Bishop of St. Ashaph. That the Lord Chief Justice Jefferies's brow-beating Oates's witnesses, as several Peers could testify, and appearing so much Oates's enemy, the King's council perverting the testimony, and no council daring to appear for Oates, he was found guilty of perjury. That the aforesaid indictments he had removed into the Lords house by writs of error; and if their Lordships would be pleased to examine into the merits of the cause, he would produce three witnesses, yet alive, that would justify his being in town at the time, that St. Omer's witnesses swore him out of town; That he could produce Mr. Jennison, who would prove, that Ireland was in town in August 1670;

scandal to the Clergy to have so infamous a punishment inflicted upon a Minister. Whereupon he being a prisoner in the King's Bench, which is in Surry, and in the Diocese of the Bishop of Winchester, he was summoned the 19th of November 1686, to appear the next day, the 20th of November, in the Convocation-house of St. Paul's, in the Diocese of the Bishop of London, he being Rector of Curringham in Essex within that Diocese. Upon the 20th of November, a Habeas Corpus was brought to carry him from the King's Bench prison to the Convocation-house, where he found the Bishops of Durham, Rocheſter, and Peterborough, to exercise the authority and jurisdiction of the Bishop of London during his suspension, and some Clergymen, and many spectators, and a libel exhibited against him by one Godfrey Lee, a Proctor, dated that day, charging him of being guilty of great misdemeanors, but specified none, nor proved any; only referred to the record before the King's temporal Judges.

That Mr. Johnson demanded a copy of the libel, and an advocate; both which the Bishops denied him; but immediately proceeded to his sentence, which was,

1. That he should be declared an infamous person.
2. That he should be deprived of his Rectory of Curringham in Essex.
3. That he should be a mere Layman, and no Clergyman, and deprived of all right and privilege of Priesthood.
4. That he should be deprived thereof, and of all vestments and habits of Priesthood.
5. That he should undergo the punishment aforesaid.

Against which proceeding Mr. Johnson protested, as being against law, and the 132d canon, not being done by the Bishop of London, his own Diocesan; but they refused his protestation.

That he appealed to the King in Chancery, but they refused to admit his appeal.

And immediately they proceeded to execute the said sentence, and to degrade him, by putting on a square-cap, and, then taking it off again; then they pulled off his gown, then his girdle; which he demanded as his own proper goods bought with his own money, which they promised him to send, but they cost him twenty shillings to have them again. After all, they put a bible into his hand, which he would not part with, but they took it from him by force. All this was done, the libel, sentence, and execution of it, in three hours space, on Saturday the 20th of November, having proceeded summarily as they did.

That on Monday the 22d of November, the judgment in the King's Bench was executed with rigour and cruelty, the whipping, being with a whip of nine cords, shewed to the committee, and Mr. Rauſe the Under-Sheriff, tore off his cassock upon the pillory, and put a frieze coat upon him.

That Mr. Johnson's wife had also an information exhibited against her in the King's Bench, for the like matter as that against her husband.

(1) Mr. Johnson could never obtain any Church preferment. The King gave him three hundred pounds a year, out of the Post Office, for his and his son's life; besides one thousand pounds in money, and likewise bestowed a place of one hundred pounds a year on his son. Mem. of Mr. Sam. Johnson, p. 15.

(1) The

1689. " 1678; which contradicted the Staffordshire witnesses. That the Papists themselves having justified Oates's testimony by their open and avowed violation of our laws, liberties, and religion, and executing those things in the reign of the late King, which he did discover them to be contriving in the reign of King Charles II. which was the substance of his testimony; he hoped the reputation of St. Omer's witnesses, who were bribed with places and offices in the army, and fums of money, should not prevail with the house of Lords from setting aside the judgments brought before their Lordships. All which was humbly offered to the consideration of the Lords and Commons."

The Lords, after hearing the opinion of all the Judges, and the council at the bar, did at last order, that the judgments given against him should be reversed; and accordingly a bill of reversal which had passed the Commons, was read twice in the House of Lords, who with some amendments inserted a Proviso, "That until the matters for which Titus Oates was committed for perjury, were heard and determined in Parliament; the said Oates, should not be received in any court or cause whatsoever to be a witness." A proviso, liable to so many exceptions, was protested against by thirteen Lords; because (as they said) the other part of the bill reversed the judgments against Oates, whilst this proviso enacted him to be incapable of being a witness, which is more infamous than being a slave. The bill being sent down to the Commons, they disagreed to the proviso; which occasioned a memorable conference between the two Houses, and that begot such heats, as were like to come to a dangerous height, if they had not been allayed by the adjournment of the Parliament. And all that Oates was able to obtain in this session, was his discharge from confinement, and an address from the Lords, at the desire of the Commons, requesting the King to grant him his pardon. The King complied with their request, and moreover, allowed him a pension of three pounds a week.

In the beginning of the session, a close committee had been appointed by the Lords to examine and take informations concerning the death of the late Earl of Essex, which had been attended with many suspicious circumstances; and this committee was revived in the next session, but before the report was made to the house the Parliament was dissolved, and consequently a stop put to all proceedings (1).

The

(1) The substance of the evidence offered to the committee to prove that Earl to have been murdered, with the reasons why the inquiry was not resumed in the next Parliament in 1690, is related by Laurence Braddon, in his Book against Burnet, p. 186, &c. where he says, "I believe, that no prosecution of any murder, in the British Annals recorded, ever met with such opposition, as the prosecution of this murder did. And, first, from all the Jacobite interest, as well Protestant as Papist. And how great that interest ever since the Revolution hath been, the many treasonable conspiracies and open rebellions have sufficiently proved. Secondly, King James II. being father to the late Queen Mary and Queen Anne, it is natural to suppose, that neither of those two Queens would have had their father stigmatized with that most infamous character of being a murderer, and in more instances than one. And whether King William, out of respect to his Queen, might any ways hinder the fixing such an infamy upon his Queen's father, I cannot tell. But this I sensibly felt to be true, viz. that Queen Anne upon her first coming to the crown, struck me out of the civil list, because, as her Majesty then said, I had thrown blood in her father's face. Thirdly, the Countess Dowager of Essex, by the influence of Bishop Burnet, did desire the Lords Committees in 1689, not to proceed any farther in that inquiry; for the Countess, by the Bishop, did then endeavour to persuade the Lords Committees, and several other Lords, that my Lord of Essex murdered himself. Fourthly, there was a certain great man charged, as ordering this murder, who had been the main instrument, in the hand of Providence, of bringing about the Revolution; and by this very Gentleman's counsels King William was, for some years, very much influenced. What interest therefore that great man had with King William, or with any other persons whatsoever, was applied to hinder the prosecution of this murder. And, lastly, the late Bishop Burnet himself was not only the principal cause of hindering the Countess from engaging in this prosecution; but that Prelate did otherwise endeavour to blast the credit of this inquiry, by sometimes representing me (as in his late History) as an Enthusiastical man, and therefore no regard was to be had to what I said or did in relation to that inquiry. At other times that

"Bishop did represent me as a man of a very strong imagination, (a soft character for a madman) from whence I was easily inclined to take up a belief of things upon such evidence, as was not sufficient to prove the things to be; but I was so possessed of imaginary beings, there was no convincing me by any arguments of their non-existence." The same Gentleman likewise relates the following remarkable story of what was supposed to be one of the principal occasions of hastening the poisoning of King Charles II. Some short time before the death of that King, there was a pamphlet written and printed in Holland, intitled, An inquiry into a detection of the barbarous murder of the late Earl of Essex; and many hundred of these were brought to England. In this pamphlet there were many arguments given to prove the murder; and the author humbly besought his Majesty, that he would be graciously pleased to give his royal assurance of a pardon to him, who should prove that murder; and that then the Duke of York should be proved to have been the principal author and rewarder thereof. Several hundred of those books were, one night, about twenty days before King Charles II.'s death, dispersed by some Gentlemen, and for the most part laid at the doors of Privy Counsellors and of other Noblemen, and Justices of the Peace. One of these books was conveyed to the King, who read the same, and then sent for the Lord Allington, then Constable of the Tower; and charged his Lordship to read and consider the same, and in a short time to return the book, and to give his Majesty his opinion of it; and also what his Lordship thought as to the manner of the Earl of Essex's death. Lord Allington lent this book to Sir Thomas Rowe, but charged him to return it the next day, because his Lordship intended then to restore it to his Majesty. Sir Thomas read and returned the book accordingly, and shortly after waited again upon Lord Allington, who then informed Sir Thomas, that he had been again with the King, and returned the book; and that his Majesty asked his Lordship, whether he had read and considered it; which his Lordship having assured his Majesty he had done, the King commanded him to give his judgment as to the Earl of Essex's death. But his Lordship desiring his Majesty to excuse him from giving any judgment in that point, the King said to him, I command you to deal very plainly and sincerely with me in relation thereto. Sir, replied Lord Allington, if your Majesty commands me to deal therein sincerely

Committee to inquire into the death of the Earl of Essex. Pr. H. L. 1. 35^a 1689. The Committee appointed in relation to the State prisoners having examined their cases, made a report of what they had discovered. After inspecting the accounts of Graham and Burton, (who had been the wicked solicitors of the illegal prosecutions, and had been confined some time before) it appeared, "that the said Graham and Burton, from the year 1679 to the year 1688, had received near forty eight thousand pounds out of the Exchequer, which they alleged to have paid to witnesses, jurors, solicitors, council, and themselves, and other persons concerned in their prosecutions of indictments, informations, and trials of persons in capital and other pretended criminal causes, and Quo Warranto's against corporations, and other proceedings in the name, and on behalf of the late King: That, for instance, in prosecuting for pretended constructive treasons, the Lord Russel, Algernon Sidney, Esq; Sir Thomas Armstrong, the Lords Brandon and Delamere, John Hamden, Esq; Alderman Cornish, and divers others; and in their presenting upon information, for supposed misdemeanors and crimes not capital, Sir Samuel Bornadylson, Sir Patience Ward, Sir Thomas Pilkington, Slingsby Bethel, Sir William Williams, Mr. Samuel Johnson, Oates, and many others, they charged their accounts with exorbitant expences. That there were several witnesses concurring with these accounts to make it manifest, that the said Graham and Burton were instrumental in most or all the illegal prosecutions for the taking away the lives and estates of those, that had suffered the loss of either, within eight years last past: And that they had, by their malicious indictments, informations, and prosecutions of Quo Warranto's openly endeavoured the subversion of the Protestant religion, and the government of the realm, and wasted many thousand pounds of the public revenue thereof in their undue prosecutions and solicitations."

Then they proceeded to the case of Sir Robert Wright, late Lord Chief Justice, and found him concerned in all the cruelties done in the West, after Monmouth's invasion; one of the ecclesiastical commissioners; guilty of great enormities in the affair of Magdalen College, and one of the Judges that gave judgment in the case of Hales, that the King might legally dispense with the statutes of the kingdom.

The case of the late Lord Jefferies was also reported, whose crimes were so well known to all the world, that there was no need of other evidence. He had been instrumental in all the arbitrary proceedings of the late reign, but escaped the punishment which he might have justly expected, by dying in the Tower on the 18th of April. He is said to hasten his death, by Drunk of spirited liquors. Whilst he continued in prison, he was visited by Dr. Sett, the celebrated author of the Christian Liberty, and being urged by him to improve his present situation by a serious review of his past life, he expressed great concern upon the occasion; but with regard to one part of his conduct, which had exposed him to most censure, his behaviour in the West after the defeat of the Duke of Monmouth, he declared, that how cruel soever his proceedings might be thought, they had by no means come up to the severity, which King James expected from him, his Majesty being extremely displeased with him on that account: (1.)

As the illegal proceedings of the late reign and their authors were inquired into, so the miscarriages of the present were also discussed. The Lords, after addressing the King to put the late Wright, Jeffery, Guernsey, Scilly, Dover-Castle, and other places into a posture of defence, and to disarm the Irish, empowered a committee to look into the miscarriages in Ireland, and to send for persons and papers for their information. The committee having acquainted the House, that they could not come to a full discovery of the miscarriages in Ireland, without a sight of the minute-book of the committee for Irish affairs, to the first of May last, the Lords ordered an address to the King, that the said minute-book might be communicated to the committee. The King's answer to this address was I will consider of it; which obstructed the proceedings of the committee near a whole month (2). But upon the Commons voting, "that those personally with your Majesty, I must then say, that I am of opinion, that unfortunate Lord had very foul play. "Then, if I live, said the King, I will make a very strict inquiry into that matter; and I command you to come to me to-morrow." As soon as Lord Alington withdrew, the Duke of York came in whilst the King had the book in his hand; and, as the King next day informed his Lordship, the Duke asked his Majesty, who had brought him that villainous lying pamphlet. But the King then said, that he did not believe it to be a lying pamphlet, and he was resolved to make strict inquiry into the Earl of Essex's death; and that his Higness should go abroad before that inquisition was made. The Duke replied, that he had already travelled too much.

"The substance of what is abovementioned, says Mr. Braddon, relating to what passed between King Charles II. and Lord Alington, I had from Sir Thomas Rowe, soon after the Revolution. And some few days after that discourse between the King and the Duke, the King and the Lord Alington were seized with such illness, as was generally thought to be the effects of poison; and the Lord Alington died about three days before the King, and his Majesty died the 6th day of February 1684-5. And so by that King's being forced to travel too soon into the other "world, King James delay'd his own travels in this, "until the just desertion of his own troops, forced him to become a fugitive and a pensioner to that great Monarch, whose arbitrary government he liked much better, than to be circumscribed by those good laws, which hindered him from ruining both "our Church and State." Braddon, p. 186, &c. Burnet says, this Braddon was an honest but enthusiastic man. He had, it seems, pickt up a great variety of circumstances, which he thought so convincing, that he believed himself bound to prosecute the matter; especially the evidence of a boy and girl, both at about ten or twelve years of age, who reported, the very day the deed was done, that they heard great crying in the Earl's lodgings, and saw a bloody razor hung out at the window, which was taken up by a woman that came out of the house where he was lodged. Braddon talked of these things so publicly, that he was tried for spreading false news to alienate people's hearts from the King, and was fined two thousand pounds. Burnet, l. 50.

(1) This account Sir Joseph Telvell, late Master of the Rolls, had from the mouth of Dr. Scott himself.

(2) This putting off the inspection of the minute-books, gave a handle to the enemies of the government, to insinuate that matters were not much mend-

1689. " sons, who had been the occasion of delaying
 " the sending relief to Ireland, and had advised
 " his Majesty to defer the giving leave for some " members of the House of Peers to inspect the " minute-book of the committee for Irish af" fairs, were enemies to the King and king" dom," he acquainted the Lords and Com" mons, that he gave leave, that a committee of " the Upper-house might inspect the book, ac" cording to their desire. However, this book
 " not being sufficient to discover the miscarriages
 " in Ireland, the Lords addressed the King, " that " he would please to direct, that the witnesses
 " in relation to Ireland, since his taking the ad" ministration of the government upon him,
 " to the time when the council-books began,
 " might be communicated to the committee of " their House. To this the King answered, " That there were no minutes of the Irish affairs in
 " the time mentioned by their Lordships.

Aug. 3. After this the Commons, in a committee of the whole House, having considered the state of the nation, came at last to this resolution, that an address be presented to his Majesty upon these heads: First, That there had been delays in the succour of Ireland. Secondly, That there were not sufficient preparations to transport the forces to Ireland. And, thirdly, That several ships had been taken for want of guards and convoys to preserve them. As the delays of sending relief to Ireland were imputed to the Marquis of Hallifax, the question was put at the same time, whether it should be represented to his Majesty, that it was inconvenient to his affairs, that the Marquis of Halifax was in his Majesty's council? Which however was carried in the negative, seventy-six for an address, and ninety against it.

Motion for an address against Carmarthen and Halifax. A few weeks before Mr. John Howe, Vice-Chamberlain to the Queen, moved for an address to the King, to remove from his presence and councils such as had been impeached by Parliament, and had betrayed the liberties of the nation. Though nobody was named, yet it was easy to perceive, that the persons, against whom this address was to be levelled, were the Marquises of Carmarthen and Halifax, the first of which had been formerly impeached of high-treason, and to the other was chiefly imputed the present ill-conduct of affairs. The matter was debated with great warmth; and because the contrary party were not prepared to oppose this unexpected motion, it would certainly have been carried in the affirmative, if those, who were zealous for it at first, had not cooled on the sudden. Monsieur Dyckvelt discoursing with Mr.
Howe about this motion, the latter justified himself by alledging, that " he did not think it to " be of any ill consequence to his Majesty: and
 " besides, that a place at court should never fi-
 " lence him, when the good of his country required him to speak." And the next day he renewed the motion, and was strongly supported in it; but the opposite side requiring the persons to be named, and nobody offering to do it, the motion came to nothing. Mr. Howe, it seems, had missed of some advantages that he had proposed to himself, upon which he went into the highest opposition that was made in the Parliament to the Court all this reign, not without indecent reflections on the King, and a most virulent attacking of all his Ministers. He was a man of some wit but of little judgment, and no great share of religion. He was member for Gloucester (1).

About this time certain treasonable papers and letters from King James, some of them written from King James intercepted. Pr. H. C. 333.
 with his own hand, and directed to divers persons in London and in the country, having been intercepted at Liverpool in Lancashire, and sent to court, his Majesty communicated them to the Parliament. And because, among other enigmatical expressions, mention was made in them of contraband goods ready to be shipped off in order to be run into such places, where they might not be seized by Custom-house Officers, which sufficiently discovered the design of an invasion; Mr.
Hampden the father, who at that time happened to be chairman of the committee of the whole house, represented the imminent danger that threatened the Kingdom, and what difficulties his Majesty lay under to prevent it for want of money, and therefore moved for a farther supply. This motion, from a Privy Counsellor, and at a time, when the House was going to adjourn, was thought very impolitic, and was so far from being backed by any Member, not even by his own son, that it rather occasioned some sharp reflections (2). Mr. Garraway, though one of the well-affected, said, " That they had " given money enough for that year: That if " they had thought there had been occasion for " more, they would have prevented the King's " demands: That it was not the want of mo" ney; but the ill conduct of those, that had " the management of affairs, that caused the " difficulties, which the government lay under:
 " That the miscarriages in assisting the Protec-
 " tants of Ireland had been of so ill consequence,
 " that if they were not speedily remedied, the " House would be obliged to take notice of " them." Mr. Howe stood up next, and said,
 " Their present dangers proceeded from their not ad" dressing the King for removing his evil counsellors,
 " as he himself had moved not long before. How" ever, the House having taken the intercepted letters into consideration, resolved to address the King to desire him to secure all Papists of note, and to disarm and take away their horses from the rest; and as a consequence of this affair, a bill was brought in for attainting several persons in rebellion

ed by the revolution, and that the present courtiers were no better friends to the nation, than others had been. This was, it seems, the first answer of King William that was not agreeable to both Houses.

(1) There was a report then current concerning Mr. Howe, that a certain builder applied to him for his interest to obtain a grant of the waste ground, on which now stands the street called the seven Dials. Another had before applied to the Lord Portland for the same grant, who finding it to be worth about ten thousand pounds, fairly told the King the value of it.

N. 7. Vol. III.

Mr. Howe coming soon after with his solicitation, the King asked, What it might be worth? He replied, about one thousand pounds. The King said, Is that all? You shall have a thousand pound without so much trouble.

(2) Mr. Hampden, among the dangers to which the nation was exposed, having named that of falling into the hands of the French and Irish, Mr. S— moved to add the Dutch. And this shows how early the Dutch fell under the displeasure of those who were no well-wishers to the Revolution. Oldmixon.

1689. " with a bill, appointing certain duties of excise
" and customs, for the raising six hundred thou" sand pounds, which they desire may be ap" plied by your Majesty, for the satisfaction " of the charges which have been expended by
" the States in this expedition.

" It is little more than an age since the il" lustrious Prince of Orange, your Majesty's " great grand-father, whose name will ever be " famous for his love to his country, did, by
" the assistance of the English, redeem those " Provinces from the like oppressions; which " shews how inseparable the interest of these " two nations are. And since it was the po" licy of those that laboured our destruction to " divide us, it ought to be the endeavour of " all true lovers of their Country, to keep us
" firmly united in order to our preservation.

" The Commons have likewise considered of " the great arrears, that were left due by King
" Charles the second to his servants, and have " therefore made a provision of sixty thousand " pounds for them, which they humbly desire
" your Majesty would please to distribute among " them, in such proportions as your Majesty in " your princely wisdom shall think most fit.

" And having proceeded thus far in the " weighty affairs depending before them, they
" now become humble suitors to your Majesty
" for a recess, that thereby they may have the " opportunity of repairing into their several " counties, and promoting your Majesty's ser" vice; and what remains at present for want of " time to dispatch, they doubt not but that they " shall be able to perfect it at their next meet" ing, and, as they hope, to the entire satis" faction of your Majesty, and your whole " kingdom."

Remark on this speech. That part of the speech which mentions the assistance given by the English to the United Provinces when under oppression, highly pleased those, who in their hearts were no friends to the Dutch; and it is said by several historians, to be a very artful reminding them of their former obligations to the English. The disaffected had already infused into weak minds a notion of the Dutch, being our enemies in point of commerce, and that we ought to be as jealous of them as of the French; a maxim that has all along been espoused and propagated by the enemies to the Revolution.

The Parliament adjourned. After passing these and some other bills (1), the two Houses adjourned to the 20th of September, and afterwards to the 19th of October. 1689.

The affairs of Ireland had been a continual subject of complaint all this session; the dangerous condition of the Protestants in that Kingdom, and the necessity of a speedy relief, had been constantly represented by the King in his speeches, and urged by the Commons in their addresses. But whatever might be the cause, though King James had been six months in Ireland, though the distresses of the Protestants were so well known, and the whole nation impatient for their relief, yet no army had yet been sent thither. Commissions indeed had been issued for raising eighteen regiments of foot, and five of dragoons, for the reduction of Ireland; and the levies had gone on so successfully, that the regiments were complete in less than two months. But the like dispatch was not used in providing transports, a train of artillery and provisions. These things were managed with great slowness and neglect, and especially the provisions, which were not only long in getting ready, but very bad when they were got. Mr. Harbord, Pay-master of the forces intended for Ireland, was also Purveyor; so the fault both as to the expedition and the stores, were charged on him.

Duke Schomberg, to whom the King had given the command of the army, was very uneasy at the dilatory proceedings of the managers of both transports and provisions; and to prevent further inconveniences, laboured with Mr. Harbord to quit one of his employments, who, though unwillingly, was at last prevailed with to resign the Purveyorship, which was given to Mr. Shales. The Duke had proposed not to stay for the transports, but to march the forces directly to Port-Patrick in Scotland, from whence it was but a few hours passage into Ireland. Had this been done, it would have saved two or three months, and by that means prevented the rebellion of Dundee, relieved Londonderry, and hindered King James from forming so strong an army, and the French from landing in Ireland. But this design was opposed like the rest of the measures for hastening the relief of that kingdom. At length, upon the news of the raising of the siege of Londonderry, the new levies began to embark at Chester and Liverpool; and General Schomberg, having taken his leave of the Commons, thanked them for the present they had made him, and received assurances of their particular regard of himself and army, set out for Chester (2).

On

- (1) Some other acts passed this session were,
1. For the better preventing the exportation of wool, &c.
2. An act concerning tanned leather.
3. Naturalization-acts for Prince George of Denmark, Frederick Count Schomberg, Henry de Nassau, Anne Aspley, and others.
4. For regulating the salt works at Droitwich and other private acts.

(2) The Commons had given him one hundred thousand pounds, to be paid out of the civil list, which however the King never paid; but in lieu of it, five thousand a year, was settled upon him and his heirs as a reward for his services, and to make him amends for the like revenues he had lost in France and Germany. Two Peers and two Commoners were named trustees, for the making purchases in order thereto. But it was afterwards paid out of the Post-office. When he was introduced into the house, he sat down covered in a chair, and after a short space he rose up, and, uncovered, told them " he had desired that honour, to make his just acknowledgments for their great favours, and to take his leave of them, being now going to Ireland, where he should freely expose his life in the King's service and theirs." The Speaker replied: " The services done by his Grace to the King and Kingdom were so great, that they could never be forgotten: That the Commons were extremely satisfied that the army was committed to his conduct, and that, at whatever distance he should be, they would have a particular regard of himself, and the army under his command." Pr. of H. C. II. 344.

How this promise was fulfilled will quickly appear.

On the 12th of August he sailed with about ninety vessels of all sorts, and near ten thousand men, horse and foot, and arrived the next day at Carrickfergus, where the army presently landed on Bangor side without opposition. The first thing he did was to send out parties to scour the adjacent country, and get intelligence of the enemy. This done, he marched his forces to Belfast, which the enemy had abandoned, retiring to Carrickfergus; and where several persons joined him, who durst not declare before. The army being sufficiently refreshed, several regiments were detached towards Carrickfergus with some cannon and mortars; upon whose approach the enemy beat a parley; but the General not allowing their demands, the town was ordered to be attacked. On the 22d the trenches were opened, some batteries raised, and the siege carried on in form. This made the besieged more eager to capitulate; but Duke Schomberg refusing to let them march out with the usual signs of honour, and they insisting upon it, the attacks were pursued with great vigour till the 26th of August, when considerable breaches being made, and all things ready for a general assault, the garrison was contented to accept what conditions the besiegers were pleased to grant; which were to be conducted with their arms, and as much baggage as they could carry on their backs, to the next Irish garrison, which was Newry.

Whilst the siege of Carrickfergus was carried on, the rest of the horse, foot, and dragoons, which for want of transports had staid behind, were embarked at Higblake, and safely landed in Ireland. On the 28th of August the General returned to Belfast, and two days after his own French regiment of horse joined the army; which being mustered on the last day of that month, was found to consist of four regiments of horse, one of dragoons, and eighteen of foot (1). The artillery horses being most of them yet at Chester, Duke Schomberg ordered the greatest part of the train to be shipped, and the fleet to sail with them and all other necessaries to Carlingford; while in the mean time he marched the army beyond Lisburne, and so through Hillborough, and pitched his camp at Drummore, the place where the Northern Protestants of Ireland were not long before routed by Hamilton. The day following he continued his march to Loughbrilane, where the Irish horse and dragoons joined him, and cheerfully offered themselves to be an advance-guard to the army. Upon their approach the Irish abandoned Newry, a very strong pass, having first set fire to the town; which news being brought to the General, he dispatched a trumpet to the Duke of Berwick, who commanded there, to acquaint him, "that if they went on to burn in this barbarous manner, he would not give any quarter." This message had so good an effect, that the Irish abandoned Dundalk without doing any harm to the town, where Duke Schom- berg marched with his army, and encamped about a mile North of it in a low moist ground, having the town and the river towards the South, the Newry mountains to the East, and to the North, hills and bogs intermixed. The bad weather, long and constant marches, and scarcity of provisions, made his raw men already begin to faint; but here they met with some reinforcements, and on the 8th of September were reinforced by Major General Kirke's, Sir John Hammer's, and Brigadier Stuart's regiments. The Duke at first designed to have continued his progress; but the ships with the train of artillery, not being come up in time to Carlingford, according to his directions, was a great disappointment to him; and so much the more as he had intelligence by an engineer, who deserted the enemy, that General Rosen was then at Drogheda with about twenty thousand men. Rosen hearing that the English halted at Dundalk, said, he was sure Schomberg wanted joining; and therefore sent part of his forces to seize on Ardee, a small town between Drogheda and Dundalk.

Duke Schomberg continued in an uncertain posture till the 20th of September, when in the morning he had an account, that King James having assembled all his forces near Drogheda, advanced towards him; and that a party of two thousand foot, and fifteen hundred horse were gone beyond the mountains to attack the pass at Newry, and fall into his rear. Upon this he detached a party of horse against them, at the sight of whom they retreated towards Sligo. However the day following the enemy appeared in order of battle, and a great party of their horse advanced towards the intrenchments of the Duke's army. Several of the English officers were for engaging the enemy, but the Duke told them, Let them alone; we will see what they will do; and though he saw them coming within cannon shot of his camp, yet he said still, that he did not think they designed to fight. However, one day seeing them draw their army into two lines, he sent Lieutenant General Douglass to the camp, to order all the foot to stand to their arms, and the horse to return to the camp upon a certain signal, but till then to go on with their foraging. The soldiers, who were struggling with diseases and want in their tents, received these orders notwithstanding with the utmost cheerfulness; but in some time the Irish drew off, and so the affair ended to the great disappointment of the army, who hoped no less than to defeat the enemy, and by a victory to put an end to their miseries. But Duke Schomberg justly considered, that the enemy was much superior in horse; that his own men were undisciplined, and withal weakened by hunger and sickness, while the other army enjoyed health and plenty; and that the loss of a battle might be attended with the loss of Ireland.

In a day or two after the Irish marched away, there was a dangerous conspiracy discovered in the army, discovered by Boyer.

1689. the English camp, which was carried on by some French Papists, who had inlisted themselves in the Protestant regiments of that nation, the officers having been obliged to raise their companies in so much haste, that they had no time to examine them very strictly. A Captain of one of these regiments being informed, that four of his soldiers and a drummer, who were Roman Catholics, designed to go over to the enemy, he caused them to be secured, and found letters about one of them to Monsieur d'Avaux, the French Ambassador. Upon stricter examination the fellow declared, he had letters from one du Pleffis, who was likewise a Papist, but now served as a private soldier in one of the French regiments, though he had formerly been a Captain of horse in France, whence he had been obliged to fly for murder. Du Pleffis being seized, freely confessed, that he had written to King James, and to the French Ambassador, and acquainted them, that there were divers Papists in the three French regiments, whom he promised to bring over to the Irish camp, upon condition he might have the command of them, and his pardon in France. He and his five accomplices were therefore brought to their trial, sentenced to death by a council of war, and accordingly executed; after which the French Colonels made strict inquiry what Papists there were in their regiments, and found about two hundred and fifty, who by order of the General were secured, disarmed, and sent over prisoners into England, and from thence to Holland, where they were set at liberty.

Though Duke Schomberg remained in his camp with the grofs of his army, he did not restrain the Inniskilliners from making excursions. Nor had he reason to repent this liberty, which he allowed them; for on the 27th of September he received an account, that about a thousand of them, headed by Colonel Lloyd, had routed a body of five thousand Irish, that were marching towards Sligo, of whom they killed seven hundred, took O Kelly their commander, and forty other officers prisoners, besides a great booty of cattle, with the loss of very few of their men. The Duke was so pleased with the news, that having ordered all the Inniskillin horse and foot in his camp to draw out, he rode all along their line with his hat off, and caused the Dutch guards, and the Inniskillin foot to make three running fires, which were answered by the Inniskillin horse, and by the cannon upon the works; as also from the ships, that lay at the mouth of the river.

The joy of this success was sometime after much abated by the loss of Sligo and James-Town. The Irish marching that way in a considerable body, commanded by Sarsfield, those of James-Town not thinking it tenable, abandoned it, and marched to Sligo, losing some of their men, and killing some of the Irish in their hasty retreat. Next day Sarsfield, with his detachment, advanced before Sligo; whereupon Colonel Ruessel retired to Ballyshannon, and advised the foot also to quit the place. But notwithstanding this, St. Sauveur, a resolute French Captain in Melloniere's regiment, with his own company of French grenadiers, and Colonel Lloyd with his bold Inniskilliners staid in the town, and upon the approach of Sarsfield retreated to the two forts, Lloyd into one, and St. Sauveur into the other. how to subsist his men, retired that night with some loss; but the French Captain having carried in some provisions, and finding some ammunition in the fort, resolved stoutly to maintain his post. The nights were then dark; and he fearing lest the enemy might make their approaches to the fort undiscovered, got a great many fir-deals, and dipping the end of them in tar, they gave such a light when set on fire, and hung over the walls, that he discovered the enemy advancing towards them with an engine called a Sow; but having killed the engineer, and two or three more, the rest retreated, and he burnt the engine. Day no sooner appeared, than the Irish were forced to quit a small field-piece, which they had planted in the street, being galled with shot from the fort, by St. Sauveur's men, who presently after sallied out, and killed many of the enemy.

1689. A brave action by a French Captain.

But at last their provision being spent, and there being little or no water in the fort, they surrendered it upon honourable terms; and at their marching over the bridge, Colonel Sarsfield, who would have purchased these brave soldiers at any rate, stood with a purse of gold, and offered every man, who would serve King James, horse and arms, with five guineas advance; yet they all made answer, They would never fight for Papists, except one, who the very next day after he had got horse, arms, and the gold, brought all off with him to Dundalk.

Though Duke Schomberg had prudently declined fighting with the Irish upon unequal terms; a raging sickness, occasioned by the unwholesomeness of the place, wet weather, and ill food, daily swept away, or at least disabled a great number of officers and soldiers. Among the rest died Sir Edward Deering, a gallant Gentleman, who had contributed more than any man in the county of Kent, towards bringing about the Revolution; Colonel Henry Wharton, a bold and active man, son to Philip Lord Wharton; Sir Thomas Gower, and Colonel Hungerford, two young Gentlemen of distinguished merit. As for the common soldiers, there perished at Dundalk about two thousand; and as many sick were shipped off to be transported to Belfast, but of them not above eleven hundred came ashore, the rest dying at sea. In short, so great was the mortality, that by the next spring above one half of the army, that was transported over, was lost. Winter approaching, both armies went into quarters, and Duke Schomberg renewed his instances for the coming over of the seven thousand auxilliary Danes, who about this time arrived in England and Scotland, pursuant to the treaty concluded with the King of Denmark on the 15th of August.

The General was censured by some persons for not putting things more to hazard. It was said, that he measured the Irish by their numbers, and not by their want of sense or courage; and such complaints were sent of this to the King, that he wrote twice to him, pressing him to put somewhat to the venture. But Duke Schomberg saw the enemy was well posted; well provided, and above thrice his number, and that they had several good officers among them. If he had pushed matters, and had met with a misfortune, his whole army, and consequently all Ireland, would have been lost; for he could not have made a regular retreat. The sure way was to preserve his army, and that would save Ul-

And therefore though this conduct of his was blamed by some, yet better judges thought, that the managing of this campaign, as he did, was one of the greatest parts of his life.

Affairs at sea not successful.
Boyer.
Burnet.
 King William's arms were not more successful at sea; for Admiral Torrington, with the Confederate English and Dutch fleet under his command, having made a shew of landing his men to surprize Cork, thought fit to abandon that enterprize upon a false intelligence, that the French were advancing towards him; and he was soon after obliged to put into Torbay, most of the English seamen being disabled by sickness. This misfortune was justly charged on those, who had victualled the fleet, for it was observable, that all this while the Dutch continued healthy. Admiral Torrington having taken in found provisions and refreshed his men, put to sea again; but not having an opportunity of engaging the enemy, the summer passed without any considerable action in the Channel; only the English had the misfortune to lose the Dartmouth, a man of war of forty guns, which, after a stout resistance, was taken by the French. Our trade likewise suffered considerably; for the French not setting out a fleet any more, sent out many cruizers and privateers into our seas, that England sustained great losses by them, there not being at that time a sufficient number of frigates to convoy and secure the merchantmen; so that though we seemed masters of the sea, we were great losers there.

The affairs abroad this summer, were a little more prosperous. Not only war was proclaimed against France by the Empire, Brandenburg, the States General, and Spain; but moreover an offensive and defensive alliance, between the Emperor and the States General, was concluded the 12th of May at Vienna. As this was the beginning of the grand alliance, it will be necessary to insert the substance of the principal articles:

I. and II. Perpetual friendship, and an alliance offensive and defensive against France.

III. and V. Neither party to make peace or truce, without consent of the other; and if any treaty be entered into by common consent, all particulars shall be communicated on both sides, and nothing concluded by one, without the consent of the other.

IV. No peace to be made till the treaties of Westphalia, Osnaberg, Munster and the Pyrenean shall be fully vindicated and restored.

VI. and VII. After the present war shall be ended, there shall remain a perpetual defensive alliance, between the Emperor and the States, against France; and if France should attack either, the other to assist with all his forces.

X. To this treaty shall be invited Spain by the Emperor, and England by the States, and all the Allies of either party shall also be admitted, if they shall think fit to accede.

The separate articles are:

"In case the King of Spain should die without issue, the States General shall assist the Emperor with all their forces, to take possession of the Spanish monarchy, with all its dominions and rights, and to use their friendly endeavours with the Electors their Allies, that the Emperor's eldest son Joseph, King of Hungary, may be speedily chosen King of the Romans: And if France should by threats or arms oppose it, they will assist his Imperial Majesty with their utmost force. The Crown of England shall be likewise invited, to enter into these articles."

These articles were added, because France, notwithstanding the most solemn renunciation, was openly endeavouring to procure the succession of the Spanish monarchy, for his son the Dauphin, and also to make him King of the Romans, which would have been fatal not only to Holland, but to all Europe.

To this alliance and the separate articles, King William acceded the 9th of December this year.

The King also made a treaty with the States General in August, by which are confirmed former treaties of peace and commerce (1); particularly the defensive league, concluded at London, March 3, 1678; of which the chief articles are: "In case either party is attacked", &c.

"the other upon notice and demand, shall endeavour to cause hostilities to cease, and reparation to be made for any injuries received: And in case a war shall ensue, the Ally not attacked, shall be obliged to declare war two months after the notice and demand, and during the two months shall endeavour to mediate an accommodation. If the King of Great-Britain is attacked, the States shall assist him with six thousand foot and twenty men of war; if the States are attacked, the King shall assist them with ten thousand foot, and the same number of ships of war: These succours shall be supplied and maintained, by the party that sends them. It is left to the choice of the Ally in war, whether the other shall continue the succours, without declaring war also."

About the same time the King entered into a treaty with Christian V. King of Denmark; with Denmark, by virtue of which, the English army in Ireland was suddenly reinforced by seven thousand Danes, six thousand foot and one thousand horse.

Notwithstanding these confederacies against him, the King of France was not discouraged from pursuing his ambitious designs. However, the campaign in Flanders did not favour him this year. It was opened with Liege departing from the neutrality they had accepted, and declaring against France, which was done by delivering to the Dutch a great convoy of powder, bombs, and money designed for Bonne, and brought to Liege by a French officer. But this was followed by nothing considerable. The French had in Flanders an army of about eighty thousand men, commanded by Marshal d'Anumieres, whilst that of the Allies, under the Prince of Waldeck, was not above sixty thousand. The Prince of Waldeck was a man of great compass and true judgment;

1689. ment; equally able in the cabinet and in the camp. But he was generally unsuccessful, because he was never furnished in proportion to his schemes. The opinion the armies had of him as an unfortunate General, made him really so; for soldiers cannot have much heart, when they have no confidence in their leader. In the Prince of Waldeck's army were a body of troops, consisting of Dutch and English, sent over by King William to the assistance of the States. The English were commanded by the Earl of Marlborough. The two armies passed the summer without any remarkable action, except the battle of Walcourt, which was reckoned a rash undertaking in d'Humieres. This action happened about the middle of August, in the following manner. The Marshal d'Humieres hearing that a great number of Dutch horse were gone out to forage, made a motion with his whole army in order to surprize them. The Prince of Waldeck had no sooner notice of it, but he gave the foragers a signal to return to the camp; but that did not prevent their being vigorously charged by the French, who killed some of them. Their vanguard advancing attacked the village of Forge, where eight hundred foot were posted to countenance the foragers, being commanded by the English Colonel Lodges, Lieutenant Colonel Goer, and the Major of a regiment of horse, who for above two hours maintained their ground with extraordinary resolution, but had been overpowered by numbers, had not Roe, Major-General of the cavalry, (who was sent to bring back the Lieutenant-Generals Webbenum, Marlborough, and d'Hubi) come in with their horse timely to their relief. With that reinforcement they made a retreating fight against the main force of the enemy, till they came to a rising ground near Walcourt, where they joined a battalion of Lunenburghers, which had been reinforced by another of Colonel Hales. The French attacked the town with their usual vigour upon a first onset, which lasted near an hour and half; during which time Prince Waldeck ordered Lieutenant-General Alva to march with three regiments to their relief, which were supported by the guards, and two English regiments headed by the Earl of Marlborough, while Major-General Staugeburg advanced almost at the same time with some other battalions of foot, to the other side of the town. By all these motions, and the stout resistance of those in the town, the French perceived they had engaged themselves too far, and began to think of a retreat; which they performed in great haste and disorder, and consequently with considerable loss, leaving behind them some cannon and ammunition, and near two thousand officers and soldiers killed and wounded. This was the allies computation, who on their side owned the loss of above three hundred men, amongst whom were Lieutenant-Colonel Grimes of the English, the Major of the dragoons of Zell, and some inferior officers. And thus ended the campaign in Flanders, without any other memorable action, except that of the Spaniards, who acted in a separate body towards Courtray, levelled a great part of the French lines, and raised considerable contributions on the enemies territories.

Campaign
in Germany.

The success of the allies in Germany, was much greater. The French by their sudden invasion of Germany, were masters of almost all the three ecclesiastical Electorates. In Treves, Mont Royal (where Montal commanded) on one side, and Bonne, in Cologne on the other, left a large space at their discretion, and they only wanted Coblentz. They had also Keiserwert in Cologne, where Cardinal Furstemberg had placed a German garrison under Marcogney. Mentz was likewise in their possession, where the Marquis d'Uxelles commanded with twelve battalions of the best troops of France, the regiment of bombardiers the company of miners, a regiment of horse and another of dragoons. He had under him Chobisy, an able engineer who had defended Mastricht, and fortified the town. The same care was taken of Philipsburg and Landau.

As to the Palatinate, nothing was to be seen there, but the lamentable remains of the avarice and fury or fears of the French. In Heidelberg, the capital, the castle was blown up, and half the city burnt. They had destroyed Manheim, and thrown even the ruins into the Rhine and the Nekker. Worms and Spires as bordering too near upon Alsatia, were reduced to ashes, and Frankendahl and several castles were demolished.

All these conquests as well as the frontiers of France, were covered with a numerous army, under Marshal de Duras. He had for Lieutenant Generals the Counts of Choiseul and d'Auvergne, the Duke of Villeroy, Baron de Monclaire, Marquis de Boufflers, Duke of Vendome, Marquis de Genlis, and Count de la Feuillie. His Marshals de Camp were the Counts of Teffé and de Tallard, and the Marquises d'Harcourt, de Vivans, and de Neubelle. Besides these, the Marquises de Bissy commanded in Lorraine, de Sourdis in Cologne, de Chamilly at Straßbourg, and Monsieur Catinat, afterwards Marshal of France, in Luxemburg. These Generals were all good officers. But with all this, the arms of France did not prevail this summer. Three considerable armies rose up against her at once. One of fifty thousand men, under the Duke of Bavaria; one of forty-seven thousand, under the Elector of Saxony; and the third of fifty-one thousand, commanded by the Elector of Brandenburg. The Duke of Lorraine was at the head of the Imperial troops, who after a siege of about two months, took Mentz by capitulation. The French, by their own confession, had above nine hundred men slain, and fourteen hundred wounded. The Duke sensible of the merit and bravery of the Marquis d'Uxelles, left him master of the articles of capitulation. By the taking of Mentz, Franconia, which before lay exposed, was now covered. The Elector of June, Brandenburg laid siege to Keiserwert, and was pursuing the attacks with vigour, when the garrison, partly French and partly Germans, dividing themselves, demanded to capitulate, and surrendered upon articles. Flushed with this success, the Elector besieged Bonne, where Baron d'Asfeld commanded with very good officers under him. He had eight battalions of foot, a regiment of horse, and another of dragoons. The siege, by reason of several interruptions, proved very tedious; but at last the counter-scarp, and some outworks being taken by storm, the garrison surrendered after fifty-five days blockade, and twenty-six days close siege. The taking of Bonne, which laid the Rhine open as far as to Mentz, was partly owing to the Duke of Lorraine, who after the surrender of Mentz, led part of his army to the assistance of the Elector of Brandenburg. The Duke showed a

nia.

France seemed to have a fair opportunity of repairing these losses in Catalonia, the Spaniards having no army there, nor able to send one. But Lewis only ordering the Duke de Noailles to advance with nine battalions, three regiments of horse, twelve pieces of cannon, and two mortars; all that Noailles could do was to besiege Campredon, which he took in five days. He afterwards held out a siege against the Spaniards and forced them to retire. The campaign ended with the demolition of that town and citadel.

Pope Innocent
XI dies.
Fr. Cont.
Barnet.
The battles.

The only event that France could consider this year as an advantage, was the death of Pope Innocent XI. His family name was Odescalchi. He was born at Como, in Milan; of a family that was become rich, by dealing in Banks. He bore arms when young in Flanders, in the service of Spain; and tis said, that an affront put upon him by a Frenchman in the war, was the cause of his hatred to France. He afterwards became first Secretary to the Apostolical chamber, Bishop of Navarra, Legate of Bologna and Cardinal. It is affirmed, he arrived at these honours by losing on purpose, large sums of money at gaming with Donna Olympia niece of Innocent X. and making her magnificent presents. It was known, that he did not so much as understand Latin, and had a master when he was made Cardinal to teach him to pronounce that little he had occasion for at high masses. Of divinity he understood nothing. However this be, his advancement to the Papal chair was applauded at Rome, as every one expected to live easy and happy under his government. As he was very knowing in money matters, the vast debts the papacy was involved in by his wasteful predecessors, were by his frugal management discharged. To these talents he joined an exemplary piety, a constant opposition to whatever favoured of superstition, an ardent zeal for reformation of manners, a disinterestedness uncommon, and perhaps too great with regard to his relations, who got nothing by his pontificate, but the bare honour of having a Pope in their family. His opposition to, and sufferings from France, (which have been mentioned) are reckoned by her enemies, as so many virtues, and even the Protestants themselves are full of his praises. It is certain, they were greatly indebted to him: For, had he but favoured the postulation of Cardinal Fursberg, the King of France, with an Elector of Cologne at his devotion, would have forced Germany to hide her resentments, and by that means have been able to sustain King James on the Throne, and more than ever weakened the protestant interest. The Pope did the contrary, and gave occasion to the saying, that it were to be wished for the Church of Rome, that the Pope had turned Catholic and King James become Huguenot. He died the 2d of August after a Pontificate of about thirteen years, and was succeeded by Cardinal Ottoboni a Venetian, who sat in the papal chair but a year and half. The King of France renounced his pretension to the Franchises, but had no other return for it, than the promotion of Fourbin and some others, he recommended to be Cardinals. For the new Pope, who took the name of Alexander VIII. would not yield the Point of the Regale, nor would he grant the Bulls, for those who were named by the King of France to the vacant Bishopricks, and had signed the Formulary of 1682, declaring the Pope fallible and subject to a general council. And when Alexander felt himself near death, he passed a Bull in form, which confirmed all Innocent's Bulls, and by this put a new stop to a reconciliation with the Court of France.

But to return to the affairs of England, during the recess. The King went this year to the races at New-market. The concourse of people there upon this occasion was extraordinary great; nor did the University of Cambridge omit this opportunity of waiting upon the King, being introduced by the Duke of Somerset, their Chancellor. Dr. Covel the Vice-Chancellor, who had been Chaplain to the Queen in Holland, addressed himself to the King in an eloquent speech, congratulating him upon the glorious successes, with which he had been blessed in his endeavours to rescue the Church and Nation from the imminent dangers, that threatened both, and which were more particularly pointed against the Universities; and concluded with an humble recommendation of themselves to his Majesty's protection. To this the King answered, "That as God had blessed him in this undertaking, so he would faithfully discharge his trust in preserving the Church of England, and giving all protection and favour to the Universities." The day following, the King made a visit to the University of Cambridge, where he was received and entertained with demonstrations of joy, duty, and loyalty. Three days after that, he returned to Hampton-Court from New-Market.

This was not the only time the King appeared in publick this season. The Lord Mayor's day being at hand, Sir Thomas Pilkington, who was continued for the year 1690, invited to dinner the King and Queen, the Prince and Princess of Denmark, and both Houses of Parliament. The King accepting the invitation, their Majesties, attended by their Royal Highnesses, and a numerous train of the Nobility and Gentry, went first to a balcony prepared for them in Cheapside to see the procession; which for the great numbers of the citizens of the several Guilds, the full appearance of the artillery, the richness of the pageants, and the splendor and good order of the whole, proceeding, surpassed all that had been seen before on the like occasion. But that, which deserves to be particularly mentioned, was the royal city regiment of volunteer horse, which being richly accoutred, and led by the Earl of Monmouth, attended their Majesties from Whitehall into the city. The cavalcade being passed by, the King and Queen were conducted by the two Sheriffs to Guildhall, where they and their retinue were entertained with a magnificent feast. His Majesty, to express his satisfaction, conferred the honour of Knighthood on Christopher Leibulter, and John Houlton, the two Sheriffs, and on Edward Clarke and Francis Child, two of the Aldermen. Five days before, the King having been pleased to permit the Grocers of London to chuse him Sovereign Master of that company, the Wardens, with some of the principal members, presented to him a copy of their election, and instrument of his freedom of the said company, in a golden

Not many days after, an indignity was offered to the King's picture in the Guild-hall of London, by cutting away the scepter and crown thereof; which occasioned the Lord-Mayor and Court of Aldermen to promise a reward of five hundred pounds to any person, who should discover the author of that infolence.

Vacant fees filled. The day appointed for the Parliament to meet drawing near, at which time the King designed likewise to summon a Convocation, he thought fit to fill up the vacant fees of Worcester, Chichester, (1) and Bristol, which were bestowed, the first on Dr. Edward Stillingfleet, Dean of St. Paul's; the second on Dr. Simon Patrick, Dean of Peterborough; and the third on Dr. Gilbert Ironside, Warden of Wadham College in Oxford, who were consecrated on the 13th of October at Fulham by the Bishops of London, St. Asaph, and Rocheſter, commissioned for that purpose.

The oaths refused by some of the Clergy, but generally taken, tho' with reservations. Now the time allowed by act of Parliament for the Clergy to take the oaths being expired, several of them refused to qualify themselves, some of whom were suspended ab officio, particularly the Archbishop of Canterbury, and the Bishops of Gloceſter, Ely, Norwich, Bath and Wells, and Peterborough; and tho' the generality of the Clergy took the oaths, it was (as has been observed) by the help of reservations and distinctions, and not out of a persuasion that their allegiance was due to the King. Besides he was suspected by them, on account of the favour shewn to Dissenters, but chiefly for his abolishing episcopacy in Scotland, and his consenting to the setting up Presbytery there. This gave some credit to the reports, that were with great industry infused into many of them, of the King's coldness at best, if not his aversion, to the Church of England. The leading men in both Universities, especially Oxford, were possessed with this; and it began to have very ill effects over all England. Those, who did not carry this so far as to think, as some said they did, that the Church was to be demolished; yet said, that a latitudinarian party was like to prevail, and to engross all preferments. These were thought less bigotted to outward ceremonies; for which reason it was generally spread about, that men zealous for the Church would be neglected, and those, who were more indifferent in such matters, would be preferred. Many of the latter had managed the controversies with the Church of Rome with so much clearness, and with that success, that the Papists, to revenge themselves, and to blast those, whom they considered as their most formidable enemies, had cast aspersions on them as Socinians, and as men, who denied all mysteries. And now some angry men at Oxford, who apprehended, that those Divines were likely to be most considered in this reign, took up the same method of calumny, and began to treat them as Socinians. The Earl of Clarendon, and some of the Bishops, who had incurred the suspension for not taking the oaths to the government, took much pains to spread these slanders. Besides this, the proceedings in Scotland cast a great load on the King, though it was certain he could not hinder the change of the government of that Church, without putting all his affairs into great disorder. For the episcopal party had gone almost universally into King James's interests; so that the Presbyterians were the only party, that the King had in that Kingdom. He did indeed assure many persons, that he would restrain and moderate the violence of the Presbyterians; and Lord Melville, the Secretary of State for Scotland, promised the same thing very solemnly, and at first seemed much determined upon it. But when that Lord saw so great a party formed against himself, and that many of the Presbyterians inclined to favour that party, and to set themselves in an opposition to the Court, he thought it was the King's interest, or at least his own, to engage that party intirely, which he found no method so effectual to do, as by abandoning the Ministers of the episcopal persuasion to their fury. He set up therefore the Earl of Crawford as the head of his party, who was passionate in his temper, and out of measure zealous in his principles, and was now chosen President of the Parliament. He received and encouraged all the complaints, that were made of the Episcopal Ministers. The Convention, when they passed the votes, declaring the King and Queen, had ordered a proclamation to be read the next Sunday in all the Churches in Edinburgh, and in all the other Churches in the Kingdom by a certain prefixed day, but which was so near at hand, that it was scarce possible to lay proclamations all round the nation within the time; and it was absolutely impossible for the Clergy to meet together, and to come to any resolution among themselves. For the most part the proclamations were not brought to the Ministers till the morning of the Sunday, in which they were ordered to be read; so this having the face of a great change of principles, many could not on the sudden resolve to submit to it. Some had not the proclamations brought to them till the day was past. Many of these read it the Sunday following. Some of those, who did not think fit to read the proclamation, yet obeyed it, and continued after that to pray for the King and Queen. Complaints were brought to the Council of all those, who had not read nor obeyed the proclamation; and they were in a summary way deprived of their benefices. In the executing this, the Earl of Crawford shewed much eagerness and violence. Those, who did not read the proclamation on the day appointed, had no favour, though they did it afterwards; and upon any word, that fell from them, either in their extemporary prayers, or sermons, that shewed disaffection to the government, they were also deprived. All these things were published throughout England, and much aggravated, and raised the aversion, that the friends of the Church had to the Presbyterians so high, that they began to repent their having granted 1689. granted a toleration to a party, that, where they prevailed, shewed his great fury against those of the Episcopal persuasion. So that those, who had laboured to excuse the change, which the King was forced to consent to, and had promised in his name great moderation towards their friends in Scotland, were much out of countenance, when they saw the violence, with which matters were carried there. These things concurred to give the Clergy such ill impressions of the King, that there was little reason to look for success in a design, which was then preparing for the Convocation, for which a summons was issued out to meet, during the next session of Parliament.

Wake's speech at Sacheverell's trial. State Tri. V. 840. Burnet.

Though the King had failed in his design of uniting his Protestant subjects, by the admission of those that were willing and able to serve, into employments and benefices, yet so desirous was he of this union, that he was resolved to try to obtain by the Convocation, what he had in vain endeavoured to establish by the Parliament. Accordingly, the project of a comprehension was set on foot, of which some foundation had been laid even before the Revolution. In the preceding reign, the Clergy, when under the influence of their fears of popery, had expressed an inclination to come to a temper with relation to the Presbyterians, and such other Dissenters, as could be brought into a comprehension with the established Church. The Bishops had mentioned it in their petition to King James, for which they were tried; and Dr. Sanctus, Archbishop of Canterbury, towards the end of that reign, foreseeing some such revolution, as soon after was brought about, began to consider, how utterly unprepared they had been at the Restoration of King Charles II., to settle many things to the advantage of the Church, and what a happy opportunity had been lost for want of such a previous care, as he was therefore desirous should be now taken for the better and more perfect establishment of it; and as it was visible to all the nation, that the more moderate Dissenters were generally so well satisfied with that stand, which the Church Divines had made against Popery, and the many unanswerable treatises they had published in confutation of it, as to express an unusual readiness to come into the Church; it was thought worth the while, when they were deliberating about those other matters, to consider at the same time what might be done to gain the Dissenters, without doing any prejudice to the Church. The scheme was laid out, and the several parts of it were committed, not only with the Archbishop's approbation, but direction, to such Divines of the Church, as were thought most proper to be intrusted with it. The Archbishop took one part to himself; another was committed to Dr. Patrick, afterwards Bishop of Ely; and the reviewing of the daily service and the communion book was referred to a select number of Divines, of whom Dr. Sharp, afterwards Archbishop of York, and Dr. Patrick were two. The design was to improve and enforce the discipline of the Church, to review and enlarge the Liturgy, by correcting of some things, and adding of others; and, if it should be thought advisable by authority, when this matter should come to be legally considered, first in Convocation, and then in Parliament, by leaving out some few ceremonies, confessed to be indifferent in their nature, as indifferent in their usage, so as not necessarily to be observed by such, as should make a scruple of them. And this design was known to and approved by the other Bishops. King William therefore, who had promised the Dissenters not only in his declaration, but when they addressed him at his first coming, to endeavour an union between them and the Church, resolved to resume the affair, and to promote it to the utmost of his power. As it was thought necessary to prepare and digest matters before they should be offered to the Convocation, a special commission under the Great Seal was given to ten Bishops and twenty Divines, to draw up a scheme of the whole affair (1). Great care was taken to name these so impartially, that no exceptions could lie against them. The commission was as follows:

"Whereas the particular forms of divine worship, and the rites and ceremonies appointed to be used therein, are things in their own nature indifferent and alterable, and so acknowledged; it is but reasonable, that upon weighty and important considerations, according to the various exigencies of time and occasions, such changes and alterations should be made therein, as to those that are in place and authority, should from time to time seem either necessary or expedient.

"And whereas the book of Canons is fit to be reviewed, and made more suitable to the state of the Church; And whereas there are defects and abuses in the Ecclesiastical courts and jurisdictions, and particularly there is not sufficient provision made for the removing of scandalous ministers, and reforming of manners either in ministers or people; And whereas it is most fit, that there should be a most strict method prescribed for the examination of such persons as desire to be admitted into holy orders, both as to their learning and manners.

"We therefore, out of our pious and princely care for the good order, and edification, and unity of the Church of England, committed to our charge and care; and for the reconciling, as much as is possible, of all differences among our good subjects, and to take away all occasions of the like for the future, have thought fit to authorize and empower you, &c. and any nine of you, whereof three to be Bishops to meet from time to time, as often as shall be needful, and to prepare such alterations of the Liturgy and Canons, and such proposals for the reformation of ecclesiastical courts, and to consider of such other matters, as in your judgments may most conduce to the ends abovementioned." (2).

The

(1) This method was become necessary, since by the submission which the Clergy in Convocation made to Henry VIII. and which was confirmed in Parliament, they bound themselves not to attempt any new canons, without obtaining the King's leave first, and that under a Premunure.

(1) Dr. Nichols gives the following account of the proceedings of the Commissioners. "They began with reviewing the Liturgy; and first they examined the calendar; in which, in the room of Apocryphal lessons, they ordered certain chapters of canonical scripture to be read, that were to the people's advantage. Athanasius's creed being disliked by many because of the damnatory clause, it was left to the Minister's choice to use it, or change it for the Apostles Creed. New Collects were drawn up, more agreeable to the Epistles and Gospels, for the whole course of the year; and these were composed with that elegance and propriety of expression, and such a flame of devotion, that nothing could more affect the hearts of the hearers, and elevate their minds towards God. They were first drawn up by Dr. Patrick, who was reckoned to have great skill in Liturgical compositions. Bishop Burnet added to them yet farther force and spirit. Dr. Stillingfleet afterwards examined them with great judgment, carefully weighing every word in them; and Dr. Tillotson had the last hand, giving them some free and masterly strokes of his easy and flowing eloquence. Dr. Kidder, who was well versed in the oriental tongues, made a new version of the Psalms more agreeable to the original. Dr. Tension made a collection of the words and expressions throughout the Liturgy, which had been excepted to, and proposed others in their room, that were clear and plain, and less liable to objection. Other things also were proposed, that were left to be determined by the Convocation: As, 1. That the Cross in Baptism might be either used or omitted at the choice of the parents. 2. That a Nonconformist Minister going over to the Church should not be

"ordained according to the common form, but conditionally, much in the same manner as the baptizing of infants is ordered in the Church, if there be not evidence of their being baptized before, with the addition of the episcopal benediction, as was customary in the ancient Church, when Clerks were received, who had been ordained by Heretics. "Dionys. Alex. apud Euseb. Hist. Eccles. l. vii. cap. 2. "Concil. Nic. I. Canon. 8. Justin. five Anth. Respons. "ad Oribod. Resp. 18. Theod. Hist. Eccles. lib. 1. "cap. 8. of which way of ordaining, Archbishop Bramhall had given a precedent, when he received some Scots Presbyters into the Church." Nichols Appar. ad Defens. Eccles. Anglic. p. 95.

But the most complete account of this affair is published by Dr. Edmund Calamy, in his abridgment of Baxter's History of his own Time. The Committee (says he) being met in the Jerusalem Chamber, a dispute arose about the authority and legality of the Court; the Bishop of Rochester, though he had so lately acted in an illegal one, being one of those that questioned it. The grounds of this scruple were the obligations the Clergy lay under by act of Parliament of King Henry VIII, not to enter into any debates about making any alterations in Church affairs, without the King's special and immediate privacy, and direction first given concerning such alterations. It was answered, that that must be done either by an act of the King's own judgment, or by a private cabal, (both which ways would be very exceptionable) or else by his Majesty's commission to a certain number of Ecclesiastics, to consult about, and prepare what was necessary to be altered, as it was in the present case. For, moreover, the Commissioners pretended not to make these alterations obligatory by virtue of a law, but only to get them ready to lay before the Convocation; the very reports being not so much as to be referred to the Privy Council, lest they might be subject to be canvassed and modelled by lay hands. However the Bishops of Winchester and Rochester, and Dr. Jone and Dr. Aldrich withdrew dissatisfied; and the rest, after a list of all that seemed fit to be changed, was read over, proceeded very unanimously, and without any heats, in determining, as follows, (each article, as soon as agreed on, being signed by the Bishop of London) viz.

That the chaunting of divine service in Cathedral Churches shall be laid aside, that the whole may be rendered intelligible to the common people.

That besides the Psalms, being read in their course as before, some proper and devout ones be selected for Sundays.

That the Apocryphal lessons, and those of the Old Testament, which are too natural, be thrown out, and others appointed in their stead by a new calendar, which is already fully settled, and out of which are omitted all the legendary Saints days, and others not directly referred to in the service book.

That not to send the vulgar to search the Canons, which few of them ever saw, a Rubric be made, setting forth the usefulness of the cross in baptism, not as an essential part of that sacrament, but only a fit and decent ceremony. However, if any do, after all, in conscience scruple it, it may be omitted by the Priest.

That likewise if any refuse to receive the sacrament of the Lord's Supper kneeling, it may be administered to them in their pews.

That a Rubric be made, declaring the intention of the Lent-fasts, to consist only in extraordinary acts of devotion, not in distinction of meats; and another to state the meaning of Rogation Sundays and Ember weeks; and appoint, that those ordained within the quatuor tempora do exercise strict devotion.

That

1689. point, which created the greatest difficulty, was about the admitting of Dissenting Ministers to officiate in the Church, when duly reconciled to it. Some of the Commissioners were inclined not to insist on the re-ordination of them, alleging, that they ought not to show less regard to the vocation of Presbyterian Ministers, than to that of Roman Catholic Priests, whose ordination was never questioned upon their joining in communion with the Church of England. But the majority thought it more proper to keep a middle course, which was, first with respect to Roman Priests, to leave it undecided, whether their ordination was good or not. But because they were not obliged to give credit to their certificates, that therefore such of them, as for the future should turn Protestants, should live in lay-communion only, unless they were re-ordained to a legal title of any Church or Cure. And, secondly, that though they did not determine the ordination of Presbyterians to be altogether invalid, yet they thought it necessary for their Ministers to receive orders from a Bishop, who, in conferring the same, might add a clause to the common form, as the Church had already ordained in the case of uncertain baptism, to this effect, If thou art not already ordained, I ordain thee, &c. And this was the greatest concession, that was made by the Commissioners. Among these Commissioners were some very rigid men, the principal of whom was Dr. Jane (1); but they either never came to their meetings, or soon withdrew from them, declaring themselves dissatisfied with the design, some owning plainly, that they were against all alterations whatsoever. They thought, too much was already done for the Dissenters in the toleration, which was granted them; but that they would do nothing to make that still easier. They said farther, that the altering the customs and constitution of the Church, to gratify a peevish and obstinate party, was like to have no other effect on them, but to make them more insolent; as if the Church, by offering these alterations, seemed to confess, that she had been hitherto in the wrong. They thought, this attempt would divide the Clergy among themselves, and make their people lose their esteem for the Liturgy, if it appeared, that it wanted correction. They also excepted to the manner of preparing matters by a special commission, as limiting the Convocation, and imposing upon it. And to load this with a word of an ill sound, they called this a new Ecclesiastical commission. But in answer to all this it was said, that if by a few corrections or explanations all just satisfaction was offered to the chief objections of the Dissenters, there was reason to hope, that this would bring over many of them, at least of the people, if not of the teachers among them; or, if the prejudices of education wrought too strongly upon the present age, yet, if some more sensible objections were put out of the way, it might justly be hoped, that this would have a great effect on the next generation. If these concessions were made so, as to own, in the way of offering them, that the Nonconformists had been in the right, that might turn to the reproach of the Church: but such offers being made only in regard to their weakness, the reproach fell on them, as the honour accrued to the Church, who shewed herself a true mother, by her care to preserve her children. It was

That the Rubric, which obliges ministers to read or hear Common Prayer, publicly or privately every day, be changed to an exhortation to the people to frequent those prayers.

That the Abolution in morning and evening prayer may be read by a Deacon, the word Priest in the Rubric being changed into Minister, and those words, and Remission, be put out as not very intelligible.

That the Gloria Patri shall not be repeated at the end of every Psalm, but of all appointed for morning and evening prayer.

That those words in the Te Deum, thine honourable, true, and only son, be thus turned, thine only begotten son, honourable being only a civil term, and no where used in scriptis.

The Benedicite shall be changed into the 128th Psalm; and other Psalms likewise appointed for the Benedictus and Nunc dimittis.

The Versicles after the Lord's Prayer, &c. shall be read kneeling, to avoid the trouble and inconveniences of so often varying postures in the worship. And after these words, give peace in our time, O Lord, shall follow an answer promissory of somewhat on the people's part, of keeping God's laws, or the like; the old response being grounded on the predestinating doctrine, taken in too strict an acceptance.

All high titles of appellations of the King, Queen, &c. shall be left out of the prayers, such as most illustrious, religious, mighty, &c. and only the word sovereign retained for the King and Queen.

Those words in the prayer for the King, grant that he may vanquish and overcome all his enemies, as of too large extent, if the King engage in an unjust war, shall be turned thus; preserve all his righteous undertakings against thy enemies, or after some such manner.

Those words in the prayer for the Clergy, who alone workst great marvels, as subject to be ill interpreted by persons vainly disposed, shall be thus, who alone art the author of all good gifts; and those words, the healthful spirit of thy grace, shall be, the holy spirit of thy grace, healthful being an obsolete word.

The prayer, which begins, O God, whose nature and property, shall be thrown out, as full of strange and impertinent expressions, and besides not in the original, but foisted in since by another hand.

The Collects for the most part are to be changed for those the Bishop of Chichester has prepared, being a review of the old ones with enlargements, to render them more sensible and affecting; and what particular expressions are needful, to be retrenched.

If any minister refuse the surplice, the Bishop, if the people desire it, and the living will bear it, may substitute one in his place, that will officiate in it; but the whole thing is left to the discretion of the Bishops.

If any desire to have godfathers and godmothers omitted, and their children presented in their own names to baptism, it may be granted.

About the Albanian Creed, they came at last to this conclusion, that left the wholly rejecting it should by unreasonable persons be imputed to them as Socinianism, a Rubric should be made, setting forth or declaring the curses denounced therein, not to be restrained to every particular article, but intended against those, that deny the substance of the Christian religion in general.

Whether the amendment of the translation of the reading Psalms (as they are called) made by the Bishop of St. Asaph and Dr. Kieller, or that in the Bible, shall be inserted in the Prayer-book, is wholly left to the Convocation to consider of and determine.

In the Litany, and Communion Service, &c. were likewise some alterations made, as also in the Canons.

(1) The rest of the rigid ones were, Mew, Sprat, Aldrich, Beaumont, Montague, Goodman, Beveridge, & Aston. Most of these were so far from thinking of a comprehension, that they would hardly own the reformed abroad to be true churches, much less the Dissenters at home.

1689. was not offered, that the ordinary posture of receiving the sacrament kneeling should be changed: that was still to be the received and favoured posture; only such, as declared they could not overcome their scruples in that matter, were to be admitted to it in another posture. Ritual matters were of their own nature indifferent, and had been always declared to be so: All the necessity of them arose only from the authority in Church and State, that had enacted them. It was therefore an unreasonable stiffness to deny any abatement in such matters, in order to the healing of the wounds of the Church. Great alterations have been made in such things in all ages of the Church. Even the Church of Rome was still making some alterations in her rituals; and changes had been made in that of England often since the reformation in the reigns of King Edward VI, Queen Elizabeth, King James I, and King Charles II. These changes were always made upon some great turn; critical times being the most proper for designs of that kind. The toleration, now granted, seemed to render it more necessary than formerly, to make the terms of Communion with the Church as large as might be, that so it might draw over to it the greater number from those, who might now leave it more safely; and therefore the greater care ought to be used in order to the gaining of them. And as for the manner of preparing these overtures, the King's supremacy signified little, if he could not appoint a select number to consider of such matters, as he might think fit to lay before the Convocation. This did no way break in upon their full freedom of debate, it being free to them to reject, as well as to accept, of the propositions to be offered to them. But while they were arguing this matter on both sides, the party, that was now at work for King James, took hold of this occasion to inflame men's minds. It was said, the Church was to be pulled down, and Presbytery was to be set up: that all this now in debate was only intended to divide and distract the Church, and to render it by that means both weaker and more ridiculous, while it went off from its former grounds, in offering such concessions. The Universities took fire upon this, and began to declare against it, and against all who promoted it, as men, who intended to undermine the Church. Severe reflections were cast on the King, as being in a contrary interest to the Church; for the Church was as the word given out by the Jacobite party, under which they thought they might more safely shelter themselves. There were great canvassings every where in the elections of Convocation-men; a thing not known in former times; so that it was soon very visible, that the Clergy were not in a temper cool or calm enough to encourage the further prosecution of such a design.

When the Convocation met, the Lower House immediately discovered their disposition, by their choice of a Prolocutor. The Person designed by the Bishop of London and most of his brethren, and the moderate part of the Clergy, was Dr. Tillotson, Dean of Canterbury, whom the King had lately made Clerk of his closet, and used to call the honestest man, and the best friend, that ever he had in his life. But it was carried by a great majority of votes for Dr. Jene of Oxford, a professed enemy of the Dissenters, who being presented to the Bishop of London as President for his approbation, made a customary speech in Latin, wherein he extolled the excellency of the Liturgy of the Church of England as established by law, above that of all Christian communities, and intimated, that it wanted no amendments; and then ended with the application of this sentence by way of triumph, nolumus leges Angliæ mutari. The Bishop of London, to whom the Prolocutor had been Chaplain, made a speech in the same language with great moderation and candour. He told the Clergy, "that they ought to endeavour a temper in those things, that are not essential to religion, thereby to open the door of salvation to a multitude of straying Christians: That it must needs be their duty to shew the same indulgence and charity to the Dissenters under King William, which some of the Bishops and Clergy had promised to them in their addresses to King James." And he concluded with a pathetic exhortation to unanimity and concord. Many of the Members being absent, the Convocation adjourned to the next day, without debating any thing of moment.

At the next meeting, the Bishop of London being sensible, that the majority of the Lower House were resolved to oppose the intended union with the Dissenters, acquainted the Convocation, "That having communicated the Royal Commission, by which they were empowered to act, to an eminent civilian, he had found it defective in not having the Great Seal; and therefore he should prorogue them till that was procured." During this interval, many arguments were used to bring the most rigid of the inferior Clergy to a charitable condescension, and the desired union; but to very little purpose. There was a jealousy and a distrust not to be conquered; though there could be but two arguments of any force to justify their averfeness to enter upon the terms of accommodation. One was, that it seemed to derogate from the dignity of the Church of England, to make any step towards the altering of her constitution, till it did appear, that the Dissenters themselves did desire a reconciliation, and were ready to offer some proposals, or to accept of others. A second argument might be, that the Archbishop of Canterbury, and some of his suffragans, and some other Divines, would not own the present government, and were therefore ready to fall into a new separation from their brethren; so that at this juncture it might be dangerous to make any change, that might give a pretence of being for the old Church, as well as the old King.

On the 4th of December, while both Houses of Convocation were sitting together in Henry VII's Chapel, the Earl of Nottingham brought in the King's commission, which was read to the assembly, there being present twelve Bishops and a good number of the inferior Clergy. This done, the King's message was also read;

The King's commission read.

"William R.

"HIS Majesty has summoned this Convocation, not only because it is usual upon holding a Parliament, but out of a pious zeal to do every thing, that may tend to the best establishment of the Church of England, which is so eminent a part of the Reformation, and is 1689. "certainly the best suited to the constitution of this government; and therefore does most signally deserve, and shall always have both his favour and protection. And he doubts not but that you will assist him in promoting the welfare of it, so that no prejudices, with which some men may have laboured to possess you, shall disappoint his good intentions, or deprive the Church of any benefit from your consultations. His Majesty therefore expects, that the things, that shall be proposed, shall be calmly and impartially considered by you; and assures you, that he will offer nothing to you, but what shall be for the honour, peace, and advantage both of the Protestant religion in general, and particularly of the Church of England."

At the same time the Earl of Nottingham made a speech to the assembly, exhorting them to lay aside all partial prepossessions and animosities in their proceedings.

The message being read, the Bishops went to the Jerusalem Chamber, from whence they sent a copy of it to the Lower House, and also the following form of an address to the King, to which they desired their concurrence.

Address to the King as proposed by the Bishops.

"WE the Bishops &c. in convocation assembled having received your Majesty's gracious message, together with a commission from your Majesty, by the Earl of Nottingham, hold our selves bound in gratitude and duty, to return our most humble thanks and acknowledgments of the grace and goodness expressed in your Majesty's message, and the zeal you shew in it for the Protestant religion in general, and the Church of England in particular; and of the trust and confidence reposed in us by this commission. We look on these marks of your Majesty's care and favour as the continuance of the great deliverance Almighty God wrought for us by your means, in making you the blessed instrument of preserving us from falling under the cruelty of Popish tyranny; for which as we have often thanked Almighty God, so we cannot forget that high obligation and duty, which we owe to your Majesty; and on these new assurances of your protection and favour to our Church, we beg leave to renew the assurance of our constant fidelity and obedience to your Majesty, whom we pray God to continue long and happily to reign over us."

Division in the Lower House.

The Lower House, which seemed resolved to do nothing, would not consent to this address; but first pleaded for the privilege of presenting a separate address of their own drawing up; and then dropping that pretension, they fell to making amendments, and gave a reason, why they could not concur with the Bishops, in their form, in these words: We are desirous to confine our address to his Majesty's most gracious message, and to those things only therein, which concern the Church of England. Hereupon a conference was desired, which was managed chiefly between the Bishop of Salisbury and the Prolocutor; and these reasons were reported, why their Lordships insisted on the express mention of the Protestant religion: "1. Because it is the known denomination of the common doctrine of the Western part of Christendom, in opposition to the errors and corruptions of the Church of Rome. 2. Because the leaving out this may have ill consequences, and be liable to strange constructions both at home and abroad, among protestants as well as papists. 3. Because it agrees with the general reason offered by the Clergy for their amendment, since this is expressly mentioned in the King's message; and in this the Church of England being so much concerned, the Bishops think it ought to stand in the address." The Lower House debated these reasons, and disagreed to them, and then resolved, "that instead of the Protestant Religion, they would rather say, Protestant Churches." Their Lordships desired a reason of this alteration: which was returned in these words: "We being the representatives of a formed established Church, do not think fit to mention the word Religion any farther than it is the religion of some formed established Church." The Lords returned the amendments with this alteration: "The Interest of the Protestant Religion in this and all other Protestant Churches." The Lower House thinking it a diminution to the Church of England to join it with foreign Protestant churches, would have the words [this and] to be omitted; and at last, with great difficulty, the following address was agreed on, and presented to the King on Thursday, Decemb. 12.

"WE your Majesty's most loyal and most dutiful subjects, the Bishops and Clergy of the province of Canterbury, in Convocation assembled, having received a most gracious message from your Majesty by the Earl of Nottingham, hold ourselves bound in duty and gratitude, to return our most humble acknowledgments for the same; and for the pious zeal and care your Majesty is pleased to express therein, for the honour, peace, advantage, and establishment of the Church of England: Whereby, we doubt not, the interest of the Protestant religion in all other Protestant churches, which is dear to us, will be the better secured under the influence of your Majesty's government and protection. And we crave leave to assure your Majesty, that in pursuance of that trust and confidence you repose in us, we will consider whatsoever shall be offered to us from your Majesty, without prejudice, and with all calmness and impartiality; and that we will constantly pay the fidelity and allegiance, which we have all sworn to your Majesty and the Queen; whom we pray God to continue long and happily to reign over us."

The King well understood, why this address omitted the thanks, which the Bishops had returned for his royal commission, and the zeal, which he had shewn for the Protestant religion; and why there was no expression of tenderness to the Dissenters, and but a cool regard to other Protestant churches. However, he returned this gracious answer, addressed to the Bishops:

My Lords,

"I take this address very kindly from the Convocation. You may depend upon it, that all I have promised, and all I can do for

the

1689. "the service of the Church of England, I will do; and I give you this new assurance, that I will improve all occasions and opportunities for its service."

Proceedings of the Lower-House. By all their proceedings hitherto, the Lower-House of Convocation had shown an utter dislike to the business for which they were chiefly assembled, and by what followed, their aversion to the union so earnestly desired by the King, was no less manifest. For instead of taking any measures for a comprehension in favour of the moderate Dissenters, they turned their thoughts to their Non-juring brethren, and a zealous speech was made in behalf of the Bishops under suspension, "That something might be done to qualify them to sit in Convocation; yet so, as that the Convocation might not incur any danger thereby." But this being a point of great difficulty, it was left to farther consideration; whilst they laboured to find out some other business to divert them from that, for which they were called together. To that end the Prolocutor attended the President and Bishops, and in the name of the House represented to their Lordships, "that there were several books of very dangerous consequence to the Christian religion and the Church of England; particularly Notes upon Athanasius's Creed, and two letters relating to the present Convocation, lately come abroad; and desired their Lordships advice, in what way, and how far, safely, and without incurring the penalty of Stat. 25. Hen. VIII. the Convocation may proceed, in the preventing the publishing the like scandalous books for the future, and inflicting the censure of the Church, according to the Canons provided in that behalf, upon the authors of them." Upon which the Prolocutor soon after acquainted the house, "that the President had declared his sense of the ill consequence of those books, that were sent up from this house to their Lordships; and that, upon inquiry, he could not receive any satisfaction, how far the Convocation might proceed in that affair; but he would, as far as lay in him, take farther order about it."

When the President and his brethren saw the disposition of the Lower House, they found it was to no purpose to communicate any proposals to them; and therefore the King was advised to suffer the session to be discontinued. And thus as the Convocation was not disposed to enter upon business, they were kept from doing mischief by prorogations, for a course of ten years. This was in reality a favour to them; for, ever since the year

1662, the Convocation had indeed continued to sit, but to do no business: So that they were kept at no small expence in town, to do nothing, but only to meet and read a Latin Litany. It was therefore an ease to be freed from such an attendance to no purpose.

The ill reception which the lower House had given the King's message, raised a great clamour against them, since all the promises made in King James's reign, were now entirely forgot. But however, their proceedings were a great disappointment to the Non-juring Clergy who were under suspension. They were it seems designing to make a schism in the Church, whenever they should be turned out, and their places filled up by others. They saw, it would not be easy to make a separation upon a private and personal account, and therefore wished to be furnished with more specious pretences. And if alterations had been made in the Rubric, and other parts of the Common-Prayer, they would have pretended that they still adhered to the ancient Church of England, in opposition to those who were altering it, and setting up new models (1). Thus was lost a fair opportunity not only of revising the Liturgy, Rubrics and Canons, but also of reconciling the moderate Dissenters to the Church, who with the rest have been forced to be contented with the act of Toleration, under the exclusion from all offices and employments, by means of a Test which was primarily intended to keep out the Roman Catholics, and to which the Dissenters made no opposition in hopes of being relieved from it (2).

The Parliament, pursuant to the late adjournment, met the 19th of October, when the King made the following speech to both Houses:

My Lords and Gentlemen,

"Though the last sitting continued so long, that perhaps it might have been more agreeable to you, in relation to your private concerns, not to have met again so soon; yet the interest of the publick lays an indispensable obligation upon me to call you together at this time."

"In your last meeting you gave me so many testimonies of your affection, as well as confidence in me, that I do not at all question, but in this I shall receive fresh proofs of both."

"I esteem it one of the greatest misfortunes can befall me, that in the beginning of my reign I am forced to ask such large supplies; though I have this satisfaction, that they are desired for no other purposes, than the carrying

(1) Bishop Burnet call this a happy direction of Providence. Strange, that one who thought a reformation in the Rubric, Canons, and Courts was much wanted, should believe the particular interposition of heaven to prevent it on account of an ill use that might have been made of it by a few Non-juring Clergy; whereas the reformation intended, would have been of infinite advantage to the Church, as it would have removed all the exceptionable parts of her worship and discipline, and thereby enlarged the bounds of Communion. But thus it is, that some of our wisest writers and speakers use the words, Providence, Judgments and Mercies!

(2) When the Test (IV. 1672), against the Catholics was debating, the Court, in hopes of diverting the bill, had it proposed, that some regard should be had to Protestant Dissenters. Love, member for London, and a p. XIV. Dissenter, seeing into this artifice, moved, that an effectual security might be found against Popery, and that nothing might interpose till that was done; that then the Dissenters would try to deserve some favour, but at present were willing to lie under the severity of the law, rather than clog a more necessary work with their concerns. To this the friends of the Dissenters agreed, and the Test was passed. Though it was voted, that a bill should be brought in, to give ease to the Dissenters, no act ever passed in their favour, nor has the Test been removed to this day.

"Nor can I doubt of the blessing of God upon an undertaking, wherein I did not engage out of a vain ambition, but from the necessity of opposing their designs of destroying our religion and liberties. "It is well known, how far I have exposed myself to rescue this nation from the dangers that threatened, not only your liberty, but the Protestant religion in general, of which the Church of England is one of the greatest supports, and for the defence whereof I am ready again to venture my life.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

"That which I have to ask of you at present is, that what you think fit to give towards the charges of the war for the next year, may be done without delay. And there is one reason, which more particularly obliges me to press you to a speedy determination in this matter, because the next month there is appointed at the Hague, a general meeting of all the princes and states concerned in this war against France, in order to concert the measures, for the next campaign; and till I know your intentions, I shall not only be uncertain my self what resolutions to take, but our allies will be under the same doubts, unless they see me supported by your assistance. Besides, if I know not in time what you will do; I cannot make such provisions, as will be requisite, but shall be exposed to the same inconveniences the next year, which were the cause, that the preparations for this were neither so effectual or expeditious as was necessary. The charge will be also considerably lessened by giving time to provide things in their proper season, and without confusion.

"I have no other aim in this but to be in a condition to attack our enemies in so vigorous a manner, as by the help of God may, in a little time, bring us to a lasting and honorable peace; by which my subjects may be freed from the extraordinary expence of a lingering war. And that I can have no greater satisfaction than in contributing to their ease, I hope I have already given proof. That you may be satisfied, how the money has been laid out, which you have already given, I have directed the accounts to be laid before you, whenever you shall think fit to call for them.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

"I have one thing more to recommend to you, which is the dispatch of a bill of indemnity, that the minds of my good subjects being quieted, we may all unanimously concur to promote the welfare and honour of the Kingdom."

It is remarkable, that this speech which met with universal applause, was composed by the King himself,---who the day before produced it to the Council, written with his own hand, telling them, He knew most of his predecessors were used to commit the drawing up of such speeches to their ministers, who generally had their private aims and interests in view; to prevent which he had thought fit to write it himself in French, because he was not so great a master of the English tongue. He desired them therefore to look it over, and change what they found amiss, that it might be translated into English (1).

At the same council the Marquis of Halifax desired for several reasons, which he forbore to mention, to be excused from the office of Speaker of the House of Lords, which was readily granted him, and a commission was given to Sir Robert Atkyns, Chief Baron of the Exchequer, to supply his place.

The business of Oates, and some other matters, which had raised such heats between the two houses, being only superseeded by the repeated adjournment of the Parliament, it was moved in council to put a final end to them by a prorogation. But the King thought fit to do nothing in an affair of such a nature, without the advice of both houses. The Lords readily consented to it; and as for the Commons, though some of their Members pretended, that such a prorogation was irregular, after the King had made a speech, wherein he had proposed new matters to their consideration, yet the contrary opinion carried it by a great majority; so that the King being come to the House of Lords on Monday the 21st of October, Sir Robert Atkyns the new Speaker, acquainted both Houses, that it was his Majesty's pleasure, that the Parliament should be prorogued, to the Wednesday following. Before this prorogation, Dr. Crew Bishop of Durham, contrary to the expectation of most people, took the oaths, and subscribed the declaration appointed by law. He had been one of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, and upon King James's abdication, had absconded himself for some time. He had endeavoured to get beyond sea, and offered to compound by resigning his Bishoprick, but at last he was prevailed on to merit a pardon for what he had done by submitting to the Government.

The Parliament being met on the 23d of October, the King declared to them from the throne, "That having spoke so lately to them, he need not say any thing now, matters not having been altered since that time; and therefore referred to what he had said last to both houses, and desired, that speedy resolutions might be taken." Whereupon the Commons unanimously resolved, "that they would stand by and assist his Majesty in reducing Ireland, and joining with his allies abroad in a vigorous prosecution of a war against France."

Accordingly, when the King at their request had laid before them the necessary charges of the next year's service, with the accounts of the last summer's expences, they unanimously voted a supply of two millions for those purposes (2).

The

(1) The speech was approved by all the board except the Earl of Monmouth, who objected against the expression, L'Eglise Anglicane étoit le principal appui de la religion Protestante; i. e. The Church of England is the chief support of the Protestant religion. So it was altered to, The Church of England is one of the greatest supports of the Protestant religion. Sir Thomas Clarges, a Member of the House of Commons, found fault that his Majesty had not said the Church of England, as by law established.

(2) The funds for raising this supply were a Land-tax of two shillings, and another of one shilling in the pound, 1689. The Parliament this session was chiefly employed about the State-prisoners, the instruments of the illegal proceedings in the late reigns, and the miscarriages in Jifib and other affairs.

Proceed- As to the State-prisoners, the act for detain- ings a- ing suspected persons in prison being expired, and several of those persons having petitioned the House to be tried at the King's Bench, a committee was appointed to inquire into the informations which had been given against them; and the misdemeanors of Burton and Grabam, the great oppressors in the late reign, were again reported to the House. The case likewise of Baron Jenner was reported, who was charged with declaring for the dispensing power, and acting in the affair of Magdalen College. These three were ordered to be brought before the House to be examined, but Jenner having been bailed and released, before the warrant was served, the serjeant at arms was ordered to take him into custody, and likewise Burton and Grabam, who were brought before the House, and not giving satisfaction, a committee was appointed to prepare a charge against them. At the same time were released upon bail, the Lords Preslon (1), Forbes and Sir John Fenwick. But the Commons resolved to impeach the Earls of Peterborough, Salisbury, and Castlemain, Sir Edward Hales and Obadiab Walker, of High-treason, for being reconciled to the Church of Rome contrary to law, and others crimes. A bill was also ordered to be brought in to declare the late Lord Chancellor Jefferies's estate forfeited to the crown, and to attain his blood. But this bill met with so much opposition that no progress was made in it. However for a terror to all the late instruments of Popery, and arbitrary power, the House agreed "that the pecuniary penalties incurred by "all Privy Counsellors, Lord Lieutenants, Deputy Lieutenants, and Militia officers, Justices of the peace, and by any other persons, "who had accepted or exercised any office or "place of profit, either military or civil, (other "than such as are now officers, in their Majesties army or fleet) contrary to the laws against "Popish recusants, should be speedily levied, and "applied to the public service."

a fortnight before King James's abdication, having been often required by letters and otherwise to attend the House of Lords, and still refusing to appear, their Lordships desired the King by an address to summon him by proclamation to surrender himself, at such a day as his Majesty should appoint to their House, if then actually sitting, or to one of the Secretaries of State. His Lordship being accordingly summoned, surrendered himself to the Earl of Nottingham, and having made his appearance before the House of Lords, the Speaker told him, that he knew what he had to do before his sitting in that house; whereupon his Lordship desired time to consider of taking the oaths, he not being prepared for it; which was readily granted.

The same day the Parliament was prorogued, a packet was intercepted, which plainly discovered how little the Lord Griffin was inclined to own the present government. This discovery happened in the following manner. His Lordship having caused a large pewter bottle to be made with a double bottom, ordered his cook to go to a pewterer's at an unreasonable hour of the night, to get the false bottom soldered. The pewterer finding a packet between the two bottoms of the bottle, began to suspect something; and the cook not giving him a satisfactory answer about the contents, he made bold to open it. The superscription of several letters directed to King James, the Duke of Perwick, &c. justified the pewterer's suspicion, who immediately seized the Lord Griffin's cook, and carried him to one of the Secretaries of State, but he being gone to bed, and his servants refusing to admit the Pewterer to his master's presence, the Lord Griffin, who by this time began to apprehend what had befallen his messenger, took this opportunity to make his escape. Besides the letters there was found an account of some private resolutions of the council, and an exact list of all the land and sea forces of England. Whereupon the Lord Griffin's House and papers were searched, his Lady committed to the Tower, several suspected persons arrested, and the Custom-house officers ordered to stop all unknown persons, who offered to cross the seas without passes. The Lord Griffin having abandoned pound, in which the Quakers are excused from double taxes, additional duties upon coffee, tea and chocolate, after the following rates:

	l.	s.	d.
Upon every hundred weight of coffee	05	12	00
Upon every hundred weight of cocoa-nut	08	08	00
Upon every pound of tea	00	05	00

This is the same bill that had been dropped the last session, upon a dispute whether the Peers can alter a money-bill or tax. It was now passed with the alteration proposed by the Lords of a draw-back upon exportation. An additional poll-tax was also passed, by which twenty shillings a head was laid upon every shop-keeper, tradesman, and artificer, worth three hundred pounds personal estate. This bill had also been dropped the last session, upon a debate, whether the Lords should appoint commissioners of their own to tax themselves. A tax of 100,000 l. was moved (by Sir Edward Seymour, it is said) to be laid on the Jews; but the motion came to nothing.

a Baron of England, their Lordships voted him guilty of High-Treason. However, they thought fit to refer the examination of that matter to the Judges their assistants. The Lord Preslon pretended, that the patent being dated one day before the meeting of the Convention, which had voted the throne vacant, it ought therefore to be valid. To which it was answered, that the vacancy was supposed to begin from the moment King James left the kingdom, whereby he abdicated the government. The next day the Judges brought in the Lord Preslon guilty of a high misdemeanor, for which he was committed to the Tower. Not long after he acknowledged, and begged pardon for his fault by a petition to the Lords, which was rejected upon his subscribing himself Viscount Preslon, without expressing of what kingdom. The next day he presented another, wherein he stiled himself Viscount of Scotland; and it being likewise alleged in his behalf, that by accepting a patent from King James, he never meant an affront to King William, but only to secure his own person from imprisonment, (being at that time prosecuted at law by the Lord Montagu for a considerable sum of money) he was released from his confinement.

The Commons upon this appointed a committee to inquire how the Lord Griffin came to know a resolution, which the King had communicated to four persons only; and the Lords addressed his Majesty to let him understand, that the said Lord being one of their Members, they were consequently his proper Judges. The King having left the cognizance of this affair to the Peers, they began to examine the papers intercepted in the Pewter bottle, which were the only evidence against the Lord Griffin. And because some few days before it had been resolved in that House, that Colonel Algernon Sidney was unjustly condemned, nothing but writings found in his closet having been produced against him, the Earl of Rochester argued, from a parity of reason in favour of Lord Griffin, who, after several warm debates, was set at liberty upon bail.

Proceedings about the authors of the executions in the late reigns. &c. Pr. H. L. I. 394. Burnett.

As to the instruments of the illegal proceedings of the late reigns, the Lords as well as the Commons, appointed a committee to examine who were the advisers and prosecutors of the murders of the Lord Russel, Colonel Sidney, Sir Thomas Armstrong, Alderman Cornish and others, and who had the chief hand in the Two Warrants and delivering up of charters. This committee was appointed, at the motion of the Duke of Bolton, and it was desired by the Lords, that Mr. John Hampden and Mr. John Trenchard, Members to the House of Commons, might attend the committee, to inform them what they knew of these matters. These two Gentlemen had been accused, for being concerned with the Duke of Monmouth and the Lord

Russel in the Plot of 1683. Trenchard had been 1689. charged with undertaking to raise a body of men at Taunton, but he had denied every thing. And 'twas then well known his greatest crime, was the being the first man, that had moved the exclusion in the House of Commons. Mr. Hampden was let into all the Duke of Monmouth's secrets, and knew the whole affair. Upon Lord Howard's evidence, he was brought in guilty of a misdemeanour, and fined 40,000*l.* the most extravagant fine, that had ever been set for a misdemeanour, and which amounted to an imprisonment for life. He was afterwards concerned in Monmouth's rebellion, and upon pleading guilty and begging his life, was pardoned.

He is said to have been so ashamed of this, that it gave his spirits such a disorder, he could never master, and which had a terrible conclusion, for about ten years after he cut his own throat. He was grandson of him that pleaded the cause of England, in the point of ship-money; his father was an eminent man, and zealous in the exclusion. He himself was a man of great parts, and a critic in Latin, Greek and Hebrew, of great heat and vivacity, but too unequal in his temper.

Mr. Hampden appeared before the committee, and, as it is said, made a long speech, tending rather to extol his own services, than to discover the authors of Lord Russel's death (1). However this be, though this inquiry lasted some weeks, and gave occasion to much heat, nothing could be proved, upon which votes or addresses could have been grounded: yet the Lord Hallifax, having concurred with the Ministry and Council in the severities and executions in the end of King Charles's reign, and in the Two Warrants, and surrendering the charters, saw it was necessary for him to withdraw now and quit the court. And soon after he reconciled himself to the Tories and upon all occasions protected

(1) This matter is thus related by Kennet after Boyer. It is certain, (say they) that Mr. Hampden was able to give the Lords a great light into that affair, having been involved in the like danger himself, and out of which he disengaged himself not without difficulty. But this enquiry was not so much intended against Mr. Hampden, as against the Marquis of Hallifax, who had endeavoured Mr. Hampden's ruin, by procuring a note from the late Duke of Monmouth, which represented Mr. Hampden as the chief accomplice with the Lord Russel. But the Duke afterwards repenting of having accused one of his best friends, earnestly demanded his note from King Charles II., to whom the Marquis had delivered it, and at last obtained it on this condition, never to return into his Majesty's presence. Mr. Hampden appeared before the committee of the Lords, and made a long speech, in which he rather aimed at justifying himself, than at discovering the authors of the Lord Russel's death. He extolled his services to the present government, insinuating, that the whole intrigue in inviting over the Prince of Orange had been managed by himself, and Mr. Johnston, (a Scotsman, son of the Lord of Warriestoun, who had been executed in 1663, and first cousin of Bishop Burnet) whom he had employed to gather the results of the several consultations in private houses. He urged, that by his concern in this affair he had exposed himself to imminent danger; for had Johnston been suspected, he would have been sent into Scotland, and forced by the rack (which is allowed in that kingdom) to discover those who set him at work. Upon this account it was that Mr. Hampden, after the Revolution, made several officers at being Secretary of State; but the King thought him of too hot a temper for a place that requires a settled head. One day Mr. Hampden, with design to remind the King of his own services, represented to him, that those of Mr. Johnston were still left unrewarded; to which the King replied, that he had not forgot either Mr. Hampden or Mr. Johnston. However, neither of them had much reason to complain; the King having named the first to be his Envoy into Spain, and the other into Switzerland; which employments they both refused.

Great part of this relation seems to be taken from uncertain memoirs; for as it is not true that the inviting over the Prince of Orange was managed by him and Johnston, Mr. Hampden cannot be justly supposed to say so. Nor is the dialogue with the King any more likely. Neither could they with justice say, that an Envoyship to Spain was a sufficient reward for the service Mr. Hampden had done the King; since, by their own confession, he had contributed so much towards the Revolution. However, it must be owned, Mr. Hampden thought himself neglected, and was so far disgusted as to say, I think I deserve to have something offered me at least. This is the worst that those who knew him intimately, heard him ever say. However this be, Mr. Cox, upon Mr. Hampden's recommendation was sent to Switzerland, and Mr. Stenhope brother to the Lord Chichester, was dispatched to Munster. About the same time, the Lord Paget was sent envoy to the Emperor, and the Lord Dursey, afterwards Earl of Berkley to Holland, to shew the Earl of Pembroke, who was made a Privy-counsellor, and not long after first Commissioner of the Admiralty, upon the resignation of the Lord Torrington.

Miscarriages in Ireland examined into.
Nov. 11.
Pr. H. C.
R. 358.

As to the miscarriages in the Irish affairs, which had been a continual subject of complaint, the Commons being informed that Duke Schomberg's army was scarce fourteen thousand strong, though there were twenty-three thousand upon the establishment, they desired the King to appoint commissioners to go over and inquire into the condition of the army in Ireland. Though the King assured the House, that he would comply with their address, yet some members moved, that the Commons should send commissioners of their own nomination, both to look into the expence, and to prevent false musters; which seemed to be an encroachment on the royal prerogative. Others said, that Duke Schomberg would have done well to have come himself in person, to acquaint the House with the causes of the weakness of his army, in order to secure his own reputation. And others went farther, reflecting on that General for not fighting King James's forces. Though the Duke wanted no apology among those, who knew his capacity, yet being informed, that his conduct was called in question, even in the Parliament itself, he acquainted the King with the reasons, that had obliged him not to stir from his camp upon the approach of King James; alledging, that his army had never exceeded twelve thousand effective men, most of them newly raised, and little better than those of the late King, who had double that number: That he had waited for artillery, horses and carriages above a month: That the army had all along wanted bread; the horses, shoes and provender; and the surgeons and apothecaries, proper medicines for the sick. This account was confirmed by Mr. Lumley, brother to the Lord Lumley, and by Count Salmes, who at this time arrived from Ireland, and reported further, that the army was cantoned in pretty good winter-quarters; that abundance of men and horse had been swept away by sickness, and want of food or clothing; but that the sick now recovered very fast; and as for the officers, that several of them had killed themselves with drinking too plentifully Irish Usquebaugh, particularly Sir Edward Deering, Colonel Wharton, and Sir Thomas Gower: That the miscarriages of Ireland were wholly to be charged on Mr. John Shales, Purveyor-General to the army; and that upon Duke Schomberg's landing at Dundalk, there was so general a consternation among the Irish, that he might have marched directly to Dublin, if he had not wanted provisions and a train of artillery. Dr. Walker also acquainted the Commons with these things, whereupon they addressed the King that Shales might be taken into custody, and all his accounts, papers, and stores secured; and that Duke Schomberg might be empowered to appoint an abler person. Next day Major Wildman brought the King's answer: "That he had some time since taken order therein, being informed of Captain Shales's misdemeanors in his employment, and had written to Duke Schomberg for that purpose; and believed what was desired was already done, though the wind being contrary, he had not yet received any account from Ireland." But the Commons still eager upon this affair, resolved upon another address, to request his Majesty to name those, who had recommended Shales to his service, which however the King declined to do, because, as he said, Shales had been proposed in full council. This Shales had been Purveyor to King James's army, whilst encamped on Hounslow-Heath; and upon that account was greatly suspected of dishonest practices under King William. A few days after the King sent the following message to the Commons in writing:

William R.

"HIS Majesty having already declared his message resolutions to prosecute the war in Ire- land with the utmost vigour; and being desirous to use the means, that may be most fatig-factory and effectual in order to it, is graciously pleased, that this House do recommend a number of persons, not exceeding seven, to be commissioned by his Majesty to take care of the provisions, and such other preparations, as shall be necessary for that service,
His Majesty is further pleased to let the House know, that upon consideration of the address of the 11th of November, he gives them leave to nominate some persons to go over into Ireland, to take an account of the number of the army there, and the state and condition of it, who shall receive his Majesty's orders accordingly."

This condescending message was so well received by the House, that both these affairs were left to the King. However they took this opportunity to press him to discover those, who had recommended Shales; to which he replied, it is impossible for me to give an answer to this question, but promised to take all possible care, to carry on the war in Ireland with vigour, and to employ such persons, as might be most proper for the service. But the complaints of mismanagement were so great, that on the 15th of December, the Commons resolved, "that an address humble address be presented to his Majesty, of affairs.
to lay before him the ill conduct and success of affairs in reference to Ireland, the armies and fleet; and humbly to desire his Majesty, that he will please to take it into his consideration, and, in his wisdom, to find out the authors of these miscarriages, and to appoint affairs to be managed by persons unsuspected, and more to the safety of his Majesty, and satisfaction of his subjects." The House likewise having been informed, that the miscarriages of the fleet proceeded from a raging sickness amongst the seamen, occasioned by great quantities of corrupt and unwholesome provisions, which had been furnished to the Navy, the last summer, and the same being attested by several Members of the House upon their own knowledge, it was resolved, on the 23d of November,
"that Sir John Parsons, Sir Richard Haddock, Alderman Sturt, and Mr. Nicholas Fenn, victuallers of the fleet, should be sent for in custody of the Serjeant at arms, to answer to the said complaints. And within a few days after, the King appointed Thomas Papillon, Simon
Mayne, John Agar, Humphrey Ayles, and James
Hew, Commissioners for victualling the navy.

About the same time the Commons took in-Hamp-to consideration the state of the nation, and several Members made complaints of the late miscarriages Kennet.

carriages, and charged them on the ministry. Mr. Hampden made a speech wherein he urged, "that he could not but wonder to see those very persons in the ministry, whom the late King James had employed, even when his affairs were most desperate, to treat with the then Prince of Orange," and moved for an address to desire the King to remove the persons, whom he had marked out, from his presence and councils. This speech (says a certain historian) might have made greater impression, had he not at the same time complained, that several Commonwealth's-men were then employed by the government; upon which the House, who knew, that both he, his father, and their predecessors had ever adhered to the republican party, broke out into a general laughter. As soon as the House was composed, several Members stood up in defence of the persons, on whom Mr. Hampden had reflected, alleging, "that the reason why they had been deputed to the Prince of Orange, was not because they were in King James's interest, but rather because they had all along disapproved that King's conduct, and, as such, had the general approbation of the nation, and were most likely to be agreeable to his Highness." However the House voted an address, to represent to the King the miscarriages of Ireland and of the fleet, and to desire, that he would discover the authors of them, that they might be brought to punishment. Mr. Hampden, with some others, being named to draw up this address, gave some people occasion to think that his principal aim was to have the Earl of Nottingham removed, that he might himself step into his place of Secretary of State.

This address was accordingly presented to the House on the 23d of December, by Mr. Hampden, and because it contained a long detail of the miscarriages, and ill successes both at sea and land; it was spoke against by several Members, and even by his own father, who insisted to have it drawn up again. But others were of another opinion, and said, instead of contradicting, it ought to be enlarged. In this debate it was remarkable to see Mr. Hampden and Sir Edward Seymour, Sir John Gifford and Sir Christopher Maygrave, Sir Francis Winnington and Mr. Francis Gwyn, on the same side of the question.

In December a question was put in the House of Commons, "Whether a person having a place at Court, or any dependance on the King, should be a member of that House?" The debate was warm and obstinate; for, as it always happens on such occasions, the disgusted and disappointed joined with the enemies of the government, to keep others out of places, since they themselves could not get into them. The question was however carried for the Place-men, and this reason given, "because otherwise the fittest persons for publick employments would remain excluded, and be debarred the opportunity of serving either the King or the Country."

During these proceedings in the Parliament, the Whigs began to lose much of the King's good opinion, not only by the heat which they showed in both Houses against their enemies, but by the coldness that appeared in every thing that related to the publick, as well as to himself, and particularly in the affair of his revenue. For though he had expressed an earnest desire to have it settled for life, alleging, he was not a King till that was done, since without it the title of a King was only a pageant, the civil list was nevertheless granted but for one year (1). For a jealousy was now infused into many, that he would grow arbitrary in his government, if he once had the revenue, and would strain for a high stretch of prerogative, as soon as he was out of difficulties and necessities. Those of the Whigs, who had lived some years at Amsterdam, had got together a great many stories, that went about the city, of his fullness and imperious way of dictating. The Scots likewise, who were now come up to give an account of the proceedings in Parliament, set about many things, that heightened their apprehensions (2). One Simpson, a Scots Presbyterian, was recommended

(1) He spoke of this with more than ordinary vehemence. So that sometimes he said he would not stay and hold an empty name, unless he had a revenue for life. He said once to Bishop Burnet, that he understood the good of a Commonwealth as well as of a kingly government, and it was hard to determine which was the best; but he was sure, the worst of all governments was that of a King, without treasure and without power. Burnet, II. 34.

(2) The Earl of Belvoir observes, that the Session of Parliament ended with so little satisfaction to all parties in it, that most of them ran to London, some to complain, that those things had not been performed, that the Prince of Orange promised, when he came to the crown; others to defend themselves; for there were great animosities among them, particularly against the Lord S—r, who, though he always had been a fanatic, yet was generally abhorred among them, as they said, being a man neither of religion, nor honour: besides he had complied with all governments, and had taken all oaths and engagements, that were a going for fifty years before, and was the contriver of several of them, yet never was faithful to any party. The favours done by the Prince of Orange, to the Lord S—r and his son, and those other things not done in Parliament, which were expected, made many dissatisfied. But to take off the odium of the last, and to shew he was not to blame for their not having all they desired in Parliament, he caused to be printed all his instructions to Duke Hamilton, and laid all the fault on him, which he most patiently suffered, and might very well have justified it, since all he neglected to do was to satisfy the most bigotted fanatics, in not settling religion, as they would have it, and whereabout they could not agree, among themselves; so it was delayed. The next thing was the not restoring the forfeited estates, which indeed Duke Hamilton thought unjust, but not the less, that his son and brother were so much concerned, being in possession of two of the best of them by a gift from your Majesty. But to do him justice, he was not for going such a length of extravagances and cruelty, as those enraged fanatic rebels, who came over with the Prince of Orange, which made the most part of his enemies, until they took a general hatred at the Lord M—r. This made them join together more for interest than inclination; others went up to get the rewards of their services; but finding themselves disappointed of those employments, which they thought due to their merit, quite broke off from the rest, though to cover their designs the better, they caused Bill the most bigotted of the party. The chief of these were Sir James Montgomery, Earl of A—r, Lord R—r, Mr. William Innes, and Mr. James O—r, who 1689. mended to the Earl of Portland, as a man, whom he might trust, and who would bring him good intelligence; upon which account he was often admitted, and was entertained as a good spy. But he was in a secret confidence with one Nevill Payne, the most active and dextrous of all King James's agents, who had indeed lost the reputation of an honest man entirely, and yet had such arts of management, that even those who knew what he was, were willing to employ him. Simpson and he were in a close league together, and Payne discovered so much of the secret intelligence of his party to Simpson, that he might carry it to the Earl of Portland, as made him pass for the best spy the Court had. When he had gained a considerable share of credit, he made use of it to infuse into the Earl of Portland's jealousies of the King's best friends; and as the Earl hearkened too attentively to these, so by other hands it was conveyed to some of them, that the Court was now become jealous of them, and was seeking evidence against them.

Conspiracy against the government.
Burnet.

Sir James Montgomery, who had been very instrumental in settling the crown of Scotland upon King William, was easily possessed with these reports; and he and some others, by Payne's management, entered into a correspondence with King James's party in England. They demanded an assurance for the settlement of Presbytery in Scotland, and to have the chief posts of the government shared among them. Princes in exile are apt to grant every thing, that is asked of them; for they know, that, if they are restored, they shall have every thing in their power. Upon this they entered into a close treaty for the way of bringing all this about. At first they only asked money for furnishing themselves with arms and ammunition; but afterwards they insisted on demanding three thousand men, to be sent over from Dunkirk; because by Duke Schomberg's being posted in Ulster, their communication with Ireland was cut off. In order to the carrying on this design, they reconciled themselves to the Duke of Queensberry, and the other Lords of the episcopal party; and on both sides it was given out, that this union of those, who were formerly such violent enemies, was only to secure and strengthen their interest in Parliament; the episcopal party pretending, that since the King was not able to protect them, they, who saw themselves marked out for destruction, were to be excused for joining with those, who could secure them. Simpson brought, 1689.

an account of all this to the Earl of Portland, and was pressed by him to find out witnesses to prove it against Sir James Montgomery. He carried this to them, and told them that the whole business was discovered, and that great rewards were offered to such as would merit them by swearing against them. With this they alarmed many of their party, who did not know what was at the bottom, and thought, that nothing was designed but an opposition to Lord Melville and the elder Dalrymple, now created Lord Stair; and they were possessed with a fear, that a new bloody scene of sham-plots and suborned witnesses was to be opened. And when it began to be whispered about, that they were in treaty with King James, that appeared to be so little credible, that it was said by some discontented men, what could be expected from a government, that was so soon contriving the ruin of its best friends? Some feared, that the King himself might too easily receive such reports: and that the common practices of ministers, who study to make their masters believe, that all their own enemies are likewise his, were like to prevail in this reign, as much as they had formerly done. Montgomery came to have great credit with some of the Whigs in England, particularly with the Earl of Monmouth and the Duke of Bolton; and he employed it all, to persuade them not to trust the King, and to animate them against the Earl of Portland. This wrought so much, that many were disposed to think, that they would have good terms from King James; and that he was now so convinced of his former errors, that they might safely trust him. The Earl of Monmouth intimated this to Bishop Burnet twice, but in such a manner, as if he was afraid of it, and endeavoured to prevent it; but he set forth the reasons for it with great advantage, and those against it very faintly. Matters were trusted to Montgomery and Payne; and Ferguson, who had been very deeply engaged with the enemies to the Court in the two preceding reigns, was taken into it, as a man, who naturally loved to embroil things. Thus a design was formed, first to alienate the city of London so entirely from the King, that no loans might be advanced on the money-bills, which, without credit upon them, could not answer the end, for which they were given. It was spread about, that King James would give a full indemnity for all that was past; and that, for the future, he would

“ who at first in the Convention had behaved himself very well, but by great promises made him by Duke Hamilton, he went over to him; and finding himself disappointed, joined again at London in all, that was proposed to him for your Majesty's service by Sir James Montgomery, who managed the rest as he pleased, and having got acquainted with Mr. Ferguson Mr. Payne, Capt. W—, and some others, that were in your interest, engaged not only for himself, but for the others without their knowledge, trusting to his power over them. The first of his own set he proposed his design to, was the Earl of A—, his brother in-law, whom he found very frank, as he always was, when the change of a party was offered, then the Lord R—; and laid before them two the ingratitude of the Prince of Orange in not giving them employments, and the great offers made by your friends, if they would return to their duty. He wanted not encouragement to say

“ so, for Mr. Payne had promised him all that his ambition, vanity, or avarice could suggest; nor were there ever two better matched than Mr. Payne and Sir James Montgomery; for Mr. Payne made him believe, that he could dispose both of titles of honor, employments and money, as he pleased; and the other imposed so far upon him, as to make him believe, he was able to turn the whole nation with a speech, to do whatsoever he proposed.
“ After they had conferred their affairs together, and disposed of every thing according to their fancy, they proposed their resolutions of serving you to the Earl of A—, then prisoner in the Tower of London who embraced it most willingly, judging it, that to get those, who had been most eminent against you, to come over, could not but make a considerable interest. The next step they made was to send one over to your Majesty, with the offer of their service, and advise how all things

It was said, that he was weary of the insolence of the French Court, and saw his error in trusting to it so much as he had done. The corrupted party had gone so far, that they seemed to fancy, that the restoring him would be not only safe, but happy to the nation. Bishop Burnet owns, that it was long before he could suffer himself to think, that the matter was gone so far; but he was at last convinced of it. He received a letter from an unknown hand, with a direction, how to answer it. The substance of it was, that the writer of it could discover a plot deeply laid against the King, if he might be assured not to be made a witness, and have his friends, who were in it, pardoned. That prelate, by the King's order, engaged for the first; but as an indefinite promise of pardon was thought too much, the informer was told that he might, as to that, trust to the King's mercy. Upon this he came to the Bishop, who found him to be Sir James Montgomery's brother. He acquainted the Bishop, that a treaty was settled with King James; that articles were agreed on; and an invitation subscribed by the whole cabal, to King James to come over, which was to be sent to the Court of France, both because the communication was easier and less watched when it went through Flanders than with Ireland; and to let that Court see, how strong a party he had, and by that means to obtain the supplies and force that was desired. He said, that he saw the writing, and some hands to it; but that he knew many more were to sign it; and he undertook to put the Bishop in a method to seize on the original paper. The King could not easily believe the affair had gone so far; yet he ordered the Earl of Shrewsbury to receive such advices, as the Bishop should bring him, and immediately to do what was proper. A few days after this, Montgomery told the Bishop that one Williamson was that day gone to Dover with the original invitation. The Bishop found the Earl of Shrewsbury inclined enough to suspect

Williamson, who had for some days solicited a pass for Flanders, and had got some persons, of whom it was not proper to shew a suspicion, to answer for him. A person was therefore sent post after him, with orders to seize him in his bed, and to take his clothes and portmanteau from him, which were strictly examined, but nothing found. Yet upon the news of this, the party was extremely affrighted, but soon recovered themselves; the true secret of which was afterwards discovered. Simpson was it seems, to go over with Williamson, but first to ride to some houses, which were in the way to Dover; whereas the other went directly in the stage-coach. It was thought safest for Simpson to carry those papers, for there were many different invitations, as they would not trust their hands to one common paper. Simpson came to the House at Dover, where Williamson was in the messengers hands; upon which he went away immediately to Deal, and hired a boat, and got safe to France with his letters. Montgomery finding that nothing was discovered by the way, which he had directed Bishop Burnet to imagine, that he should be despised by King William's friends, and perhaps suspected by his own party; and therefore went over to France soon after, and turned Papist. The fear of this discovery went presently off; and Simpson came back with large assurances; and twelve thousand pounds were sent to the Scots, who undertook to do great matters.

All pretended discoveries were laughed at, and looked upon as fictions of the court; and upon this the city of London were generally possessed with a very ill opinion of the King.

In this situation of affairs, the Whigs discovered that the Tories were treating with the Court about the dissolution of the Parliament. Though the Commons had granted the supplies that were demanded for the reduction of Ireland, and for the quota to which the King was obliged by his alliances, yet the remoteness of the funds making it necessary to offer great premiums to those who advanced the money upon a security that was thought so hazardous, since few believed the govern-

“ should be despised. Though they found a messenger fit for their affair, called Mr. J——, yet they had great difficulty, how to get their commissions, titles of honour, and instructions to the Parliament, worded according to form; for none of them knew any thing of the matter. But Sir Andrew F——, gave doubles of all they desired, to Mr. Ferguson, without knowing any thing of them, believing it could not be but for your Majesty's service, since the Earl of A——n was concerned in it. After they had dispatched their messenger with all his instructions, and having nothing to do till his return, Sir James and Mr. Ferguson being openly declared enemies to the Lord Melville, wrote a pamphlet, which they called, the grievances. It gave great offence, and broke Sir James Montgomery for ever with the Prince of Orange and all his favourites; in which was laid open all their follies and breach of promises, with all the bitterness, which Mr. Ferguson's pen was capable of, who had been in constant use of such undertakings for many years.

“ The winter 1689 was thus spent at London in their private councils, which made the Prince of Orange so weary of both sides, that he told Duke Hamilton, that he was so much troubled about their debates, that he wished he were a thousand miles from Scotland, and that he were never King

“ of it. Duke Hamilton, though he was extremely both the Lord Melville's and Lord Stair's enemy, who were the chief cause of those debates, yet went not publicly to the meetings of your enemies, which was then called the club, but lived in outward civility with all, till the spring that Lord Melville came down Commissioner.

“ While they were thus hot upon their debates at London, the council of Scotland, where the Earl of Crawford constantly presided, without any commission, was very busy with the Episcopal clergy, who had not prayed for the Prince of Orange, as was ordered by the last session of Parliament. A great many were summoned before the council; and upon their refusal turned out. Others, who would have complied, and also made it appear by their defences, that it was impossible for them to be informed of the order in so short a time, were likewise turned out. His zeal carrying all things before him, and the rest complying with all that he proposed; so that by the council, the rabble, and the new levied dragoons the worst of either, there were but very few in their churches before the next spring, save some, that were willing to comply with every thing; which rendered them contemptible even to their enemies.” Acc. of the Aff. of Scot. p. 114.

1689. vernment would last so long, the supplies, tho' seemingly great, brought not in the half of what they were estimated at. This the Tories perceived, and seeing the Whigs grow fullen, and that they would make no advance of money, they applied to the Court, and promised great advances of money if the Parliament might be dissolved, and a new one summoned. Upon this the Commons prepared a bill, "for restoring Corporations to their antient rights and privileges," by which they hoped to have made sure of all future Parliaments; for in it was inserted the following clause, "That every Mayor, Recorder, Sheriff, Common-Council-Man, Town-Clerk, Magistrate, or Officer, who did take upon him to consent to, or join in the surrender of any charters, or instrument purporting such surrender, did solicit, procure, prosecute, or did pay or contribute to the charge of prosecuting any Scire Facias, Quo Warranto, or information in the nature of Quo Warranto, by this act declared unlawful, shall be, and is declared, adjudged, and enacted to be, for the space of seven years, incapable and disabled to all intents and purposes, to bear or execute any office, employment, or place of trust, as a member of such respective body corporate, or in or for such respective city, town, borough, or cinque-port, whereof or wherein he was member at or before the time of making such surrender or instrument purporting such surrender, or the suing out, or prosecuting such Scire Facias, Quo Warranto, or information in the nature of Quo Warranto; any thing in this act contained, or any other case, statute, or any ordinance, charter, custom, or any thing to the contrary, in any wise notwithstanding." This was opposed in the House by the whole strength of the Tory party; for they saw, that the carrying of it would be the total ruin of their interest through the whole kingdom. They said a great deal against the declaratory part of the bill; but whatever there might be in that, they urged, that since the thing had been so universal, it seemed hard to punish it with such severity: and that by this means the party for the Church would be disgraced, and the corporations cast into the hands of Dissenters. And now both parties made their court to the King. The Whigs promised every thing, that he desired, if he would help them to get this bill passed; and the Tories were not wanting in their promises, if the bill should be stopped, and the Parliament dissolved. The bill was carried in the House of Commons by a great majority. When it was brought up to the Lords, the first point in debate was upon the declaratory part, Whether a corporation could be forfeited or surrendered. The Lord Chief-Justice Holt, and two other Judges, were for the affirmative, but all the rest for the negative. No precedents for the affirmative were brought higher than the reign of King Henry VIII., in which the abbies were surrendered; which was at that time so great a point of state, that the authority of these precedents seemed not clear enough for regular times. The House was so equally divided, that it went for the bill only by one voice. After which, little doubt was made of the passing the act. But now the applications of the Tories were much quickened: they made the King all possible promises; and the promoters of the bill saw themselves exposed to the Corporations, which were to feel the effects of this bill so sensibly, that they made as great promises on their part. The matter was now at a critical issue: the passing the bill put the King and the Nation in the hands of the Whigs; and the rejecting it, and dissolving the Parliament upon it, was such a trusting to the Tories, and such a breaking with the Whigs, that the King was long in suspense what to do. He was once very near a desperate resolution, he thought he could not trust the Tories, and he resolved he would not trust the Whigs. He imagined, however, that the Tories would be true to the Queen, and confide in her, though they would not in him. He therefore resolved to go over to Holland, and leave the Government in the Queen's hands.

Upon this he called together the Marquis of Carmarthen, the Earl of Sbrensfury, and some few more, and told them, that he had a convoy ready, and was resolved to leave all in the Queen's hands, since he did not see how he could extricate himself out of the difficulties, into which the animosities of parties had brought him. They pressed him vehemently to lay aside all such resolutions, and to comply with the present necessity. Much passion appeared among them; and the debate was so warm, that many tears were shed. In conclusion, the King resolved to change his first design into another better resolution, of going over in person into Ireland, to put an end to the war there. The Queen knew nothing of the first design, so reserved was the King to her in a matter, that concerned her so nearly. The King's intention of going to Ireland, appeared by the preparations, that were ordered; but a great party was formed in both Houses to oppose it. Some really apprehended, that the air of that country would be fatal to so weak a constitution; and the Jacobites had no mind, that King James should be so much pressed, as he would probably be, if the King went against him in person. It was by concert proposed in both Houses on the same day, to prepare an address to the King against this voyage: So the King, to prevent the address, came to the Parliament, and acquainted both Houses with his resolution of going in person to Ireland, "and as I have (says he) already ventured my life for the preservation of the religion, laws and liberties of this nation, so I am willing again to expose it, to secure you the quiet enjoyment of them."

When the King had ended his speech, the Parliament was prorogued to the 2d of April, ^{1689.} but on the 6th of February was dissolved by proclamation. At the same time, a new one was summoned to meet the 20th of March (1). ^{Jan. 17.}

In this Session was passed the declaration of ^{Feb. 6.} Rights ^{Pr. H. C.} 11. 372.

(1) As to the honours and preferments conferred this year, his Majesty, at the beginning of November, was pleased to create Richard Lord Coote, Baron of Colony in Ireland, an Earl of that kingdom by the name of Revenue settled on the Princess of Denmark.

Pr. H. C. II. 367.
Burnet.

The affair likewise of the Princess of Denmark's revenue was now completed, which had been left unfinished the last Session. A motion being made for settling part of the publick revenue on the Princess, the House was divided into three parts. The Lord Eland, son of the Marquis of Hallifax, Mr. Finch and Mr. Godolphin, who spoke in favour of the Princess, insisted that 70,000 l. a year, was as little as could be allowed her, as it had been represented the former Session. Others were for reducing that sum to 50,000 l. and others again, who knew the King's inclination, would have the matter left entirely to his discretion. Mr. Hampden in particular alleged the danger of settling a revenue on a Princess, who had so near a claim to the crown, independently of the King, whose title was disputed by many malcontents; and supported his argument, by the example of the Queen, on whom it had been lately proposed to settle 100,000 pounds a year, but which was thought improper and therefore rejected, though her Majesty had no separate interest, from that of her royal Consort. This debate being adjourned to the next day, the King who was unwilling such an affair should be thus canvassed in Parliament, sent the Earl of Shrewsbury to the Countess of Marborough, Lady of the Bedchamber to the Princess, who told her "that he came from his Majesty who promised to give the Princess 50,000 pounds a year, if she would desist from soliciting the settlement by Parliament; and that he was confident, the King would keep his word: That if he did not, he was sure, he would not serve him an hour after he broke it." The Countess answered, "that such a resolution might be very right as to him; but that she did not see it could be of any use to the Princess." The Earl, to convince her of the reasonableness of what he proposed, added a great deal, which had no effect, and she desired him to attend the Princess herself, to which he consented. The Countess went to the Princess to acquaint her of the Earl's coming, and her answer to him was, "that she could not think herself in the wrong to desire a security, for what was to support her; and that the business was now gone so far, that she thought it reasonable to see what her friends could do for her." This answer was taken very ill both by the King and Queen. More particularly the Queen complained, that such a motion was made before the Princess had tried in a private way, what the King intended to assign her. The Princess, on the other hand, said, she knew the Queen was a good wife, submissive and obedient to every thing that the King desired; so she thought, the best way was to have a settlement by act of Parliament. The custom indeed had always been, that the Royal Family (a Prince of Wales not excepted) was kept in dependance on the King, and had no allowance but from his mere favour and kindness; yet in this case, in which the Princess was put out of the succession, during the King's life, it seemed reasonable that somewhat more than ordinary should be done in consideration of that. Accordingly the Commons addressed the King to settle 50,000 pounds a year on the Prince and Princess of Denmark, to which he consented. The blame of this motion was cast on the Countess of Marborough, as most in favour with the Princess: and it is thought, this greatly contributed to alienate the King from the Earl her husband, who was some time after dismissed from all his employments, as will hereafter be seen.

Whilst the Parliament was sitting, Ludlow, who upon the restoration, was excepted out of the general pardon in 1661, for having been one of the Judges of King Charles I. on some encouragement given him came into England to offer his service in the reduction of Ireland, where he had formerly commanded under Cromwell. Many were surpris'd at his coming, whilst there was an act of attainder against him, which he could not reasonably expect would be dispensed with in his favour. But no one was more alarmed at it than Sir Edward Seymour; for his seat and estate at Maiden-Bradley in Wiltshire, where he lived, had belonged to Ludlow, and came to him by a grant. It is no wonder therefore that he so strongly represented to the Commons, "how highly it reflected on the honour of the nation, that one of the parricides of that King, whose death the Church of England had justly dignified with the title of Martyrdom, should not only be suffered to live here, but also entertained with hopes of preferment." Upon this the Commons, at his motion, voted an address to the King to issue out a proclamation for apprehending Colonel Ludlow, and proposing a reward for such as should take him. Not content with making the motion, Sir Edward took care to present the address himself the next day (1), which, though the King complied with, it was observed that the proclamation was not published, till it was known that Ludlow was safely arrived in Holland with the Dutch Ambassadors (2). From Holland he returned to Vevey in the county of Vaux in Switzerland, which he had chosen for his retirement after he had left Geneva.

Hugh Broughton, Esq; Consul at Venice; Lancelot Stegny, Esq; Consul in the city and port of Oporto in the kingdom of Portugal; and Jamez Paul, Esq; Consul for the islands of Zant, Corfu, Cephalonia, and Theaca, with the other adjacent islands belonging to the Venetian territories, and the province of Morcia, &c. and Robert Goddshall, Esq; Consul at Seville, St. Lucar, and places adjacent within the kingdom of Spain. On the 13th of February, Sir Henry Godrick Knight and Baronet, Lieutenant-General of their Majesties ordinance, was sworn of the Privy Council; and on the 19th of March, a commission for the Lord High-Treasurer's place was given to Sir John Lowther, of Lowther

Bart. Vice-Chamberlain of his Majesty's household, Richard Hampden, Esq; (who was also made Chancellor of the Exchequer) Thomas Pelham, Esq; and Sir Stephen Fox; and Henry Guy, Esq; succeeded Mr. Pelham in his place as one of the commissioners of their Majesties customs.

(1) It would have been doubtless, more decent for Sir Edward to have got some friend to make the motion and present the address; but the doing it himself made people say, "He had a great deal of reason to do it, as well for Ludlow's crime as for his estate."

1689. Geneva and Laufanne. He had been warned out of Geneva by the Magistrates at the solicitation of the Dukes of Orleans, as the death of his friend Lisle (who was assassinated by three Irishmen) made him quit Lausanne. His life also had been attempted more than once, which probably made him chuse to live at Vevay, as a place of great safety, it being easy to know what strangers are in the town by reason of its situation (1). Here he lived to the 73d year of his age, and then died after a thirty-two years exile. He has left two volumes of memoirs, by which it appears that he acted upon a very different foot from Cromwell, whose usurpation he always detested, and to whom he was as much an enemy as to King Charles, his sole view being the establishment of a free Republick. He was a man of great courage and conduct, and unshaken in his principles.

Scotland.

Burnet.

During these proceedings in England, the rebels in Scotland having laid hold of the act of oblivion, and Colonel Cannon, with those under his command, retired to the island of Mull, several regiments were sent into Ireland to reinforce Duke Schomberg's army. The Highlanders upon this were encouraged to renew their excursions, burning and plundering wherever they came, and having gathered into a body of eight hundred men, under the Laird of Lochelly, they marched out of Inverlochy, thinking to have surprized Inverness, but were timely prevented. Mean while those under Colonel Cannon, though not otherwise considerable for their strength than by the inaccessible holds, in which they lurked, continued still in a body, and being pressed by hunger and want, made frequent depredations in the low lands, more like robbers than regular troops. To stop their progress, the Council of Scotland ordered General Mackay and Sir Thomas Livingstone to march northward with a proper force; and the Nobility, and all the rest of the inhabitants of the countries most exposed to their incursions, to put themselves in a posture of defence. On the other hand, Cannon endeavoured to engage in the rebellion several persons in Edinburgh, to whom he sent letters and a pardon from King James. But these being intercepted, and most of those, to whom they were directed, being already confined, they were immediately put under a closer restraint, and orders dispatched to secure the rest. This disappointment obliged Cannon to retire into Ireland, as finding his interest and authority sinking among the Highlanders, who immediately chose Sir Hugh Cameron for their leader, and he being born amongst them, and acquainted with their genius, knew how to govern them. Under this new chief the rebels renewed their incursions, which obliged King William to send Duke Hamilton into Scotland, to keep a vigilant eye over them, but notwithstanding all precautions, they received a considerable succour from without; for King James depended so much upon them, that though he had neither ammunition nor provision to spare, he caused two frigates to be fitted out at Dublin, laden with clothes, arms and ammunition, and sent them to his friends in Scotland, having besides on board them Colonel Buchan, Colonel Wauchope, and about forty officers more, who all got safe into the isle of Mull. This reinforcement so encouraged the Highlanders, that sometime after they ventured, to the number of fifteen hundred, to march as far as Strathspage in the county of Murray, where they expected to be joined by the other malecontents, whose number was considerably increased by the late prorogation of the Parliament of that kingdom. To prevent this junction, Sir Thomas Livingstone took with him eight hundred foot, six troops of dragoons, and two troops of horse, and fell so unexpectedly upon the rebels, that they betook themselves to flight, leaving near five hundred of their men killed upon the spot, and one hundred taken prisoners, and amongst them four Captains, with other inferior officers. After this exploit, Sir Thomas advanced immediately to the castle of Leitinday, commanded by Colonel Buchan's nephew; and having lodged a mine under it, quickly brought the garrison to surrender at discretion. Neither was Major Ferguson less successful in the isle of Mull, where he landed, and destroyed several places possessed by the enemy, forced them to abandon the castle of Dewart, and betake themselves to the hills. This broke all the measures, which had been taken for King James's interest in Scotland; and upon this, those who had engaged in Sir James Montgomery's plot, looked upon that design as desperate; yet resolved to try what strength they could make in Parliament. The Earl of Melville carried down powers, first to offer to Duke Hamilton, if he would join in the common measure heartily with him, to be Lord High Commissioner in Parliament; or, if he should prove intractable, as he really did, to serve in that post himself. He had full instructions for the settlement of Presbytery; for he assured the King, that, without this, it would be impossible to carry any thing. But his Majesty would not consent to the taking away the rights of patronage, and the supremacy of the crown. Yet Lord Melville found these so much insisted on, that he sent a person to the King, then in Ireland, for fuller instructions in those points. These instructions were enlarged, but in such general words, that the King did not understand, that they could warrant what Lord Melville did; for he gave them both up; and his Majesty was so offended with him for it, that he lost all credit with him, though the King did not think fit to disown him, or to cail him to an account for going beyond his instructions.

The Parliament of Scotland, which had been adjourned to the 27th of March, and from thence to the 15th of April, being met accordingly at Edinburgh (2), the Earl of Melville, as Lord vels, p. 265. Ludlow (says Addison) was a constant frequenter of sermons and prayers: but would never communicate with those either of Geneva or Vevay.

(2) "The spring, says the Earl of Beckarras, being far advanced, and the money that was laid on in the then last session of Parliament exhausted, this put the Prince of Orange to great difficulties, either to grant the extravagant demands urged by Sir James

1689. Lord High-Commissioner, made a speech to them, wherein he informed them of his Majesty's great regret, that he could not be present at their meeting, according to their desires, and his own wishes; and after having laid before them what his Majesty had done, to deliver them from the yoke, under which they groaned, he desired an assistance of money answerable to the expences, which his Majesty had been, and was still obliged to be at, to secure their religion and liberty; and lastly, he exhorted them to lay aside all animosities and private interests, and jointly to labour the settlement of the public affairs.

The Jacobites persuaded all their party to go to this Parliament, and to take the oaths; for many of the Nobility had before refused them, and would not own the King. Great pains were taken by Archbishop Paterfon, to induce them to take the oaths, though with a design to break them. It was thought by that means to have a majority in the Parliament, which they failed in, some of the Laity being too honest to agree to such advices. The party being therefore disappointed in this and other schemes, saw a necessity of desiring a force to be sent over from France. But this appeared so odious and so destructive of their country, that some of them refused to concur in it; others were not pleased with the answers, which King James had returned to the propositions they had made him. He had indeed granted all they had asked upon their own particular interests, and had promised to settle Presbytery; but he rejected all those demands, that imputed a diminution of his prerogative, in as firm a manner, as if he had been already placed on the throne again. Finding this answer of his so little to their satisfaction, they proposed to send him a second message. Upon this the Earls of Argyle, Annandale and Brair-

"James Montgomery and those of his party; or to let all the army, which consisted of near ten thousand men, be absolutely ruined for want of pay. The more the club-party saw him strained, the more they augmented their pretensions; and being in this necessity, he seemed to yield to their demands, sending my Lord Melville down with instructions to grant those things; yet only in case he could do no better, and saw imminent danger from your friends; which gave a pretext for yielding to several things in Parliament above his instructions, and contrary to the Prince of Orange's intentions, (this was after the treachery of some of our number, that had ruined all) and for which he would have been in disgrace, if the villainy of those, who made the discovery of what was intended for your service, had not brought him off, serving as a piece of absolute necessity for what he did. For several months before, the Parliament had been adjourned from time to time. This put the Fanatics, and those, who were to have their estates restored, in a mighty rage, that they began to doubt of his intentions, either to establish their religion, or to restore their estates to them. But seeing the Lord Melville was named Commissioner, and prepared to go down, they all took leave, most part very discontent, the Prince of Orange not having it in his power to satisfy the third part of these pretenders. Having ended their affairs at London, both sides halted down to Scotland, to secure their party. Such Members as had staid there was only Sir James Montgomery, who was the chief manager of this party, who for some weeks staid behind, and imparted his design to several of your friends there, who so believed him, and trusted so much to his understanding, that he had 1000 guineas given him by Mr. A—— to advance your interest. But the Marquis of A——, to whom Sir James had imparted all his intentions, got the carrying of them down, and made his own use of them, as shall be made appear. Of all that had passed among the club-party at London, and of their intentions to serve your Majesty, nothing was known in Scotland among your friends, until the Earl of Annandale and Lord Ross came down. They openly exclaimed against the usage they had met with from the Prince of Orange; but there was little notice taken of it, considering the unfitness of their tempers, until the whole set did the same. Their discourses made your friends hope some use might be made of their divisions; and so made them live more friendly with them than formerly. The Earl of Annandale, as he was always the most forward of his party, so in this he was the first, that proposed the whole affair to the Earl of D—— and me, then in the castle of Edinburgh. He said, that I, of all

"men living, had least reason to believe what he was about to tell me, considering how he had used me in the Convention, in leaving us abruptly, and becoming the most violent against us. He acknowledged his fault, and wished, that the blood of his body could wash off the stains of his past misdeeds both to his King and friends; and hoped, that these misfortunes should for the future serve as so many beacons to warn him to avoid the like in time coming: with a great deal more of this sort; which he spoke with so much passion and appearance of sincerity, that we were but too soon taken with it, and were the more easily deceived, as being glad to find any returning to their duty. He told us likewise, that he intirely confided in us, and put his life and fortune in our hands, without pretending any trust from us: Only desired we might live in friendship, until the Marquis of Abol, Duke of Queensberry, Earl of Arran, Viscount of Tarbat, and Sir James Montgomery, should come to town, who would inform us of all that had passed at London; and since they had received your Majesty's pardon for what was passed, and now venturing their lives to serve you, they expected all your friends would join in the common cause to ruin the Prince of Orange, and restore your Majesty.

"A few weeks after the Lord D—— and I had our liberty, my Lord Melville came down, and all the Parliament Members met, but were adjourned for a fortnight. This gave time to the club-party to be industrious with your friends, to come in and join with them for settling the peace of the nation, as they pretended; for any design for your Majesty's service was to be kept secret amongst a few. The difficulties were extraordinary, how to reconcile such different interests, tempers, and persuasions, as were that of your friends and the club party; for they both in the Convention and Parliament had been the most violent against your Majesty and your friends. Besides, their whole design at the bottom was for the height of violence and oppression; for their greatest quarrel at the Prince of Orange was, for not suffering them to go to all the extravagancies of their religion and revenge; which is so mingled together, that it is hard to know the one from the other. And they were likewise divided among themselves; for none, except James Lord Ross, Earl of Annandale, and Mr. O—— were to know of any resolution to serve your Majesty; and Duke Hamilton and his followers had no design but the ruin of the Lords Melville and Stair, and to get the Session filled with his own creatures, having at that time many law-suits in hand. But though they had all different designs, yet they all agreed in this, that nothing could be done, except your friends could be persuaded to join; without which they saw

Braidalbin withdrew from them. The Earl of Annamdale came up to the Bath, pretending ill health; and the Earls of Argyle and Braidalbin went to Chefter, pretending, as they said afterwards, that they intended to discover the whole matter to the King; but he had passed over to Ireland, before they got to Chefter. Montgomery, upon this, looked on the design as broken; and so he went, and reconciled himself to Earl Melville, and discovered the whole negotiation to him. Upon which the Earl pressed the King to grant a general indemnity, and gave Montgomery a pair to go to London; and wrote to the Queen in his favour. But the King was resolved to know the bottom of the plot, and particularly how far any of the English were engaged in it. So Montgomery absconded for some time in London, since he saw no hopes of pardon, but upon a full discovery. A warrant was sent to the Bath for the Earl of Annamdale, of which he had notice given him, and went up privately to London. Montgomery sent Mr. Ferguson to him, assuring him, that he had discovered nothing, and desiring him to continue firm and secret. But when he had certain notice, that Montgomery had discovered all the negotiation among the Scots, he cast himself on the Queen's mercy, asking no other conditions, but that he might not be made an evidence against others. He himself had not treated with any in England; so that, as to them, he was only a second-hand witness. Only he informed against Neill Payne, who had been sent down to Scotland, to manage matters among them. Payne was taken there, but would confess nothing. Upon the Earl of Annamdale's information, which he gave upon oath, the Earl of Nottingham wrote to the Council of Scotland, that he had in his hands a deposition upon oath, containing matter of High-Treason against Payne. Upon which it was pretended, that, according to the law of Scotland, he might be put to the torture; and that was executed with rigour. He resisted a double question, yet was still kept a prisoner; and thus was much cried out against as barbarous and illegal. Montgomery lay hid for some months at London; but when he saw, that he could not have his pardon, but by making a full discovery, he chose rather to go beyond sea; so fatally did ambition and discontent hurry a man to ruin, who seemed capable of greater things. His art in managing such a design, and his firmness in not discovering his accomplices, raised his character as much as it ruined his fortune. He continued in perpetual plots after this to no purpose. He was once taken, but made his escape; and at last, spleen and vexation put an end to a turbulent life.

The Earl of Melville had now a clear majority in Parliament by the discovery of the plot. Some absented

" Lord Melville's and Stair's party would be too strong for them, having all the profitable employments and Session in their hands.

" Sir James Montgomery undertook to manage this affair, pretending he knew the inclination of a great many of your friends, who would join with any party to ruin the Lords Melville and Stair, and keep public burdens to be employed in Parliament, and to oblige the Prince of Orange to establish the Session according to the claim of right voted in the convention, and to have an Habeas Corpus and freedom of speech in Parliament. These were the pretexts he made use of, which were so taking with the most bigotted part of them, that they doubted not to get these acts passed if we would join with them in all other demands; which were to have the Presbyterian government established at its height of power, the King's supremacy, and the committee of Parliament, called the articles (which was already voted in the Convention a grievance) taken away. This by the majority of them was believed at first to be all design, without knowing in the least, that it was only to make them disobliged at the Prince of Orange, if he should refuse their demands; and to try next, if your Majesty would grant them; for all Kings, just, or unjust, are alike to them.

" To all your friends it was very evident, how great an advantage might be had by joining with the violent party; for by that we thought ourselves sure of breaking their army, which consisted of about ten thousand men, and which must immediately be disbanded, when they saw the Parliament establish no fund, neither for paying their arrears nor subsistence. And all having gone in confusion, and your Majesty being then in Ireland, and the Highlanders in a better disposition to rise, it were easy to make a good use of their disorders.

" Sir James, in the first meeting we had with him, laid out the great advantages your interest would obtain, if this succeeded; the strength of his own party, and all the influence he had over them. He told us likewise of their sending a messenger to your Majesty, with assurances of their returning to their duty; but said nothing of the instructions, commissions, and pernicious advices he had sent along with them, believing undoubtedly it would " have hindered us from joining with them; for by this we should have clearly seen it was only trying to make a better bargain for themselves, that made them change parties, and not out of any sentiments of conviction for having done amiss. But though it was evident to us, what disorders we should make among our enemies, and what profit to your party by going into the Parliament; yet to join with our mortal enemies, only to make the one half ruin the other, and to take the oath of allegiance to an usurper, and to comply with them in things, that had always been against our principles, were so hard to get over, that some of us had great difficulties to overcome them; not even could any thing have done it but the great desire we had to be instruments of your Majesty's restoration, and ruin of your enemies.

" There were two things, that made us very willingly join with them, the Marquis of Abell and the Earl of Arran asserted your Majesty's knowing the design, and approving of it, so far as to be convinced at that time you thought it the greatest piece of service could be done you. Next, the Viscount of Tarbat assuring us particularly, that the Prince of Orange was fully resolved never to grant any of those demands, which he knew the club-party intended to propose in parliament, and being sure of their firm resolution never to grant any thing, except they obtained all they desired, we could not doubt to obtain all we pretended, which was the dissolution of the Parliament. Nor could it be imagined but Lord Tarbat wished it as well as we, though on different motives; for then he was entirely in the Prince of Orange's interest, and trusted more by him than any of the nation, inasmuch that at his coming from London he had a trull given him, that few subjects ever had the like; for he had a full power to make a cessation of arms or peace with the Highlanders, and to dispose of twenty thousand pounds sterling, as he thought fit, for the Prince of Orange's service, and three titles of honour to whom he pleased; and was to give account of all that passed in Parliament, and had full power to adjourn or dissolve as he thought fit. But though he had all this trust, and might dissolve the Parliament, when he pleased; yet he durst not ven-

1689. absented themselves; and others, to redeem themselves, were compliant in all things. The main point, by which he designed to fix himself and his party, was the abolishing of Episcopacy, and the setting up Presbytery. The one was soon done by repealing all the laws in favour of Episcopacy, and declaring it contrary to the genius and constitution of that Church and Nation; for the King would not consent to a plain and simple condemnation of it. But it was not so easy to settle Presbytery. If they had followed the pattern set them in the year 1638, all the Clergy, in a parity, were to assume the government of the Church; but those being Episcopal they did not think it safe to put the power of the Church in such hands. It was therefore pretended, that such of the Presbyterian Ministers, as had been turned out in the year 1662, ought to be considered as the only sound part of the Church. And of these there happened to be then threefold alive. The government of the Church was therefore lodged with them; and they were empowered to take to their assistance, and to a share in the Church-government, such as they should think fit. Some furious men, who had gone into very frantick principles, and all those, who had been secretly ordained in the Presbyterian way, were presently taken in. This was like to prove a fatal error at their first setting out. The old men among 1689. them, who by reason of their age or their experience of former mistakes, were disposed to more moderate councils; but the taking in such a number of violent men, put it out of their power to pursue them. These men broke out therefore into a most extravagant way of proceeding against such of the Episcopal party, as had escaped the rage of the former year. Accusations were raised against them: some were charged for their doctrine, as guilty of Arminianism; others were loaded with more scandalous imputations, but these were only thrown out to defame them; and where they looked for proof, it was in a way more becoming inquisitors than judges; so apt are all parties, in their turns of power, to fall into those very excesses, of which they did formerly make such tragical complaints. All other matters were carried in the Parliament of Scotland, as the Lord Melville and the Presbyterians desired. In lieu of the King's supremacy, his Majesty had chimney-money given him; and a Test was imposed on all in office, or capable of electing or being elected to serve in Parliament, declaring the King and Queen to be their rightful and lawful Sovereigns, and renouncing any manner of title pretended to be in King James.

Whilst these things passed in Scotland, the different parties in England were busy in influencing the elections of Parliament-men. There

The elections for the new Parliament in 1689 were in favour of the Tories.
Burnet.

"ture it; and though he had more enemies, that "were more afraid of its sitting than of any of your servants; yet he thought he could get it easier done,
"and with less hazard to himself, by the high hand
"of the club-party, which would have the same effect
"to secure himself, and enrage the Prince of "Orange at his enemies. These considerations made "him take more pains under-hand than any, to engage
"your friends with the club-party, and to get them "to come to the Parliament. To some, who "believed him, he said he designed nothing but your "service; but to others, that it was for the good "of the nation, by obtaining acts, that would be so "beneficial to it. Being thus made believe, that "your Majesty liked the proposition and hopes of doing
"what he designed, made us resolve, notwithstanding
"all our scruples, not only to join with the "club-party, but to use all our endeavours to persuade
"our friends and all those we had any influence upon,
"to do the like; which succeeded as we could wish;
"for most part of all, who had continued firm to "your interest, resolved to follow our example, without
"desiring to know the bottom of that secret correspondence
"we had with the club-party. Some there "were, that made difficulty, the Earl of H—, the Earl
"of L—, Lord O—, Lord S—, and the master
"of B—; but their reasons were rather or more "out of apprehensions of betraying and yielding to "the Prince of Orange, than any other scruples;
"though I doubt not some of them had their reasons,
"and so might they very justly, considering how
"nice a point it was. Others appeared resolved,
"and engaged fairly, but when the time of the sitting "down of the Parliament drew nigh, they absented
"themselves; which gave great encouragement to "Lord Melville and all his party to meet in Parliament,
"who were in such apprehensions of success before,
"that several times he was resolved to dissolve it, and "to take a venture of another. But when they saw,
"that several of your friends drew back, and had secured
"to themselves several votes, by dividing the office
"of every register into six, and giving each a vote,
"and one for a Treasurer Deputy, and by giving money
"to some, and promises of employments to others,
"they so strengthened their party, that they again

"took heart, and resolved to begin their Parliament,
"which fate down the 15th of April 1690. But notwithstanding
"all the finistrous courses, that were taken to procure votes,
"never were men in such apprehensions and fears, as were Lord Melville and all
"his friends; for they not only saw the danger of their "whole party, if they succeeded not, but immediate ruin
"to themselves from the Prince of Orange, to whom they "had so fairly undertaken. After that he had read over the "speech, that he had got made for him, and that his President
"the Earl of Crawford had made another, all taken from "the old prophets, which he applied to the occasion,
"as of Ezra and Nehemiah's building again the temple
"of Jerusalem, they brought in a vote about the election "of a Burgh, only to know their strength, which they "found above their expectation. They carried it but by six or seven,
"which makes a demonstration, that if those of your "friends, which engaged to us, had not failed, we "had outvoted them in that, and so consequently had "gained all our design; for it was firmly resolved among "them, that if they had lost that vote, though of no consequence,
"they would have adjourned the Parliament next day;
"but gaining it, they took heart. And that which befell
"your friends in the Convention, happened just again;
"for several, who pretended to be our friends,
"when they thought us strongest, left us immediately,
"and joined with the other party. Sir James Montgomery
"also failed, and several also he had engaged; he believing "his interest far greater with them, than truly it was.
"So from that minute we lost hopes of doing any good;
"but seeing we had once made such a step, we resolved
"to stay in the House, though it should be for nothing,
"but to hinder them from going on so fast in their design
"of forfeiting all those, who had appeared for your Majesty,
"and the giving money as soon as they intended,
"to support their forces and government. But never men
"made a more miserable figure in any meeting, than your friends
"did in this. After they saw themselves abandoned and "outvoted in every thing, they had nothing to do but "fit and hear Duke Hamilton bawl and bluster, according "to his usual custom, and then acquiesced to all
"that

1689. was a great struggle all over the kingdom. The Tories had taken care to publish a list of those who had voted for the Corporation-bill, in order to exasperate the persons that were to have been disgraced by it; and by that and other means they became by far the greater number in the new Parliament. One thing was a part of the bargain, which the Tories had made, that the Lieutenantcy of London should be changed; for upon the King's coming to the crown, he had given a commission, out of which the Tories were all excluded; which was such a mortification to them, that they said, they could not live in the city with credit, unless some of them were again brought into that commission. The King recommended it to the Bishop of London, to prepare a list of those, who were known to be Churchmen, but of the more moderate, and of such as were liable to no just exception, that so the two parties in the city might be kept in a balance. The Bishop brought in a list of the most violent Tories in the city, who had been engaged in some of the worst things, that passed in the end of King Charles's reign. A committee of council was appointed to examine the list; but it was so named, that they approved of it. This was done to the great grief of the Whigs, who said, that the King was now putting himself in his enemies hands, and that the arms of the city were now put under a set of officers, who, if there was a possibility of doing it without hazard, would certainly use them for King James. This matter was managed by the Marquils of Carmarthen and the Earl of Nottingham; but opposed by the Earl of Shrewsbury, who was much troubled at the ill conduct of the Whigs, but much more at this great change in the King's government. It was also a farther mortification to the Whigs, when the Commons in the next Parliament made an address to the King, thanking him for the alterations he had made in the Lieutenantcy of London.

The elections of Parliament went generally for men, who would probably have declared for

" that was proposed; and Sir James Montgomery and
 " Sir Jahn Dalrymple scolded like Kail-wives, that " rogue, villain, and liar were their usual terms;
 " These two were the chief managers of both sides;
 " Sir Jahn pretending to maintain the King's prerogative,
 " Sir James the liberty of the subject and claim of right. And though he was never bred for " such undertakings, yet with abundance of confidence
 " and eloquence he managed the affair, and he undoubtedly " put them to great straits; for the things he urged were very popular and agreeable to " the inclinations of many of the members. Notwithstanding
 " all disappointments we were still to make them break
 " among themselves, by proposing what we thought never " would be granted. But in this also, we were disappointed.
 " For my Lord Melville, to justify what he and his party had so great a desire " to do, but durst not adventure before, having got the pretext
 " of the imminent danger of the Prince of Orange by the secret
 " plots and contrivances of your Majesty's friends, yielded to all that was demanded
 " in his instructions; he was allowed to pass what acts of " Parliament he should think fit, and establish what form " of government they liked best.

" Several days past without daring to mention Presbytery,
 " though most there desired it; knowing, that it was contrary " to the Prince of Orange's inclinations, who feared the consequence
 " it might have in England. Besides, he liked best to have it undetermined, " till his affairs were better established, that he might keep
 " both parties in hopes. But Sir James in a fair set speech " spoke out what they all wished generally, but feared to name;
 " and that he knew there were instructions for settling religion;
 " and he said he thought it was a shame for that meeting,
 " that it was not done. But the reason was well known,
 " for some among them, to flatter the court, against their " own principles, had delayed it. He knew likewise some " were for one kind of government, some for another;
 " some were for a certain kind of Presbytery, called " Erasianism, like that of Holland. But he told them,
 " there could not, nor ought there any to be established
 " in Scotland, but the Presbyterians as it was in 1648,
 " which was the government in the world not only according " to the word of God, but best to disturb the extravagant
 " power of King's and arbitrary government, under which " they had groaned many years. This speech to us, that knew " his secrets, seemed a little extraordinary; but he excused " himself by being obliged to do so; otherwise he should " lose all credit with his party; and that it signified nothing,
 " since he knew, that Lord Melville never durst pass it,
 " though it came to be approved. This speech was approved
 " by the House, Numb. IX. Vol. III.

" and a Committee appointed to receive all the forms
 " of government, that should be brought before them,
 " and to report their opinion of them; and till this was ready,
 " they adjourned some days, during which Sir James
 " received from Ireland a return of his message with Mr. J—s. The first night he " opened alone a great black box with papers, where all the " commissions and instructions were; and then sent for the " Earl of A—e, Arran, and my Lord Ros, and told them the return
 " of all was come, but that he believed there were several things
 " among them would be improper to let the Duke of Queensberry,
 " Earl of L—w, B—ne and me see, though we were only those
 " of your friends, whom they had trusted with their message
 " these four times. After they had considered them all, made " up another box of such as they thought fit to shew, and sealed
 " it, to make us believe it never had been opened, and in a great haste Sir James desired " us to meet in the Marquis of A—le lodging; and after a formal " discourse of his endeavours to serve your Majesty ever since
 " he went up with an offer of the crown to the Prince of Orange,
 " and of the message he had sent to your Majesty, said, he was
 " now desired to meet with us to tell us, he had got a return;
 " and that there was a great bundle of papers come over;
 " but considering we were all of one interest, he would not
 " open it nor look on any thing till we did it all together,
 " and entreated we might meet that afternoon; and to shew the " intire trust he had in us, he would keep nothing that he " knew from us, but would shew what he received from the King.
 " The Earl of Arran excused himself from meeting,
 " pretending he was obliged to go out of town; but the true reason
 " was, he thought they had cheated him in not sending for " his commission to be General, as was agreed among them
 " at London. The Duke of Queensberry also excused himself,
 " so that none came but the Marquis of Aboll, L—w, Ros, B—ne, and myself;
 " Sir James brought in a black box, which was a burthen
 " to him to carry, which I looked upon and considered the " seals, because I always expected a trick from him. He told " us, he had brought all except a letter from your Majesty
 " to himself, without knowing, as he shall answer to Almighty God,
 " what was in the box, which none of us believed; for he " did quite change the packthread, and clapped on his own
 " seal, after he had opened the box, and shewn what he thought " fit to bring. We were all in a great confusion, to find,
 " that we had joined ourselves to such a crew that had so much
 " knavery to impose things on your Majesty, and so much
 " weakness to think they could bring about all your enemies

1689 for King James, if they could have known how to manage matters for him. The King made a change in the ministry, to give them some satisfaction: the Earls of Monmouth and Warrington were both dismissed. Other lesser changes were made in inferior places, so that Whig and Tory were now pretty equally mixed.

The Parliament
meets.
April 20.
Pr. H. C.
II. 373.
Barnet.

The Parliament being met on the 20th of March, the Commons, by the King's order, proceeded to the choice of a Speaker; and Sir John Trevor was pitched upon for that office. He was a bold and dextrous man, and knew the most effectual ways of recommending himself to every government. He had been Speaker to King James's Parliament, and in great favour with that Prince, by whom he was made master of the Rolls; and if Jefferies had stuck at any thing, he was looked upon as the likeliest man to have had the Great-Seal. He now got himself to be chosen Speaker; and was made first commissioner of the Great-Seal. Being a Tory in principle, he undertook to manage that party, provided he was furnished with such sums of money, as might purchase some votes; and by him began the practice of buying off men, in which the King had hitherto kept to stricter rules. But the King, though he hated the practice, saw it was not possible to avoid it, such was the corruption of the age, unless he would endanger the whole. 1690.

The Speaker being chosen, and presented the next day to the King, his Majesty made the following speech to both houses:

My Lords and Gentlemen,

"I AM resolved to leave nothing unattempted on my part, which may contribute to the peace and prosperity of this nation. And finding my presence in Ireland will be absolutely necessary for the more speedy reducing of that kingdom, I continue my resolution of going thither as soon as may be; and I have now called you together, for your assistance to enable me to prosecute the war with speed and vigour, in which I assure myself of your cheerful concurrence, being a work so necessary for your own safeties.

"In order to this I desire you will forthwith make a settlement of the revenue; and I cannot doubt but you will herein have as much regard for the honour and dignity of the Monarchy in my hands, as has been lately shewed to others. And I have so great a confidence in you, that if no quicker or more convenient way can be found for the raising

" of

"enemies to declare for you without any force. They were in no less confusion than we; finding we saw their folly in undertaking things they had not the least shadow of power to perform. They had promised to get all the Parliament to declare for your Majesty, and immediately meet in your name, and the Earl of A——le Commissioner, who was made a Marquis, and Sir James made Earl of A——r, Lord Rofs likewise an Earl, and all employments of Church and State, and army intirely put into their hands, and those of their friends, who were generally the greatest enemies to Monarchy.

"There were likewise great bundles of letters not directed, but left to their direction to be given to any of your friends they thought fit to trust; which indeed we thought a little hard to be put into their hands, who had been for fighting your Majesty, and also endeavouring to ruin us on your account. Besides what we saw, there were many other commissions, patents, and remissions, that were made publick by themselves, after they made their discovery to the Lord Melville. But though they were fond to get these commissions, when they came, they were confounded what to do with them. To keep them, they saw there would be no use for them, and they put them into a continual hazard: So it was resolved, that they should all be burnt, but their patent. Next, how to dispose of their messenger put them in a great disorder, which made the Earl of L——w carry him to his house some miles from Edinburgh, where, after he had staid some nights, he got from him all that Sir James had concealed. Notwithstanding Sir James wrote to Mr. J——s not to trust any of us with his message, but as far as he had already shewn; yet all was out before the letter came to his hands. Besides Mr. J——s had been but a few years in Edinburgh, yet he plainly saw all Sir James's projects were miserably founded; which made him beg to be employed back again to your Majesty. But few of us desired any more to do with Sir James or his messenger; for afterwards we had little meddling with them, though they extremely desired it, and that we should send back Mr. S——s with a blank sheet of paper, subjoining to be filled up when he came to your Majesty with our advice; which the Duke of Queensberry, L——w, B——w, and myself absolutely refused; which almost broke us intirely with them; and the more because some of our number complied with their desires. For the Earl of Arran not only did it himself, but also got the Lord M——y to do it also, though he had not been engaged with us in any of your concerns, but, on the contrary, we looked upon him as one of the principal destroyers of your affairs, both in the Highlands, and at the beginning of the revolution.

"In the Highlands your affairs had no better success than in Parliament; for General Buchan having come too near the enemy, Sir Thomas Livingstone, with a party of dragoons, surprized him at Cromdell, killed about an hundred, made several prisoners, and dispersed his whole party. When this news came to Edinburgh of a defeat, your friends repented their not embracing the offer of a cessation of arms made them by the Prince of Orange, which Tarbat had the management of; but not being desirous to appear above board himself in such a transaction, he proposed it to the Earl of B——e with the offer of five thousand pounds sterling if he could accomplish it; for the Prince of Orange was extremely desirous to have all settled before he went to Ireland. But the Earl of B——e would not meddle in such an affair without the consent of your friends at Edinburgh, who at that time would not hear of it. So the Earl of B——e very generously gave it over, though, besides the five thousand pounds sterling he had other considerable rewards offered him. So after this defeat we were all willing a treaty might be brought on again, considering, at least it would gain time, until the Highlanders put themselves in a posture of defence. The Prince of Orange was just then going to Ireland, which made the Earl of B——e endeavour to meet him, to get the cessation ended; but he was gone before he got to him; by which the Highlanders were left to the mercy of their enemies, who might have ruined them, if they had pursued the victory at Cromdell.

"Your friends at Edinburgh were in no better condition, being forced to sit in a meeting in the middle of their enemies, and hear them establish Presbytery, and rescind all acts, that had been any ways made for your intert, restoring all forfeitures and fines, (though transacted for) that was grant-

" ed

1690. " of ready-money, (without which the service
 " cannot be performed) I shall be very well
 " content for the present to have it made such a " fund of credit, as may be useful to yourselves,
 " as well as me, in this conjuncture; not hav" ing the apprehensions, but that you will pro" vide for the taking off all such anticipations,
 " as it shall happen to fall under. It is suffici" ently known, how earnestly I have endeavou-
 " red to extinguish, or, at least, compose all " differences amongst my subjects; and to that " end, how often I have recommended an Act of " Indemnity to the last Parliament. But since " that part of it, which related to the prevent" ing of private suits, is already enacted; and
 " because debates of that nature must take up
 " more of your time, than can now be spared
 " from the dispatch of those other things,
 " which are absolutely necessary for our com" mon safety; I intend to send you an Act of " Grace, with exceptions of some few persons
 " only, but such as may be sufficient to shew my " great dislike of their crimes, and at the same " time my readiness to extend protection to all " my other subjects, who will thereby see, that " they can recommend themselves to me by no
 " other methods, than what the laws prescribe,
 " which shall always be the only rule of my go" vernment.

" A farther reason, which induceth me to " send you this Act at this time, is, because I " am desirous to leave no colour of excuse to " any of my subjects for raising of disturbances
 " in the government, and especially in the time " of my absence. And I lay this, both to in" form you, and to let some ill-affected men
 " see, that I am not unacquainted, how busy
 " they are in their present endeavours to al" ter it.
 " Amongst other encouragements, which I " find they give themselves, one of the ways,
 " by which they hope to compass their designs,
 " is, by creating differences and disagreements
 " in your councils; which, I hope, you will be " very careful to prevent. For be assured, that " our greatest enemies can have no better instru" ments for their purposes, than those, who shall " any way endeavour to disturb or delay your " speedy and unanimous proceedings upon these " necessary matters.
 " I must recommend also to your confide-
 " ration an union with Scotland. I do not mean,
 " it should be now entered upon; but they
 " having proposed this to me sometime since,
 " and the Parliament there having nominated " commissioners for that purpose, I should be " glad, that commissioners might also be nomi" nated here to treat with them, and to see, if " such

" ed by your brother or your Majesty, for those, that " served you against them; and above all, their fore-
 " faulting those, who appeared for you in arms, ex" cept Sir William W—e, who was overlooked,
 " though they had as full probation against him as any " of the rest. And to finish our misfortunes, the most " considerable of that party we had joined, not only
 " left us, but betrayed us so soon as they saw proba" bility of effectuating their own designs, which was the " only thing they had still and all along aimed at, and " not your service, as they pretended.

" Some days before the Prince of Orange went to " Chester, I had notice given me by Mr. O—e, that " the Lord Refs designed to go to meet him, and " make a discovery of all he knew; which made us
 " send the Earl of L—w to him, to try, if he had " such inclinations. But he protested to the contrary
 " with great oaths. Some were inclined to believe " him, and others were for taking a sure way to " hinder his discovery, since their own lives and estates
 " depended on your affairs. But it was of so dange" rous a consequence, and so unjust, unless we had " great proof or suspicion, that most of us abhorred
 " the motion.

" A few days after, though he gave over his journey
 " to Chester, believing by what the Earl of L—w
 " said to him, that we suspected him, and so might " have way-laid him: Yet notwithstanding all his " renewed oaths he sent for one Mr. D—p, a " fanatic Minister, and revealed all to him, and also " told him, that he was under great troubles of " conscience, and desired his prayers to enable him " to open his heart to him. After long prayers, and " many sighs and tears, he told him all he knew.
 " God was thanked, as being the effect, Mr. D—p's " prayers being heard. The next morning he sent " the Minister to Lord Melville, to tell him, that he " had business of great importance to tell the Queen,
 " for which he desired a pass, and immediately had it;
 " and before he went, he told Melville in general,
 " that there were dangerous matters against the King
 " and Government, in which he had too great a " share, and for which he sought God's pardon, but " was denied, and was now going to seek it from the " Queen, to whom he would discover all he knew,
 " when at London.

" The first meeting he had with the Princess of " Orange, he told her the whole affair, and laid the " blame on Sir James Montgomery. When she had " heard all the history, she sent for the Earls of D—b

 " and Nottingham, that he might tell it all over again
 " before them. But when they came in, he denied
 " all he had said to the Princess; he never thought
 " she would make any other use of it, than to pre" vent the danger she and the King were in; but no" thing should ever force him to give evidence against " those he had been in friendship with. For this he " was immediately sent to the Tower, where he lay
 " for eight or ten months; nor could any thing ever " induce him to say more, though he had both
 " threatnings and all arguments to enforce him.

" It was no sooner known, that Lord Refs was " gone, but his errand was made publick. Mr.
 " D—p (according to the custom of his profession)
 " made no secret of his confession; which so much " alarmed Sir James Montgomery, that he resolved not " to be long behind him; for he saw himself ruined
 " by his violent party. He had been professing to all " of them all along principles so far to the contrary;
 " but to make a confession to his mortal enemy Lord
 " Melville, to seek mercy from the Prince and Princess " of Orange, who, he knew, abhorred him, were a " hard step; yet with a good share of confidence and " assurance of making a fine story of it to their ad" vantage, he doubted not to succeed with Lord Mel-
 " vill. He insinuated so far as to be trusted to go to " London, to tell his business himself; and to gain the " greater credit with Melville, he put into his hands
 " what letters he had received from the Queen, which " was a joyful sight to him, he ventured to touch
 " all the acts, (which was believed he could never do)
 " which were displeasing to the Prince of Orange,
 " though he was forced to please the club-party to put " them in his instructions, and several for which he " had no warrant, making the imminent dangers they " were in an excuse of all. In these letters were fe" veral promises of assistance from France, of men, " money, and arms. He likewise gave up the in" structions sent to the Earl of A—e, when he " should be commissioner to the Parliament. There " was never a word mentioned of their patents, and " remissions, which were sent to Duke Hamilton and " others of their friends.

" When

1690. "such terms could be agreed on, as might be
"for the benefit of both nations, so as to be "ready to be presented to you in some future
"Session.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

"I have thought it most convenient to leave
"the administration of the government in the "hands of the Queen during my absence; and "if it shall be judged necessary to have an act
"of Parliament for the better confirmation of it "to her, I desire you will let such a one be "prepared to be presented to me.

"I have this only to add, that the season of "the year, and my journey into Ireland, will "admit but of a very short session; so that I "must recommend to you the making such dis"patch, that we may not be engaged in debates,
"when our enemies shall be in the field. For "the success of war, and the more thrifty management of it, will both principally depend "upon your speedy resolutions. And I hope "it will not be long before we shall meet again,

"to perfect what the time will not now allow to
"be done."

Pursuant to this speech, the Commons immediately proceeded to settle the revenue, and make it a fund of credit for the supplies which were still wanted for the next campaign (1). Pr. H. C.
They began with voting a supply of one million two hundred thousand pounds, between that time and Michaelmas, of which two hundred thousand pounds was to be raised by a poll, and a million by a clause of credit in the revenue bills. Though the Whigs now as well as the Tories studied to court the King, by making advances upon the money-bills, yet he could not prevail to have the revenue settled for life, which he most earnestly desired. All he could obtain was, to have the hereditary excise settled for life, and

"When Sir James Montgomery came to London, he "was so cautious, as not to go near the Princes of "Orange, till he had assurance, that, in case they "would not agree in their terms, he should not be "detained, which was granted. But though he con"fessed most of all that passed of his transactions with "your Majesty; yet he would neither promise to be "an evidence, nor give his advice how things might "be prevented, (in which, to magnify himself, he "made the hazard much greater than it was) unless
"he were secure of a full pardon of all the crimes
"he should name, and then have a good employ"ment; pretending the lowness of his estate, which "was drained by the severity of the last government.
"The Princes of Orange would have willingly grant"ed all he demanded, and wrote to the Prince of "Orange in his favour, into Ireland. But some things "had passed betwixt the Prince of Orange and Sir
"James in private, which made the Prince to have "such an abhorrence of him, that he could not hear "of employing him. A remission he would have "granted, upon condition of his being an evidence;
"but that could not do Sir James's business. So he "absented, and a few months after did all he could "again to justify himself to your friends; which took
"not with a few. The Earl of A— quickly fol"lowed Sir James, yet went not to London, but lived
"privately at the Bath; which when it was known,
"there was a warrant sent down to bring him up;
"but one Mr. * who had been Mayor of the "town, helped him to escape. When he was come "to London, Mr. Ferguson maintained him privately
"for several weeks. At last he, wearied of lurking,
"sent for Mr. L—, whom Lord Melville kept then
"at London to do business in his absence, and told "him of the Mayor of Bath, and of Mr. Ferguson,
"that had entertained him; and signed a confession
"the most scandalous, that any thing of the name of "a Gentleman ever did; for he not only told what "had passed among us in publick, but the private "conversation he had with several of your friends, and "likewise of Payne, all that had passed between them
"at their first meeting; for which Mr. Payne was "put to the torture, and endured it with great cou"rage and constancy. And that which made his part
"more base, was, after Mr. Payne had escaped out "of prison, and fled to Scotland, thinking he should "be secure with the Earl of A—, he came to a "country-house, and was taken there by A—'s "own servants, and brought to Edinburgh, where,
"upon the Earl of A—'s confession against him
"in England, he suffered the utmost barbarity.
"The treachery of these three made all our friends
"at Edinburgh so concerned, though they were not "fully informed of their hazard, that most of them

"left it." Account of the affairs of Scotland, p. 121.

(1) Sir Charles Sidley, a Gentleman of great wit, made the following speech on this occasion against pensions and salaries, which is inserted here, not so much because it is thought very à propos at that juncture, but because it is mentioned with applause by most of the historians; "Mr. Speaker, we have provided for the "army; we have provided for the navy; and now at "last a new reckoning is brought us, we must like"wise provide for the lifts. Truly, Mr. Speaker, it "is a sad reflection, that some should wallow in "wealth and places, whilst others pay away in taxes
"the fourth part of their revenues for the support of "the same government. We are not upon equal "terms for his Majesty's service; the courtiers and "great officers charge, as it were, in armour; they "feel not the taxes by reason of their places, whilst "the country Gentlemen are shot through and through "by them. The King is pleased to lay his wants be"fore us, and, I am confident, expects our advice
"upon it. We ought therefore to tell him what "pensions are too great; what places may be extin"guished, during the time of the war and public ca"lamity. His Majesty fees nothing but coaches and "six and great tables, and therefore cannot imagine
"the want and misery of the rest of his subjects. He "is a brave and generous Prince, but he is a young "King, encompassed and hemmed in by a company
"of crafty old courtiers. To say no more, some "have places of three thousand pounds, some of six "thousand pounds, and others of eight thousand six "hundred pounds per annum, and I am told, the "Commissioners of the Treasury have one thousand "six hundred pounds per annum a piece. Certainly "public pensions, whatever they have been formerly,
"are much too great for the present war and calamity,
"that reigns every where else. And it is a scandal,
"that a government so sick at heart as ours is, should "look so well in the face. We must save the King's "money wherever we can; for I am afraid the war is "too great for our purses, if things be not managed "with all imaginable thrift. When the people of "England see all things saved, that can be saved;
"that there are no exorbitant pensions nor unnecessary
"salaries, and all this applied to the use, to which they "are given; we shall give, and they shall pay
"whatever his Majesty can want, to secure the Pro"testant religion, and to keep out the King of France,
"and King James too; whom, by the way, I have "not heard named this Session, whether out of fear, "discretion, or respect, I cannot tell. I conclude,
"Mr. Speaker, let us save the King what we can;
"and then let us proceed to give what we are able."

1690. and the customs to be continued only for four years, from the 24th of December next ensuing (1). The settling the revenue thus for a term of years, made it, as they said, a surer fund for borrowing money upon than if given for life: the one was subject to accidents, the other was more certain. Besides, it was taken up as a maxim, that a revenue for a short term was the best security that the nation could have for frequent Parliaments. However the King did not like this, and thought it strange that a jealousy should be entertained of him, who came to save religion and liberty, and King James so much trusted, who intended to destroy both. But being told that it was not of him but of his successors that the jealousy was entertained, and if he would accept the gift for a term of years, and settle the precedent, he would be reckoned the deliverer of future ages as well as of the present, he was persuaded to take the grant as it was made him. In all probability King James would never have run into those councils that ruined him, had he not obtained the revenue for life. The Commons granted likewise the poll-bill, with some other supplies, which they thought would answer all the occasions of the year. But as what they gave did not quite come up to what was demanded; so when the supply was raised, it came far short of what it was estimated at; so there were great deficiencies to be taken care of in every session of Parliament, 1690. which run up every year, and made a great noise, as if the nation was, through mismanagement, running into a great arrears.

The first great debate arose in the House of Lords, upon a bill that was brought in, acknowledging the King and Queen to be their rightful and lawful Sovereigns, and declaring all the acts of the Convention-Parliament to be good and valid. The first part passed with little contradiction, though some excepted to the words rightful, and lawful, as not at all necessary. But the other article, declaring the acts of the last Parliament to be good and valid, bore a long and warm debate. The Tories offered to enact, that these should be all good laws for the time to come, but opposed the doing it in the declaratory way. They said, that it was one of the fundamentals of our constitution, that no assembly could be called a Parliament, unless it was called and chosen upon the King's writ. On the other hand it was said, that whatsoever tended to the calling the authority of that Parliament in question, tended likewise to the weakening of the present government, and brought the King's title into question. That a real necessity, upon such extraordinary occasions, must supersede forms of law; otherwise the present government was under the same nullity. That forms were only rules for peaceable times; but in such a juncture,

(1) In order to have a distinct notion of the revenue, it must be observed, that the duties upon the exportation and importation of merchandizes crossing the seas, (for protection of trade &c.) were the most ancient tribute paid to our Kings, and distinguished by two different names, Customs and Prises, or Prisage.

PRISAGE was a duty payable for foreign commodities imported, not at any certain sum of money, but by taking such a part in specie, as the Kings thought sufficient for their own use, paying such a price as they thought reasonable, which was called the King's price. For wines it was the practice to take one tun in ten, or two in twenty; paying twenty shillings a tun, and the price of the prisage of other goods, was doublets in proportion. This duty was remitted by the mercantile charter, granted by King Edward I. to all merchant strangers, who in lieu of it gave him a duty of three pence in the pound (commonly called petty-customs) upon all native commodities exported over and above the great customs, and also upon all merchandizes imported, except wines; and upon all wines imported, two shillings for every tun; being the duty since called Butlerage.

CUSTOMS were the duty payable for native commodities exported, particularly wool, wool-fells and Leather, after certain rates; and from their antiquity were called great and ancient customs. But now, the word customs is used to signify the several duties which are payable on the importation, as well as exportation of all goods, and merchandizes whatsoever, and are always composed of two parts, tonnage and poundage.

TONNAGE was payable upon all wines imported after the particular rates, and according to the methods prescribed by the laws which granted this duty, being at first, no more than two shillings a ton, though in succeeding reigns it was very much increased.

POUNDAGE, was payable on all other merchandises imported and exported, according to the rates and values prescribed by the several laws, by which this duty was granted, being at first no more than six pence in the pound of the particular rates and values, though afterwards advanced to twelve pence in the pound. To this subsidy of tonnage and poundage, there was likewise, in the latter reigns, annexed,

No. 9. Vol. III.

A subsidy of WOOLLEN CLOTHS or OLD DRAPERY which was payable upon all woollen cloths exported, according to certain rates and proportions.

These subsidies after having undergone various regulations, were after the restoration settled on the foundations they now stand, and granted to King Charles II. for life. The first act passed for that purpose, was entitled "a subsidy granted to the King of tonnage and poundage, and other sums of money, payable upon merchandise exported and imported, referring to and enforcing a book of rates of merchandise, and according to which, the said duties were to be levied and collected."

This subsidy it called the old subsidy, or subsidy inwards consisting of two distinct parts.

The Clergy were excepted out of it, to soften the opposition, that might be made. But still the main body of the Tories declared, they would never take any such oath; and therefore opposed every step, that was made in it with a great vehemence: They insisted much on this, 'That when the government was settled, oaths were made to be the ties of the subject to it; and that all new impositions, were a breach made on that, which might be called the original contract of the present settlement. That things of that kind ought to be fixed and certain, and not mutable and endless. That by the same reason, that the abjuration was now proposed, another oath might be prepared every year; and every party, that prevailed in Parliament, would bring in some discriminating oath or test, such as could only be taken by those of their own side; and thus the largeness and equality of a government would be lost, and contracted into a faction.' On the other side it was urged, 'that this was only intended to be a security to the government during the war; for in such a time it seemed necessary, that all, who were employed by the government, should give it all possible security. That it was apparent, that the comprehensive words in the oaths of allegiance had given occasion to much equivocation; many who had taken them, having declared, as some had done in print, that they considered themselves as bound by the oaths only while the King continued in peaceable possession; but not to assist or support his title, if it was attacked or shaken. That it was therefore necessary, that men in public trusts should be brought under stricter ties.' The abjuration was debated in both Houses at the same time. The Whigs pressed the King to set it forward; alledging, that every one, who took it, would look on himself as unpardonable, and so would serve him with the more zeal and fidelity; whereas those, who thought the right to the crown to be still in King James, might perhaps serve faithfully as long as the government stood firm; but as they still kept measures with the other side, to whom they knew they would be always welcome, so they will never act with that life and zeal, which the present state of affairs required. At the same time the Tories were as earnest in pressing the King to stop the farther progress of those debates; that much time was already lost in them; and it was evident, that much more must be lost, if it was intended to carry it on; since so many branches of this bill, and so many incidents, that arose upon the subject of it, would give occasion to much heat and contest; and it was a doubt, whether it would be carried, after all the time, which was bestowed upon it, or not: That those, who opposed it, would grow sullen, and oppose every thing else that was moved for the King's service; and that, if it should be carried, it would put the King again into the hands of the Whigs, who would immediately return to their old practices against the prerogative; and that it would drive many into King James's party, who might otherwise adhere firmly to his Majesty, or at least be neutral. These reasons prevailed with the King to order an intimation to be given in the House of Commons, that he desired they would let that debate fall, and go to other matters, that were more pressing (1).

This gave a new disgust to the Whigs, but was very acceptable to the Tories; and it quickened the advances of money upon the funds, that were given. It had indeed a very ill effect abroad; for both friends and enemies looked on it as a sign of a great declension of the King's interest with his people. And his Majesty's interposing to stop further debates in the matter, was represented as an artifice only, to save the affront of its being rejected. The Earl of Shrewsbury was at the head of those, who pressed the abjuration most; and therefore, upon this change of counsels, thought he could not serve the King longer with reputation or success. He saw the Whigs, by using his Majesty ill, were driving him into the hands of the Tories; and he thought, that these would serve the King with more zeal, if he left his post. Besides, the credit, that the Marquis of Carmarthen had gained, was not easy to him. For these reasons he resolved to deliver up the seals as Secretary of State (2).

The King sent Dr. Tillotson, and all those, who had most credit with the Earl, to divert him from his resolution; but all was to no purpose. The agitation of mind, which this gave his Lordship, threw him into a fever, that almost cost him his life. The King pressed him to keep the seals, till his return from Ireland, though he should not act as Secretary; but he could not be prevailed upon.

The debate upon the abjuration lasted longer in the House of Lords. It had some variations from that, which was proposed in the House of Commons, and was properly an oath of a special fidelity to the King in opposition to King James. The Tories offered, in bar to this, a negative engagement against assisting King James, or any of his instruments, knowing them to be such, with severe penalties on such as should refuse it. In opposition to this, it was said, that this was only an expedient to secure all King James's party, whatever should happen, since it left them the intire merit of being still in his interests, and only restrained them from putting any thing to hazard for him. The House was so near an equality in every division, that what was

This, in great measure, shows how the House was divided at that time as to Tories and Whigs. Pr. H. C. II. 378.
(2) Bishop Burnet was the first person, to whom the Earl discovered this; he had the seals in his hand, when he told that Prelate of his resolution, who prevailed with him not to go that night. The Earl was in some heat; and the Bishop was afraid, that he might have said such things to the King, as would have provoked him too much. The Bishop therefore sent the King word of it; who was very much troubled at it. He loved the Earl; and apprehended, that his leaving his service at this time might alienate the Whigs more entirely from him; for now they, who thought the Earl before of too cold a temper, when they saw, how firm he was, came to consider and trust him more than ever.

An act to invest the Queen with the government in the King's absence.
May 20.
Pr. H. C.
II. 382.

The King having declared in his speech, his intention to leave the administration of the government in the hands of the Queen, and proposed the having it confirmed by an act, if judged necessary, a bill was accordingly prepared for that purpose, by which, the Queen was invested with the administration of affairs, not only during the King's being in Ireland, but whenever he should be called out of the Kingdom; with this restriction however, "that the Queen might be controlled by an order from his Majesty, while he was abroad." During the debates, the Queen seemed to take no notice of the matter, nor of those who had appeared for and against it. When this bill received the royal assent, an act was also passed for reverting the judgment on a Quo Warranto, against the city of London, and restoring it to its ancient rights and privileges. This bill had been projected by the Tories, and was intended to change the hands which then governed the city: But through haste or weakness of those, who drew it up, the Court of Aldermen was not comprehended in it. So that by this act, the city was fixed in their hands, who were generally Whigs.

The act of indemnity passed.
May 23.
Pr. H. C.
II. 383.

The bill of indemnity which had caused so many debates in every session, and had been so constantly and so earnestly recommended by the King, did at last pass both Houses. Of all the late instruments of popery and arbitrary power, thirty-five only were expressly excepted, and of them few or none were in the hands of the King's justice of the nation (1).

The King thought fit to put an end to the session with this act of Grace, and coming to the House of Peers for that purpose, made the following speech:

My Lords and Gentlemen,

"I have had such assurance of your good affections to me, that I come now to thank you particularly for the supply you have given me. The season of the year is so far advanced, that I cannot longer delay my going into Ireland; and therefore I think it necessary to have an adjournment of the Parliament. And though it shall be but to a short day, yet unless some great occasion require it, (of which you shall have due notice) I do not intend you shall sit to do business until the winter; and, I hope, by the blessing of God, we shall then have a happy meeting.

"In the mean time, I recommend to you the discharge of your duties in your respective counties, that the peace of the nation may be secured by your vigilance and care in your respective stations."

Then the Lord Chief Baron Atkyns signified his Majesty's pleasure, that both Houses should adjourn to the 7th of July; after which the Parliament was twice prorogued, twice adjourned, and then prorogued again (2):

When the bill of indemnity was sent down to the Commons, Mr. Baron Turton brought this message from the Lords:

"Mr. Speaker, his Majesty hath been pleased to send this bill, which the Lords have accepted and passed nemine contradicente, and now send it down to this House." Though the Commons immediately passed the bill; they demanded a conference, in which they intended to acquaint their Lordships, "that it is unusual for either House to acquaint the other by what number any bill before them do pass, and the introducing any alteration in the usual method of proceeding may be of dangerous consequences." But a stop was put to this affair by the adjournment.

(2) In this Session were passed,

1. An act for enabling the sale of goods distrained for rent, in case the rent be not paid in a reasonable time.
2. An act for discouraging the importation of thrown silk, except of the growth of Italy, Sicily or Naples.
3. An act to declare the right and freedom of election of members, to serve in Parliament for the Cinque Ports. Before this act, the Wardens of the Cinque Ports, claimed a right of nominating to each of the Cinque Ports one person to serve as a Baron or Member of Parliament.

The honours and promotions about this time, were as follows: The King created April 17, Richard Lord Viscount Lumley, Earl of Scarborough in the county of York; Henry Lord Delamere, Earl of Warrington, in the county of Lancaster; and Henry Lord de Grey of Ruthen, a Viscount by the name and title of Viscount de Longueville; and on the 1st of that month, the Lord Willoughby of Eresby, Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, was, by virtue of his Majesty's writ of summons, called up to the House of Peers. About the same time his Majesty named Admiral Terrington, Sir Ralph Delaval Vice-admiral, and Mr. Reek Rear-admiral, to command the red squadron of his fleet; and appointed Mr. Russell Admiral of the blue, with Sir John Asby Vice-admiral, and Sir Cloudesley Shovel Rear-admiral under him. On the 30th of May he constituted Richard Pyne, Esq; Sir Richard Reeves, Knt. and Robert Roclford, Esq; Commissioners of the Great Seal of Ireland, as also Commissioners of Oyer and Terminer, and General Goal delivery within the said Kingdom; and on the 3d of June, Sir John Trevor, Knt. To prevent any attempt against the peace of the nation, during his Majesty's absence, the Deputy-Lieutenants were authorised to raise the militia in case of necessity, and all Papists ordered to repair to their places of abode, and not stir above five miles from thence without leave. A proclamation was likewise published, for the apprehending of several disaffected persons, who, as his Majesty was informed, had conspired to raise a rebellion, and for that purpose had made provision of arms, and had lifted themselves into several regiments. But though many discoveries were made of the practices from St. Germain and Ireland, few were apprehended upon them, and those were too inconsiderable to know more than that many were provided with arms and ammunition; and that a method was projected for bringing men together upon a call. However, on the 5th of June, Sir John Cockran and Mr. Ferguson were seized on suspicion of High-treason and treasonable practices; Ferguson having returned to his old habits of disturbing the government, though he had been preferred by his Majesty to the place of House-keeper to the excise-office, worth near five hundred pounds per annum, with little trouble (1).

Burnet.

The day before the King set out for Ireland, he called Bishop Burnet into his closet, and seemed to have a great weight upon his spirits from the state of his affairs, which were then very cloudy. He said, that for his own part, he would either go through with his business, or perish in it. He only pitied the poor Queen, repeating that twice with great tenderness, and wished, that those, who loved him, would wait much on her, and assist her. He lamented the factions and the heats, that were in the Nation, and that the Bishops and Clergy, instead of allaying them, did rather foment and inflame them. He declared, that going to a campaign, was naturally no unpleasant thing to him; and he was sure he understood that better than how to govern England. He added, that though he had no doubt or mistrust of the cause he went on, yet the going against King James in person was hard upon him, since it would be a vast trouble both to himself and to the Queen, if he should be either killed or taken prisoner. Then he dismissed the Bishop, deeply affected with what he had said (2).

The King set out for Ireland on the 4th of June, and on the 14th landed at Carrickfergus, being attended by Prince George of Denmark, the Duke of Ormond, the Earls of Oxford, Scarborough, and Manchester, and many other persons of distinction; and the same evening went to Belfast, where he was met by Duke Schomberg, the Prince of Wirtemberg, Major-General Kirk, and other general officers.

As to the affairs of Ireland before the King's State of arrival, the camp at Dundalk was not the only place, which proved fatal to the English Army; for both officers and soldiers died in great numbers in their winter-quarters; so that about the beginning of the new year, several regiments were broken into others, and the officers continued at half pay, till provisions could be made for them in other regiments, whilst others went over into England to raise recruits. However, the sickness by degrees abating, Duke Schomberg, who took a fatherly care of such as survived, found them very much refreshed by the good provisions he had procured for them, and rather inclined boldly to encounter death in the field, than languish in their quarters. About the beginning of February, the Duke being informed, that the enemy was drawing down some forces towards Dundalk, and that they had provided magazines with a design to disturb his frontier garrisons, sent a considerable body of horse and foot that way, and marched himself, on the 11th towards Drummore to observe the enemy's motion. But the designs of the Irish lay, at this time, another way; for while the Duke was upon this expedition, Colonel Woolsey was informed, that they intended to fall upon Belvoir, a town, which that Colonel had taken from them not long before. Upon this Woolsey marched with great diligence from Belvoir with seven hundred foot and three hundred horse and dragoons, towards the enemy; but being acquainted with their numbers, and they having had notice of his approach, instead of surprising them, he was himself surprised, finding them nine thousand strong, and in a posture to receive him. However there being now no way to retreat either with honour or safety, he made his

(1) MS. letter of Mr. Richard Warre to Sir William Colts, from Whitehall, June 1690. Ferguson (says Burnet) was a hot and bold man, and naturally given to plotting; always unquiet and setting people on to some mischief. He was concerned in the plots in King Charles II's time; one of those that pressed the Duke of Monmouth to invade England, saying, it was a good cause, and God would not leave them unless they left him. He was afterwards, as will be seen, in plots both against King William and Queen Anne. He was at first among the Presbyterians, but being cast out, he went among the Independents, where his boldness raised him to some figure, though he was an empty man.

(2) How tender the King was of King James's person, appears from this instance. A proposition was made to him, that a third rate ship, well manned by a faithful crew, and commanded by one, who had been well with King James, but in whom he might trust, should sail to Dublin, and declare for King James. The person, who told Bishop Burnet this, offered to be the person, who should carry the message to King James, (for he was well known to him) to invite him to come on board, which he seemed to be sure he would accept of; and, when he was aboard, they should sail away with him, and land him either in Spain or Italy, as the King should desire, and should have twenty thousand pounds to give him, when he should be set ashore. The King thought this a well-formed design, and likely enough to succeed, but would not hearken to it, declaring, that he would have no hand in treachery; and alledging, that King James would certainly carry some of his guards and of his court aboard with him, who probably would make some opposition, and in the struggle some accident might happen to King James's person, in which he would have no hand. The Bishop acquainted the Queen with this, who shewed great tenderness for her father's person, and was much touched with the answer, which the King had made. Burnet II. 47.

1690. his men sensible of their common danger, and so animated them by his own example, that having engaged the Irish, he defeated them with considerable loss; pursued them as far as Carven where they had a little fort; set that town on fire; and in his return to Belurhat, took the castle of Killyshandra with a great booty of cattle. In the mean time Sir John Lanier, with a party of one thousand horse, foot, and dragoons, made an attempt upon Dundalk, took Bedloe castle, and about fifteen hundred cows and oxen; and Sir Cloudesly Shovel on Good Friday, took the only frigate King James had in his possession, in that Prince's own fight in Dublin Bay, notwithstanding all the opposition, that could be made against him by sea and land. But what afflicted King James more sensibly was, the loss of the castle of Charlemont, a strong place, chiefly by nature, as being seated upon a piece of ground in the middle of the Bay; and only accessible by two ways, which the Irish had partly broke down. This post being of great importance, Duke Schomberg resolved to make himself master of it, and succeeded in his attempt, partly by a stratagem. The garrison of that place, which for some time had been blocked up by the French regiments of La Caille and Cambron, being put to great straits for want of victuals, King James sent a strong detachment under Mac Mabone with provision to relieve it. Duke Schomberg being informed of this, ordered the blockade to let Mac Mabone pass with his convoy after a slight resistance, but to drive back all that returned from the castle. By this means the garrison, which had received but a slender supply of provisions, and were forced to feed their new guests as well as themselves, were soon reduced to greater exigencies than before; and by a vigorous prosecution of the siege forced at last to capitulate on the 13th of May. The next day they marched out to the number of eight hundred men; and the Duke, who was come to view them, seeing many women and children among them, asked the reason of it, since they could not but consume their provisions. He was answered, that the Irish were naturally very hospitable, and that they all fared alike. But the greatest reason was, that the soldiers would not stay in the garrison without their wives and mistresses; the Duke replied, that there was more love than policy in it. There were found in the place good store of ammunition, seventeen pieces of brass cannon, and two mortars; so that the enemy might have held out longer, if they had not wanted either courage or provisions. The same day that Charlemont surrendered, Colonel Woolsey, who had been considerably reinforced by a party of Danes, made himself master of the strong castle of Balingargy near Carven. Upon the loss of these considerable posts, the Irish quitted and burnt several castles on that side, and prepared to abandon Dundalk, Ardee, Castle-Blaney, and Carickmarck-Crofs.

In this situation was Ireland, when the King arrived there, who two or three days after he came to Belfast marched to Lisburn, where Duke

Schomberg kept his head quarters, and from thence to Hillsborough, where on the 20th of June he published an order, forbidding the pressing of horses, and the committing of any violences on the country-people; and having some cautious advices proposed by the general officers, he declared, that he did not come there to let the grass grow under his feet, but would pursue the war with the utmost vigour. He ordered therefore the whole army to encamp at a place called Loughbritland, where upon an exact review he found them to consist of thirty six thousand English, Dutch, French, Danes, and Germans, all well appointed in every respect. From Loughbritland the King marched his army to Dundalk, where he did not stay long, but upon advice, that the enemy had abandoned Ardee, immediately directed his march thither.

King James and his court had been so much elated with the news of the debates in the English Parliament, and of the distractions of the city of London, that they had flattered themselves with false hopes, that the King durst not leave England, nor venture over to Ireland; and the King had been six days landed, before they knew any thing of it (1). But no sooner had King James certain intelligence of his arrival, but he began to stir, committing the guard of Dublin to a body of Militia, under the command of Colonel Lutterel, marched with about six thousand French foot (old experienced soldiers lately come from France) to join the rest of his forces, which now amounted to almost an equal number with the King's, besides fifteen thousand, which remained in garrisons. After the junction, a council of war was held, wherein both French and Irish, were of opinion, that though they had a very advantageous post on the Boyne, yet their army being inferior both in number and in every thing else, they should put too much to hazard, if they should venture on a battle. They proposed therefore the strengthening their garrisons, and marching off to the Shannon with the horse and a small body of foot, till they should see how matters went at sea; for the French King had sent them assurances, that he would not only set out a great fleet, but that, as soon as the squadron, which lay in the Irish seas, to guard the transport fleet, and to secure the King's passage over, should sail into the channel, to join the grand fleet of England, he would then send into the Irish seas a fleet of small frigates and privateers to destroy the King's transports. This would have proved fatal, if it had taken effect; and the execution of it seemed easy and certain. It would have shut up the King in Ireland, till a new transport fleet could have been brought thither, which would have been the work of some months; so that England might have been lost, before he could have passed the seas with his army.

The destruction of his transports likewise must have ruined his army; for his stores both of bread and ammunition were still on board, and they sailed along the coast, as he advanced on his march; nor was there in all that coast a safe port

(1) A party of two hundred foot and dragoons, June 19, going from Newry towards Dundalk, to discover the enemy; fell into an ambuscade at a place called four-mil-house, and Captain Forbes being taken prisoner, 1690. port to cover and secure them. The King indeed reckoned, that by the time the Squadron, which lay in the Irish seas, should be able to join the rest of the fleet, they would have advanced as far as the mouth of the channel, where they would guard both England and Ireland. In expectation of this fleet of smaller vessels, to destroy the King's transports, it was that King James's officers were against bringing the war to a speedy conclusion. But in opposition to all their opinions, King James himself was positive, that they should stay and defend the Boyne. If they should abandon Dublin, they would lose their reputation, that the people would leave them and capitulate, and all their friends in England be also dispirited. Therefore he resolved to maintain the post he was in, and seemed pleased to think, that he should have one fair battle for his crown. He had all the advantages he could desire. The river was deep, and rose very high every tide: There was a morass to be passed after the river, and then a rising ground. But with all these advantages, he thought fit to order Sir Patrick Trant, the Commissioner of the Irish revenue, to prepare him a ship at Waterford, that in case of a defeat, he might secure his retreat to France.

On the 30th of June the King being informed, that the enemy had repassed the Boyne, ordered his whole army to move by break of day in three lines towards the river, which was about three miles distant from them; whereupon the advanced guards of horse, commanded by Sir John Lanier, moved in very good order, and by nine of the clock got within two miles of Drogheda. The King, who marched in the front of them, observing, that there was an hill to the east of the enemy, and north from the town, rode thither to view their camp, which he found to be all along the river in two lines. Here the King held a long consult with the Prince of Denmark, the Dukes of Schomberg and Ormond, Count Solmes, Major-General Sravvenmore, the Lord Sidney, and other great officers, who made all their observations upon the enemy. Among the rest Sravvenmore seemed to despise them, saying, they were but an handful of men, for he could not reckon above forty-six battalions, that lay encamped. But the King and Prince George justly answered, that they might have a great many men in the town; and that there was also an hill to the south-west, beyond which part of their army might be encamped. "However, added the "King, we shall soon be better acquainted "with their numbers." From this place the King rid on to the pafs at the Old-bridge, and stood upon the side of the bank within musket-shot of the ford, to take there a nearer view of the enemies situation; and some time after rid about two hundred paces up the river, nigh the west of all the enemies camp. Whilst the army was marching, he alighted from his horse, and fate down upon a rising ground, where he refreshed himself for about an hour; during which time a party of about forty horse advancing very slowly, made a stand upon a plowed field over against the King, and brought two field-pieces with them, which they planted at the corner of a hedge undiscovered. The King was no sooner re-mounted, but the Irish fired at him, and with the first shot killed a man and two horses very near him. This bullet was presently succeeded by another, which having first grazed on the bank of the river, did in its rising flant upon the King's right shoulder, took out a piece of his coat, and struck off the skin, and afterwards broke the head of a Gentleman's pistol. Mr. Coningsby, afterwards Earl Coningsby, seeing this, rid up and clapped his handkerchief upon the wound, while the King himself mounted again and kept on his pace, and only said, There was no necessity the bullet should have come nearer. The enemy seeing some disorder among those, who attended the King, concluded, that he was killed, and immediately set up a shout all over their camp, and drew down several squadrons of their horse upon a plain towards the river, as if they meant to pass and pursue the English army. Nay, the report of the King's death flew presently to Dublin, and from thence spread as far as Paris, where the people were encouraged to express their joy by bonfires and illuminations.

The King having got his slight wound dressed, mounted again on horseback, and showed himself to the whole army, in order to dissipate their apprehensions. He continued on horseback, without the least concern, till four in the afternoon, when he dined in the field, and in the evening mounted again, though he had been up from one in the morning. About nine at night he called a council of war, and declared his resolution to pass the river the next day; which Duke Schomberg at first opposed; and finding the King positive, advised, that part of the army, horse and foot, should be sent that night towards Slane-bridge, in order to pass the Boyne there, and so get between the enemy and the pass at Duleek. This advice, which if followed, would perhaps have ended the war in one campaign, seemed at first to be relished; but being afterwards opposed by the Dutch Generals, Duke Schomberg retired to his tent, where not long after the order of battle was brought him, which he received with discontent and indifference, saying, It was the first that ever was sent him. Lieutenant-General Douglas was to command the right wing of foot, and Count Maynard de Schomberg the horse, who were to march on early towards Slane-bridge, and other fords up the river, to flank the enemy, or get between their camp and Drogheda, whilst a body of foot were to force their way at the pass at Old Bridge.

On the other side, King James having also called a council, Lieutenant-General Hamilton advised him to send a party of dragoons to the ford, which was below the town of Drogheda, which the English either knew not of, or else did not regard; and all the rest, being eight regiments, towards the bridge of Slane. But King James said, he would send fifty dragoons up the river, which justly put Hamilton into great amazement, considering the importance of the place to be defended.

Towards the close of the evening the cannon ceased on both sides, when the King gave orders, that every soldier should be provided with a good stock of ammunition, and all to be ready to march at break of day, with every man a green bough or sprig in his hat, to distinguish him from the enemy, who wore pieces of white paper in their hats. The word that night being Westminster, the King rode in person about twelve at night with torches quite through the army, 1690. army, and then retired to his tent, impatient of the approaching day.

Battle of the Boyne.
July 1.

The expected day being come, about six in the morning Lieutenant-General Douglass marched towards the right with some foot, as did Count Schomberg with the horse; which the enemy observing, drew out their horse and foot to oppose them. King William's right wing was at first ordered to pass all at Slane; but upon better information from the guides, several regiments were commanded to go over at other fords between the camp and that place. When the horse approached the river, a regiment of the enemy's dragoons made a shew of opposing their passage; but being soon forced to retire with loss, the English got over, and advanced towards the enemy's main body, which they found drawn up in two lines. Hereupon Douglass drew up his detachment in two lines also; but having but six battalions of foot to twenty-four squadrons of horse, he sent for more foot; and in the mean time, according to the Earl of Portland's advice, the horse and foot were intermixed for their greater security. More foot being come up, this figure was immediately altered, and all the horse drawn to the right, whilst the foot moved towards a bog on the left, which lay between them and the enemy, and through which it was impossible for the horse to march. The Irish observing their motion, retreated in some haste towards Duleek, but were vigorously pursued by Count Schomberg.

Though the King was ignorant of what had passed between his men and the enemy, yet supposing, that by this time they were over the river, ordered three attacks to be made; the first at a good ford before a small village, where the Irish were advantageously posted. The Dutch regiment of foot guards took the river first at Old Bridge, wading to the middle, and being got over amidst the enemy's fire, without making halt, drew up in two files, and then fired upon the Irish, who not bearing the charge abandoned their intrenchments. But before the third battalion of that regiment had passed the ford, five battalions of the enemy advanced very boldly within pistol-shot of the Dutch, who received them so warmly, that they retreated with the loss of some men and one pair of colours. Upon this the Dutch marched beyond the village, and repulsed a squadron of King James's horse, that would have stopped their progress.

At the same time a squadron of General Hamilton's horse rode briskly to the very brink of the river, in order to oppose Sir John Hammer's and Count Nassau's regiments in passing it; and though they failed in that attempt, yet in their retreat they fell upon the French foot with such resolution, that part of them broke through La Caillemote's and Cambon's regiments, which wanted pikes to stem their furious career. But the Irish wheeling about through the village, to recover their own men, they were intercepted by the Dutch and Imiskillin foot, and most of them, after a stout resistance, cut in pieces. By this time the Dutch guards being advanced as far as the hedges into the open field, the Irish horse came down upon them again with greater numbers and redoubled fury; but the Dutch remained so firm and close, and other regiments coming to their assistance, that the Irish were forced to retire. Upon this a fresh squadron of horse advanced to support them, but were vigorously repulsed by the French Protestants and Imiskilliners. In the first of these onsets Monsieur La Caillemote received his mortal wound, and as he was carried back by four soldiers to the English camp, he encouraged those, who were crossing the river, by these words, A la gloire, mes enfans, a la gloire; "To glory, my boys, to glory."

In the mean time the Danes came up to the left, as did the Brigades of Hammer and La Meloniere on the right. The first were so valiantly attacked in front by Hamilton's horse, that they were obliged to give way, and some of them to repass the river. Duke Schomberg perceiving this disorder, and seeing the French Protestants were also left exposed without a commander, immediately passed the river, in order to head them, with so much hurry, that he could not be persuaded by Monsieur Foubert, one of his Aids de Camp, to put on his armour. He was no sooner on the other side, but he encouraged the French Protestants by this short harangue, Allons, Messieurs, voila vos persecuteurs; "Come on, Gentlemen; behold your persecutors," pointing to the French Papists in the enemy's army. These words were scarce out of his mouth, when fifteen or sixteen of King James's guards, who were returning full speed to their main body, after the slaughter of their companions, and whom the French refugees suffered to pass, thinking them to be of their side, fell furiously upon the Duke, and gave him two wounds in the head, which however were not mortal. Upon this the regiment of Cambon acknowledged their error, by committing a greater; for firing rashly on the enemy, they shot the Duke thro' the neck, of which wound he instantly died; and Monsieur Foubert alighting to relieve him, was shot in the arm. Not long before Dr. Walker, so famous for the defence of London-derry, received a wound in the belly, which he survived but some few minutes.

The King during all these actions might be said to be every where, since he directed all by his conduct; but now his courage was likewise to have a share in the honour of the day. His Majesty, accompanied by the Prince of Denmark, passed the river with the left wing of horse, and that with some difficulty; for his horse was bogged on the other side, and himself forced to alight, till one of his attendants helped him to get his horse out, and remount. As soon as his troops were over, and put in some order, the King drew his sword, (though the wound, which he had received the day before, made it uneasy for him to wield it) and marched at the head of them towards the enemy, who were coming on again in good order towards the English foot, that had now got over the pass, and were advancing bravely towards the Irish, though they were double their number. When these two bodies were come almost within musket shot of one another, the enemy discovered the left wing of the English horse moving towards them; at which they made a sudden halt, faced about, and retreated up the hill to a little village called Dunmore, about half a mile from the pass. The English marching in good order came up with them at this village, where the enemy returning courage, faced about, and made the English horse give way, though they had the King at their head. The King shocked at this, rid up 1690. to the Immiskilliners, and asked them what they will do for him? Their chief officer telling them, that it was the King who was doing them the honour to head them, they boldly came forward, and at the head of them the King received the enemy's fire, and then wheeling to the left to fetch up his own men again, the Immiskilliners, through a mistake, retired after him above an hundred yards. This made the King move to the left, to put himself at the head of some Dutch troops, that were advancing; while in the mean time the Immiskilliners growing sensible of their error, went on again successfully to the charge. In this place, Duke Schomberg's regiment of horse, composed of French Protestants, and strengthened by an unusual number of officers, behaved with undaunted resolution, like men, who fought for a nation, amongst whom themselves and their friends had found shelter against the persecution of France. At the same time another party, commanded by Lieutenant General Ginckle, charged in a lane to the left, but was soon overpowered by the Irish, and forced to give way. This being observed by a party of Sir Albert Cunningham's dragoons, and another of Colonel Levison's, the officers ordered the men to alight and line a hedge, as also a ruined house, that flanked the lane, from whence they fired upon the enemy. Ginckle continued in the rear of his men, endeavouring to make them maintain their ground, and was in some danger from the English dragoons; for the enemy being close upon him, they could not well distinguish. However the dragoons did a great piece of service by stopping the enemy, who came up very boldly; and the Dutch horse having the opportunity of rallying, as they did to the right, the enemy, after half an hour's sharp dispute, were beat back again with considerable loss.

On the other side Lieutenant-General Hamilton finding, that his foot did not answer his expectation, put himself at the head of the horse, which was likewise routed, and himself taken prisoner. When he was brought to the King, he was asked by him, whether the Irish would fight any more? Yes Sir, answered Hamilton, upon my honour, I believe they will. When he pronounced the word honour, the King looked disdainfully at him, and then turned about, repeating once or twice, your honour: intimating, that what he affirmed upon his honour was not to be regarded, since that was forfeited before by his siding with Tyrconnel; and this was all the rebuke the King gave him for his breach of trust.

In the mean time, Count Schomberg, who was now informed of his father's death, pursued the enemy with that zeal and spirit, which a noble and just resentment inspires, and drove them several miles beyond the village of Duleck, covering the ground with the slaughtered enemies. Nor did he desist, till the Earl of Portland, by the King's express command, obliged him to return to the place where the foot made an halt, and where they remained under their arms all night.

The King had reason not to regard what Hamilton told him; for, that General was no sooner taken, but the fight ceased on the side of the Irish; and Count Lauzun making up to King James, (who, during the whole action, stood with some squadrons of horse upon the hill called Dunmore,) represented to him how near he was being surrounded; adding, that he ought to think of nothing but a retreat, which he doubted not to make good with many brave officers then about him, and the remains of his French and Swiss troops. This advice King James was very inclinable to take; and therefore being attended by the regiment of Sarsfield, marched off to Duleck, and from thence, in great haste to Dublin; whilst Count Lauzun, Sheldon, and some other officers, disposed all things for a retreat, which they performed in very good order.

King James's whole loss in this battle was generally computed at fifteen hundred men, amongst whom were the Lord Dongan, the Lord Carlingford, Sir Neile O Neile, the Marquis D'Hocquincourt; and several prisoners, the chief of whom was Lieutenant General Hamilton, who, to do him justice, behaved with great courage, and kept the victory doubtful till he was taken prisoner. On the side of the English, fell about five hundred; an inconsiderable loss for the gain of so important a battle, had not the renowned Duke Schomberg been one of the number.

This great man was descended of a noble family in the Palatinate, and son of Count Schomberg by his first wife, an English Lady, daughter of Lord Dudley (which Count was killed at the battle of Prague in Bohemia in 1620, with several of his sons.) The Duke was born about the year 1608, and had for his godfather the unfortunate Frederic, Elector Palatine, who was afterwards King of Bohemia, and deprived of all his dominions. Forced by the calamities of his country, the Duke retired to Holland, where he served first in the army of the United Provinces, under Frederic Henry, Prince of Orange, and afterwards became the particular confident of his son William II, after whose death in 1650 he retired into France, where he gained so high a reputation, that, next to the Prince of Condé and Turenne, he was esteemed the best General in that Kingdom, though, on account of his firm adherence to the Protestant religion, he was not for a considerable time raised to the dignity of Marshal. In November 1659 he offered his service to King Charles II, for his restoration to the throne of England; and the year following, the Court of France being greatly solicitous for the interests of Portugal against the Spaniards, he was sent to Lisbon, and in his way thither passed through England, in order to concert measures with King Charles II. for the support of Portugal. He advised King Charles to set up for the head of the Protestant religion, which, he said, would keep the Princes of Germany in great dependence, and make him umpire of their affairs, and also by gaining him great credit with the Hugonots, keep France in continual fear of him. He advised him likewise to employ the military men, that had served under Cromwell, whom he thought the best officers he had ever seen. But above all, he advised him to keep Dunkirk, which would be a check both upon France and Spain. But in all these things his advice was rejected. When he came to Portugal he did such eminent services there that he was created a Grandee of that Kingdom, and Count of Mertola with a pension of five thousand pounds sterling to himself and his heirs. In 1673 he came over again into England, to command

Burchet.

On the 30th of June, the day after the battle of the Boyne, at eight in the morning the signal was made for battle; when the French bracing their head-sails to the mast, lay by; and about an hour after the Dutch Squadron, which led the van, began to engage part of the van of the enemy; half an hour after which our blue Squadron encountered their rear; but the greatest part of the red, which were in the center, could not engage till near ten; and as they were then at a considerable distance from the enemy, so was there a great opening between them and the Dutch. It was observed, that as the English bore down on the French, they lashed away, though probably that might be only to close their line; and afterwards several of their ships towed round with their boat until they were out of shot, so that it was hoped the advantage would have fallen on our side. But it was not long before it appeared, that the Dutch had suffered very much; and chiefly by their being, for want of a necessary precaution, weathered and surrounded by those French ships, which they left ahead of them, when they began to engage. No sooner did the Admiral perceive their condition, than he sent them orders to come to an anchor; and with his own ship, and several others, driving between them and the enemy, anchored about five in the afternoon, at which time it was calm; but judging it not safe to renew the fight at so great a disadvantage, he weighed at nine at night, and retired eastward with the tide of flood. On the 1st of July in the afternoon he called a council of war, in which it was resolved to endeavour to preserve the fleet by retreating, and rather to destroy the disabled ships, if they should be pressed by the enemy, than hazard another engagement by protecting them.

The French very indiscreetly pursued in a formal line of battle, whereas, had they left

every ship at liberty to do her utmost, the English would undoubtedly have been more roughly treated, especially the ships, which were disabled in the fight. But each shifting for herself, as it is natural to do in such cases, and caution being had in anchoring most advantageously with regard to tides, which the French took little or no notice of, the English got ground considerably of them. However, they pursued as far as Rye-Bay; and one of the English ships called the Anne, of seventy guns, was run on shore near Winchelsea, having lost all her masts, where two French ships attempting to burn her, the Captain saved them that labour by setting fire to her himself. The body of the French fleet stood in and out near Bourne and Painsey in Suffex, while about fourteen more lay at anchor, near the shore, some of which attempted to destroy a Dutch ship of sixty-four guns, that lay dry at low water in Painsey-Bay; but her Commander so well defended her every high water, when they made their attacks, that they at last thought it convenient to desist; so that this ship was got off, and safely carried to Holland. But it fared not so well with three others of that nation, which were on shore on that coast; for their officers and men not being able to defend them, they set them on fire; so that with the three ships destroyed by the French in the action, the States-General lost six of the line of battle.

On the 8th of July the French fleet stood towards their own coast, but were seen the 27th following near the Berry-Head, a little to the eastwards of Dartmouth, and then the wind taking them short, they put into Torbay. There they lay not long, for they were discovered the 29th near Phymouth, at which place very good preparations were made by platforms and other works, to give them a warm reception. The 5th of August they appeared again near the Ram-Head, in number between sixty and seventy, when standing westward, they were no more seen in the channel this year (1).

(1) This is Mr. Burchet's representation of the affair, but other accounts speak of it in a less favourable manner. Some original letters to Sir William Cole, then Envoy Extraordinary from King William at the Court of Hanover; reflect on it as follows:

Lord Paget, Envoy Extraordinary to the Emperor, from Vienna, Aug. 10. 1690. N. S.

"I hope the late good news of the King's successes in Ireland has made amends for the misfortune of our fleet. It is hard at this distance to guess where the fault lay; but if we may believe the Secretary of State, my Lord Torrington must be very criminal, since his printed letter to my Lord Dursley, (which I suppose is come to your hands,) has published him as such almost all the world over."

From Mr. R. Moleworth, Envoy Extraordinary to the King of Denmark, from Copenhagen, July 12, 1690, O. S.

"I am satisfied the Dutch have been most soundly beaten, and the French have gotten an intire though bloody victory, let us put what disguises on the matter we please."

From the same, July 22, 1690.

"My trouble at our unfortunate sea-fight was so great, and my confusion to that degree, that I had not the courage either to go to court, or to set pen to paper. And I think, if the news of the King's "conquest of Ireland had not raised my spirits, I should have continued a drooping recluse for many weeks. I hope the Englishmen in our country will be touched with as much shame for their miscarriage, as those here, who durst not show their faces; and then they will endeavour to repair this great loss of honour and reputation; which God grant may be soon. But this I can tell you, if some people's heads do not fly now, no foreign Prince or State will believe there is a King or Queen in England, no more than our subjects do, as it seems."

From Sir Paul Rycaut, Envoy Extraordinary at Ham-burgh, July 16, 1690.

"I cannot but condole with you the unfortunate success of the late sea-fight against the French, which turned not much to our damage, unless so far as concerns the honour of the nation, but greatly to the detriment and ruin of our allies, who were beaten to pieces, whilst we stood spectators of their destruction. What loss they sustained you will best see in the letter, which Admiral Everisford writes to the States, and what was the cause, that our fleet in general did not fight was (as this Admiral writes) upon examination by the Earls Pembroke and Devonshire, who were going from ship to ship to make inquiry into this matter, to discover where the treachery lay; for nothing but that could keep our fleet from engaging; and where to charge that, a letter written from my Lord Nottingham to my Lord

1690. The news of this advantage gained by the French at sea had no sooner reached London, but the fears of a descent created a general consternation, which immediately spread itself through the whole Kingdom. The Queen was not ignorant of the danger, but did all that was possible to conceal her own apprehensions, and to inspire her subjects with resolution. The Lord Mayor and Aldermen, and Lieutenant of the city of London were not wanting in this critical juncture to express their zeal and affection for the government. For attending her Majesty in Council, they declared the unanimous resolution of the city to defend and preserve their Majesties and their government with the hazard of their lives, and to the utmost of their power; representing to the Queen and Council, that the several regiments of the militia of the city consisting of about nine thousand men, were complete in their numbers, well armed, and well appointed, and ready to be raised immediately, and to proceed in their Majesties service. That the Lieutenantcy also had resolved, that six regiments of auxiliaries should be raised for the service; and that the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Common-Council would, by the voluntary contribution of themselves and other citizens, forthwith raise a large regiment of horse, and one thousand dragoons, and maintain them at their own charge in the service for a month or longer, if there should be occasion. And they desired her Majesty to nominate officers to command them. All which the Queen most graciously accepted, and was pleased to thank them for their readiness, loyalty, and zeal on this occasion; and to the last part answered, that she would consider of it, and appoint officers to command according to their ^{1690.} same time, to suppress the ^{From the} fears of a revolt in the West, an address was ^{tinners of} presented to the Queen by Shadrach Vincent, ^{of} Philis from above ten thousand tinners of Cornwall, giving all assurances of fidelity and obedience, and faithfully promising (notwithstanding the artifice and ill designs of disaffected men to "with draw them from their loyalty) an unalterable allegiance to their Majesties, owning and acknowledging their Majesties alone to be their lawful and rightful King and Queen, and disclaiming all allegiance to the late King James, or to the pretended Prince of Wales after him." Within a few days after, the ^{From Mid-} Deputy Lieutenants and officers of the militia for Middlesex and Westminster, made a solemn address and declaration, "That they perceived there were many mischievous and dangerous practices, consultations, and contrivances of Papists, and many others disaffected to their Majesties and their government; and that it was most notorious, that the French King, by confederacy with the late King and his adherents, had made a bold invasion of their Majesties dominion of the narrow seas, designing to destroy their royal fleet, and in consequence to bring the Protestants of this kingdom under his tyranny and cruel yoke of bondage. And therefore they hold themselves bound in duty to declare upon this occasion their deep sense, hatred, and abhorrence of the vile ingratitude of those Papists, and professed Protestants, who, notwithstanding their Majesties pardoning and protecting them, had by conspiracies with the late King's adherents, or by "their

"Dursey, translated with the consent of my Lord Dursey into Dutch, and inserted into the Courant for the better quieting and satisfaction of the people, doth plainly declare, and on whom the treachery is to be charged. All I have to comfort myself and all others in this matter, is, that Mr. Warre writes me under the 4th instant, that we should speedily have a better fleet at sea than before. And Dr. Achensby writes me on the 22^d instant from the Hague, that by this letter to my Lord Dursey, and the assurances, that Mr. Harbord was coming over from the Queen to the States, that the minds of the people were much settled; and that the Government loses no courage, for that the States of Holland on the 10th instant, and so did the States General on the 21st resolve, that a new Squadron with all expedition be put to sea; until which was done, all commerce was to be suspended. The States of Holland unanimously, and without so much as consulting their principals came to this resolution. God grant that we may correspond in like manner with them in England, God grant also, that there may be no treachery in Ireland, from whence we expect to receive great and good news by the next post."

From the same, July 19th, 1690.

"Now I am to congratulate and rejoice with you for the seasonable victory obtained in Ireland; which I hope will set all things right; and when our fleet is again repaired, and recruited, and set out once more to sea, we shall then assert again the sovereignty and dominions of the seas, which might have been done by the last battle, had not treachery defeated us."

Bishop Burnet's account is as follows.

— "On the day before the battle of the Boyne, the Numb. X. Vol. III.

"two fleets came to a great engagement at sea. The Squadron that lay at Phinewish, could not come up to join the great fleet, the wind being contrary. So it was under debate, what was fittest to be done. The Earl of Torrington thought he was not strong enough, and advised his coming in, till some more ships, that were fitting out, should be ready. Some began to call his courage in question, and imputed this to fear. They thought, this would too much exalt our enemies, and discourage our allies, if we left the French to triumph at sea, and to be masters of our coast and trade; for our merchants richest ships were coming home; so that the leaving them in such a superiority would be both very unbecoming and very mischievous to us. The Queen ordered Ruffel to advise both with the Navy-board, and with all that understood sea-affairs; and upon a view of the strength of both fleets, they were of opinion, that though the French were superior in number, yet our fleet was so equal in strength to them, that it was reasonable to send orders to our Admiral to venture on an engagement. Yet the orders were not so positive, but that a great deal was left to a council of war. The two fleets engaged near Brachy in Suffex. The Dutch led the van; and to shew their courage, they advanced too far out of the line, and fought in the beginning with some advantage, the French plying before them. And our blue squadron engaged bravely; but the Earl of Torrington kept in his line, and continued to fight at a distance. The French seeing the Dutch come out so far before the line, fell on them furiously both in front and flank, which the Earl of Torrington neglected for some time; and when he endeavoured to come a little nearer, the calm was such, that he could not come up. The Dutch suffered much, and their whole fleet had perished, if their Admiral Calemberg had not ordered them to drop 1690. "their murmurings against their Majesties and the present government, or by the refusal of the oaths of fidelity and obedience to their Majesties, assisted or abetted the late King in his claims and pretences of any right and title to the government of these realms, &c.

Measures taken by the Queen. Ken.

July 5.

Under these encouragements the Queen forgot nothing, that the most active prudence could suggest, as fit to be done in such a juncture, without hurry or a too visible concern. She published a proclamation, requiring all seamen and mariners to render themselves to their Majesties, with suitable rewards for coming in, and penalties for absenting. She gave out commissions to put the standing forces in a condition to oppose the enemy; and she ordered the militia in the western parts to be in a readiness of defending the coasts, and assisting the army. And to strike a terror into the conspirators with France, she published a proclamation for apprehending Edward Henry Earl of Lichfield, Thomas Earl of Aylebury, William Lord Montgomery, Roger Earl of Castlemain, Richard Viscount Preston, Henry Lord Bellasis, Sir Edward Hales, Sir Robert Thorold, Sir Robert Hamilton, Sir Thomas Oglethorpe, Colonel Edward Sackville, Lieutenant Colonel William Richardson, Major Thomas Soaper, Captain David Lloyd, William Pen, Edmund Elliot Marmaduke Langdale, and Edward Rutter; being persons, who had conspired with divers other disaffected persons, to disturb and destroy the government, and for that purpose had abetted and adhered to their Majesties enemies in the present invasion.

Nor was the Queen's care of affairs confined within her own dominions; for while she put herself in a posture of defence at home, she dispatched Mr. Harbord to the States-General, to let them know, how much her Majesty was concerned at the misfortune, which had befallen their Squadron in the late engagement, and at their not having been seconded as they ought to have been, which matter she had directed to be examined into, in order to recompense those, who had done their duty, and to punish such as should be found to have deserved it: That her Majesty had given orders for refitting the Dutch ships, that were disabled, at her own charge; and commanded, that all possible care should be taken of the sick and wounded seamen; and that rewards should be given to the widows of those, who were killed, behaving themselves bravely in the fight, to encourage others to do well for the future. Mr. Harbord likewise told the States, that the Queen had ordered twelve great ships to be immediately fitted out; and hoped the States would also do their utmost to reinforce their fleet in the conjuncture. And, lastly, he acquainted them with the King's happy success in Ireland. The States received this message with great satisfaction, and unanimously resolved to fit out immediately thirteen capital ships and six frigates.

During these transactions, the fleet was refitting with all possible diligence. The Earl of Torrington was sent to the Tower; and three of the best sea-officers, Sir Richard Haddock, Henry Killigrew, and Sir John Ashby were appointed joint-

"drop their anchors, while their sails were all up. This was not observed by the French; so they were carried by the tide, while the others lay still; and thus in a few minutes the Dutch were out of danger. They lost many men, and sunk some of their ships which had suffered the most, that they might not fall into the enemies hands. It was now necessary to order the fleet to come in with all possible haste. Both the Dutch and the blue Squadron complained much of the Earl of Torrington; and it was a general opinion, that if the whole fleet had come up to a close fight, we must have beat the French; and considering how far they were from Brest and that our Squadron at Plymouth lay between them and home, a victory might have had great consequences. Our fleet was now in a bad condition, and broken into factions; and if the French had not lost the night's tide, but had followed us close, they might have destroyed many of our ships. Both the Admirals were almost equally blamed; ours for not fighting, and the French for not pursuing his victory."

Mr. Byer tells us, that the Dutch having the vanguard, began the fight, as also did some of the English; but not being seconded by the rest of the English fleet, which unexpectedly stood away, several of the Dutch ships were either burnt, sunk, or disabled. And the English fared but little better, for such as engaged were very much battered. The fight continued from morning to evening, the Dutch maintaining their stations with so much resolution and obstinacy against the whole French fleet, which consisted of eighty two men of war, that they had much ado to escape being all destroyed. In this unequal fight they lost, among other officers, Rear-admiral Jan Dick, Rear-admiral Brackel, and Captain Nordel; and the English Captain Botham, Captain Pomeroy, with two Captains of the Marine regiments.

A Dutch author of the history of King William asserts, that in this action the French gained the victory, the Dutch the honour, and the English the shame; and adds, that the Court Martial was far from being unanimous in their opinions about the Earl of Torrington, some thinking him guilty of treachery, and others of cowardice only; though they all at length agreed to acquit him; and that the King was extremely dissatisfied with their sentence, and for that reason discarded some of the numbers of that Court from the service, together with two and forty officers of the navy, who were suspected to have been influenced by the Earl.

But the French writers give a different account of this action. Monsieur Fourbin in his Memoirs allows, the English and Dutch fleets to have been but eight and fifty ships of the line of battle; whereas the French had eighty; and observes, that though the English did not seem to have had so great a share in the action as the Dutch, it may be said, that for above three hours, the two fleets shewed a great deal of valour, and performed exploits worthy to be recorded in history. Father Daniel affirms, that seventeen of the English and Dutch ships, which were unmaimed, were run ashore upon the coast and burnt; and adds, that, to leave no doubt of the greatness of the victory gained by the French, Monsieur de Tourville, the Admiral of the French fleet, returning to sea sent a detachment of ships and gallies, with about fifteen hundred men on board, under the command of the Count D'Estrees, to make a descent upon England, and to burn twelve ships in Timmouth Bay. "These troops, continues he, being landed, forced an intrenchment defended by three pieces of cannon, plundered several houses, and burnt the vessels in the Bay, four of which were men of war, and the rest Merchant-men richly laden. This done, the troops were re embarked without the loss of a man, and they carried off the three pieces of cannon with other booty." But these four men of war, and eight Merchant-men richly laden, are said by our writers to be only three small vessels.

1690. joint-admirals to command the fleet. But it was a month before they could be ready. And in all that time the French were masters of the sea, and our coasts open to them. If they had followed the first conformation, and had fallen to the burning the sea-towns, they might have done much mischief, and put affairs in great disorder, for there were not then in England above seven thousand men. The militia was raised; and though the harvest drew on, so that it was not convenient for people to be long absent from their labour, yet the nation expressed more zeal and affection to the government than was expected; and the Jacobites, all England over kept out of the way, for fear of being insulted by the rabble. There were no great losses at sea; for most of the merchant-men came safe to Phymouth. The French stood over for some time to their own coast; and there were many false alarms of their shipping troops in order to a descent. But the French had suffered so much in the Netherlands, in the battle of Flerus, that they were forced, for all their victory, to lie upon the defensive, and were not able to spare so many men as were necessary for an invasion. It was thought strange that the French should hover so long and so quietly on the coast of England 1690. without making any farther attempts; but it appeared afterwards, that they were still in expectation of the effects of the conspiracy which was to have broke out the 18th of June. But the Jacobites excused their failing in that, because their leaders were generally seized, and they began to boast all over England, that it was visible the French meant no harm to the nation, but only to bring back King James, since now, though the coasts lay open to them, they did the country no hurt. This might have made some impression, if the French had not effectually refuted it. For they made a descent on a poor village called Tinnouth, which happened to belong to a Papist, and burnt it with a few fisher-boats, but the inhabitants got away, and as a body of militia was marching thither, the French made great haste to their ships. The French published this in their Gazettes which much pomp, as if it had been a great trading-town, that had many ships, with some men of war in port. This both rendered them ridiculous, and served to raise the hatred of the nation against them, for every town on the coast saw what they must expect if the French prevailed (1).

(1) About this time a remarkable pamphlet was published, under the title of "A modest inquiry into the causes of the present disorders in England, and who they are that brought the French fleet into the channel, described." The author charges the disaffected clergy (whom he calls the Lambeth holy club), with being the principal managers of the Jacobites plot for bringing the French into the channel. He alleges, "that the first step the Clergy made, was the writing against the taking the new oaths to their Majesties injoined them by act of Parliament; and the buzzing into the ears of their vetaries the unlawfulness of these oaths, and the continuing right of King James to the crown. That there being very few of the disaffected Clergy, that had the courage to lay down their places for the oaths, the next step of the plot was to cheat the world and their own consciences, with the ridiculous distinction of taking the oaths to a King de facto, and not de jure; which was as much as to say, that their Majesties were not lawful and rightful King and Queen of England, but de facto only, that is in English, downright usurpers. That this distinction did not only give scope to take the oaths to their Majesties, but also to pray for them by name in their pulpits; though some of more sincerity than the rest would not pray for them by name at all; and yet, to prevent any trouble from the law, they wisely prayed in general terms for the King and Queen which might be taken either for King James and Queen Mary, or King William and Queen Mary; and others of a more nice stomach yet would not pray for the King and Queen, but for the King and Royal Family. That the plot being lame, because the machines, that moved it, were debarred from the pulpit, it was found out, that the act of Parliament injoining the oaths to their Majesties, admitting of some favourable interpretation in law, upon the part of those, that only preached, but had no cure of souls; thereupon Dr. S. one of the greatest champions mounted the chair first, with the loud acclamations of the party, and, as an introduction to his sermon, gave his auditors an account of the happy discovery he had made of so great a blessing, as his having liberty to preach to them, notwithstanding the act of Parliament about taking the oaths. That he was followed by a great many, both in London and in the country, who partly by stealth, and partly by the pious zeal of some of their own sort of Church-Wardens, got up into the pulpit to trumpet up the people to a dissatisfaction with the government. That all these steps of the plot were backed with the HISTORY of Passive Obedience which was handed about in triumph among the party. That in this pamphlet are multered a great many expressions of English divines both antient and modern, although most of the citations be far wide of the question, and refer only to obedience to magistracy in general, and the unlawfulness of private persons rising up against the Government upon every frivolous pretence. That the next engine of the plot was the happy result of a kind of Oecumenic council of the whole party: the Liturgy of the Church of England must be laid aside, and a new one must be calculated for the meridian of King James's tottering fortune. That in this new Liturgy they prayed thus; restore us again the public worship of thy name, the reverend administration of Sacraments; raise up the former government both in Church and State, that we may be no longer without King, without Priest, and without God in the World. That when they came to pray for King James, the Jacobite club had exhausted their rhetoric and zeal in the following words; protect and defend thy servant our sovereign Lord the King; strengthen his hands, and the hands of all that are put in authority under him, with judgment and justice, to cut off all such workers of iniquity, as turn religion to rebellion, and faith into faction; that they may never prevail against us, or triumph in the ruin of thy Church among us. To this end, defend the King, bind up his soul in the bundle of life, and let no weapon formed against him prosper. Be unto him an helmet of salvation, and a strong tower of defence against the face of his enemies. Let his reign be prosperous, and his days many. Make him glad according to the day, wherein thou hast made him suffer adversity. Give him the necks of his enemies, and also every day more and more the hearts of his subjects. As for those that are implacable, clothe them with shame, but upon himself and his posterity (that is, the Prince of Wales) let the crown flourish. That the General Council having composed this new Liturgy, there were above ten thousand of them printed and dispersed up and down among the party, which they used in their cabals, laying aside a great part, and some times all the old liturgy. That there were many of the Holy club detached up and down to persuade monied people, who wished well to the cause, to contribute for the subsistence of King James's cashiered officers. That King William "being

to Warre.

The Earl of Torrington continued prisoner in the Tower till the next session, when he was brought to his trial. Several persons of quality, the Duke of Devonshire and Pembroke had been sent to Sheerness, to examine into the whole affair upon oath, in order to discover where the treachery lay. The Earl was permitted to make a speech in the House of Commons in defence of himself, in which he insisted on these three things; that the preparations for the fleet were very late; that the fleet itself was much inferior to the French fleet; and that he laboured under great want of intelligence. He excused his fighting, by alleging the orders, which he had received; and said, that it was against his judgment, and the judgment of the council of war. He was the house a draught of the line of battle, for explaining his arguments in justification of his conduct in the fight, and desired leave to deliver what he had to say in writing; which was granted. He reflected upon the councillors, and in a manner named the Earl of Nottingham as the person, who had suppressed some intelligence, or not sent it to him so timely as was necessary (1).

The Earl's affair was long discussed in the House of Lords. The form of his commitment was judged to be illegal; and the martial law, to which, by statute, all, who served in the fleet, were subject, being lodged in the Lord High Admiral, it was doubted, whether the Admiralty being now in commission, that power was lodged with the Commissioners. The Judges were of opinion, that it was; yet since the power of life and death was too sacred a power to pass only by a construction of law, it was thought the safest course to pass an act, declaring, that the power of a Lord High Admiral did vest in the Commissioners. The secret enemies of the government, who intended to embroil matters, moved that the Earl should be impeached in Parliament; proceedings in that way being always slow, and incidents being also apt to fall in, that might create disputes between the two Houses, which sometimes ended in a

“being resolved to venture his person once more for the safety of these Kingdoms, his journey to Ireland concluded upon, and the most and better disciplined part of the army to attend his Majesty, it was impossible to leave any considerable force behind him in his absence; and that the transportation of the Queen of Spain, and the convoy of the Straits merchant-men under Admiral Killegrew, had carried a considerable part of our fleet to the Mediterranean; and another part of it commanded by Sir Claude Shovel, was to attend his Majesty and the army to Ireland; so that the grand fleet was not to have been so considerable, as otherwise it would have been. That all these circumstances raised the courage of the plotters, who thought this the only time to put their design in execution. That in order to that, at one of their general meetings in London, where it was necessary that some of the Clergy should be present to do so pious a work, it was concluded to present a memorial in the name of the loyal and distressed subjects of England, (for so they named themselves) to his most Christian Majesty, humbly inviting him out of his unparalleled goodness, and for the affect in he always bore to oppress virtue, that he would assist them in restoring their lawful Kings, his ancient ally and confederate, to his throne, and, in breaking the yoke of usurpation, under which these three nations were at this time so heavily groaning. That there had been two or three memorials presented to the French King before this, besides a constant correspondence betwixt the French minister of state, Monsieur de Creilly and them. And the Clergy, who were the great contrivers and managers of this, and who by their profession are, for the most part, extraordinarily credulous of any thing they incline to, did really believe, that immediately upon the appearing of the French fleet, and the burning of ours, (which they thought as sure) there would certainly be a general insurrection through a great many places in the Kingdom, in order to join them at their landing, and to declare for King James.”

This pamphlet reflecting so highly on the Non-juring Clergy, the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Bishops of Norwich, Ely, Bath and Wells, and Peterborough, both in their own, and in the name of their absent brother the Bishop of Gloucester, published a paper, wherein they solemnly, and in the presence of God, protested against it. I. That these accusations cast upon them were all of them malicious calumnies and diabolical inventions. II. That they knew not who was the author of the New Liturgy, nor had any hand in it, neither did they use it at any time. III. That they never held any correspondence, directly or indirectly, with Monsieur de Creilly, or with any other Minister or Agent of the French King, and if any such memorial had been presented to the French King, they never knew any thing of it; and that they did utterly renounce both that and all other invitations suggested to be made by them, in order to any invasion of the Kingdom by the French. IV. That they utterly denied and disowned all plots charged upon them, as contrived or carried on in their meetings at Lambeth; the intent thereof being to advise how in their present difficulties, they might best keep their consciences void of offence towards God and towards Man. V. That they were so far from being the authors and abettors of England's miseries, that they did, and should to their dying hour, heartily and incessantly pray for the peace, prosperity, and glory of England; and should always, by God's grace, make it their daily practice to study to be quiet, to hear their crosses patiently, and to seek the good of their native country. They concluded, that as the Lord had taught them to return good for evil, the unknown author of the pamphlet having endeavoured to raise in the whole English nation such a fury, as might end in de-aviting them, (a bloody word, but too well understood) they recommended him to the divine mercy, humbly beseeching God to forgive him. And as they had not long since, either actually or in full preparation of mind, hazarded all they had in the world, in opposing Popery and arbitrary power; so they should, by God's grace, with greater zeal again, sacrifice all they had, and their very lives too, if God should be pleased to call them thereto, to prevent Popery, and the arbitrary power of France, from coming upon them, and prevailing over them, the persecution of their Protestant brethren there being fresh in their memories.” St. Tracts II. 95. Though the Bishops thus strongly asserted their innocence and resolution of bearing their crosses patiently, yet before the year was at an end, a plot was discovered in which they were deeply engaged as will be seen presently.

(1) “But if, says Mr. Warre, Under-Secretary to that Earl, he has no better arguments for himself than this last, they will not do much service; my Lord having not neglected one moment to dispatch such public business, as belonged to him, since the time he came into the office. And of this I am confident, that the greatest part of the members of both Houses are well satisfied, that my Lord has not been at all remiss in the discharge of his duty.” MS. letter to Sir William Colt, Envoy at Hanover, Nov. 14. 1690.

1690. rupture. This the King was apprehensive of, and though he was much incensed against the Earl, and had reason to believe, that a council of war would treat him very favourably, yet he chose rather to let it go so, than to disorder his affairs. The Commissioners of the Admiralty named a court to try the Earl, in which Sir Ralph Delaval presided, who had acted as Vice-Admiral of the blue in the engagement. The Earl is said to be tried with so gross a partiality, that it reflected much on the justice of the nation; so that if it had not been for the great interest, which the King had in the States-General, it might have occasioned a breach of the alliance between them and England. The Earl escaped with his life and estate, but much loaded in his reputation, some charging him with want of courage, while others imputed his ill conduct to a haughty fullness of temper which made him, since orders were sent him contrary to the advices he had given, to resolve indeed to obey them, and fight, but in such a manner, as should cast the blame on those, who sent him orders, and give them cause to repent it.

The King was greatly offended with his acquittal; whereof one mark immediately appeared in determining the Earl's commission; and it was expected, says Warre, "That his Majesty would express his resentment against those Captains of the council of war, who shewed their partiality by their behaviour at his trial." Affairs of Ireland.
Boyer.

Nothing put a greater check to the proceedings of the Jacobites, than the news of the victory at the Boyne, which was obtained the day after the misfortune at sea. There has been a notion spread among many people, that King William would not have hazarded a battle, but upon an express received that morning of the defeat of the fleet, which he kept secret till the action was over. But this is impossible to be reconciled to the circumstances of the time and place. However this be, the news of the King's preservation from the cannon-ball, and then of the victory gained the day after, was a great comfort under the agitations caused by the misfortunes at sea. When the Earl of Nottingham carried the news to the Queen, and acquainted her in a few words that the King was well, and had gained an entire victory, and that the late King had escaped, he observed her looks, and found that the last article made her joy complete, which seemed in some suspense, till she heard her father was safe. The Queen and Council, upon this sent to the King, pressing him to come over with all possible haste, since, as England was of more importance, so the state of affairs required his presence here. But these letters were soon followed by others of a very different strain, as will presently appear.

The affairs of Ireland after the battle of the Boyne.
Boyer.

Upon the defeat of the Irish at the Boyne, the King having refted his forces, sent, the next day after the battle, Monsieur la Mollioniere, Brigadier-General, with five battalions of foot, and four squadrons of horse, to invest Drogheda, where was a great magazine of stores. The Governor at first seemed resolute to defend the place, and received Monsieur la Mollioniere's summons with great contempt; but the King sending him word, "that if he was forced to bring his cannon before the place, he must expect no quarter;" the Governor confiding, that King James's army being defeated, he could expect no relief, accepted of the conditions offered him, and marched out with the garrison, which consisted of three regiments and some odd companies, having their baggage only, but leaving all their arms and stores behind them.

On the 3d of July the Duke of Ormond and Monsieur Auverquerque here and elsewhere, were detached with nine troops of horse to secure the quiet of Dublin. The next day the King, with the whole army, marched the same way, and on the 5th encamped at Finglas, within two miles of that city, where he was informed, that King James was embarked at Waterford with the Duke of Berwick, Mr. Fitz-James, the Lord Powis, Tyrconnel, and the French Brigadier, the Marquis de Lery: that some French ships being arrived at King'sale, many, who had fled from the battle were gone thither to embark for France: that the greatest body of the Irish were marched towards Athlone: that within six and twenty miles of Dublin there was not an enemy in arms; and that there could not be any where above five thousand together, whereof the French might be supposed to make three thousand five hundred: that three hundred of the Swis or Germans had deserted the enemy: that the town of Wexford had declared for his Majesty; and that Sligo was abandoned by the Irish.

On Sunday July 6th King William rode in a triumphant manner into Dublin, and went directly to St. Patrick's Church, the Cathedral of that Metropolis, attended by the Bishops of Meath and Limerick; and after the publick services were solemnly performed, Dr. King, afterwards Archbishop of Dublin, preached a sermon upon the power and wisdom of the Providence of God in protecting his people, and defeating their enemies. The Mayor and Aldermen waited on his Majesty, and the people endeavoured by all demonstrations of joy to express their just sense of their great and happy deliverance. In the afternoon the King returned to the camp, where the next day he published his royal declaration, "promising both his pardon and protection to all the people of the kingdom of Ireland, who either remained at home, or having fled from their dwellings, should the first day of August next repair to their usual places of abode, surrendering up what arms they had to such Justices of the Peace, as his Majesty should appoint. But as for the desperate leaders of the present rebellion, who had violated those laws, by which the kingdom of Ireland is united and inseparably annexed to the Imperial crown of England, who had called in the French, who had authorized all violences and depredations against the Protestants, and who rejected the gracious par-conduct, and said, he deserved rather to be recompensed than censured, since he had preserved the best part of the fleet from being totally destroyed. II. 193.

"don, which his Majesty offered them in his proclamation of the 22d of February 1688-9, "as his Majesty was now in condition to make them sensible of their errors, so he was resolved to leave them to the event of war, "unless by great and manifest demonstrations he should be convinced they deserved his mercy which he should never refuse to thole, "who were truly penitent."

*As if he were to the King

The King, as he had received the news of the battle of Flerus, the day after the victory at the Boyne; so on the day he entered Dublin, he had the news of the misfortune at sea to temper the joy, his own successes might give him. He had taken all the Earl of Tyrconnel's papers in the camp, and found all King James's papers left behind him at Dublin. By these he understood the design, which the French had of burning his transport-fleet; and among the Earl of Tyrconnel's papers there was one letter written to Queen Mary at St. Germain's, the night before the battle, but not sent. In this letter the Earl declared, that he looked on all as lost; and ended it thus, I have now no hope in any thing but in Jones's business. The Marquis of Carmarthen, some weeks before the King went to Ireland, had received an advertisement, that one Jones, an Irishman, who had served so long in France and Holland, that he spoke both languages well, was to be sent over to murder the King. And Sir Robert Southwell, who was Secretary of State for Ireland, found among Lord Tyrconnel's letters to Queen Mary, two remarkable ones; in the former of which he writes, that Jones was come; that his proposition was more probable, and more likely to succeed, than any yet made; but that his demands were high, if any thing can be high for such a service. In the latter he writes, that Jones had been with the King, who did not like the thing at first; but he added We have now so satisfied him both in conscience and honour, that every thing is done that Jones requires. Deagle, the Attorney-General of Ireland, had furnished this Jones with money and a poignard of a particular composition; and they fought long for a bible bound without a common-prayer, which he was to carry in his pocket, that so he might pass, if seized on, for a Dissenter. Some persons of great quality waited on him to the boat, that was to carry him over. He was for some time delayed in Dublin, and King William had passed over to Ireland, before he could reach him; but he was never heard of more, so that it is probable, that he went away with his money. A paper was drawn up of all this matter, and designed to be published; but, upon second thoughts, the King and Queen had that tenderness for King James, that they stopped the publishing to the world so shameful a practice.

On the 9th of July the King decamped from Finglas, and divided his army in two bodies; with the greater of which he marched to Crumlin three miles on the South of Dublin; and the other consisting of four regiments of horse, two of dragoons, and ten of foot, was sent towards Athlone under the command of Lieutenant General Douglas. The next day the King issued out a proclamation, to ease his subjects of "the great oppressions and abuses committed by his enemies in his Kingdom of Ireland, by coining and making current brass money of copper or mixed metal, and raising the value of it to an extravagant price, and to reduce the value of the said copper money to the value

"or standard of the like copper money former-ly current in Ireland." The King having left Brigadier Trelawney to command at Dublin with five regiments of foot and one of horse, advanced as far as Inchiquin, twenty two miles beyond Dublin, in his way to Kilkenny.

Douglas, with his detachment, having reached Athlone on the 17th of July, sent a drummer to summon it. But Colonel Grace, the Governor, a resolute man fired a pistol at the messenger, saying, that such were the terms he was for. Upon this answer, Douglas resolved to attack the place, though, it being strong by situation, and defended by a castle, his force was not answerable to his undertaking. However he immediately planted two field pieces to prejudice the enemy's guns, and ordered fascines to be made in order to fill up the ditch. Having finished a battery of six guns the besiegers made a breach in the castle, but it being both too small and too high for an assault, it was prudently laid aside. Notwithstanding this the firing continued very brisk on both sides; but the besiegers having lost Mr. Nelson their best gunner, and the cavalry suffering very much for want of forage; and at the same time it being reported, that Sarsfield was advancing with fifteen thousand men to relieve the place, Douglas held a council of war, wherein it was thought fit to raise the siege, which he accordingly did on the 25th, having lost near four hundred men before the town, the greatest part of whom died of sickness.

The King in the mean time moving Westward reached Kill-Kullen bridge on the 11th of July; and that morning passing by the Ness, and seeing a soldier robbing a poor woman, he was so enraged at it, that he first gave the fellow several blows with his cane, and then commanded, that both he, and some others guilty of the like crimes, should be hanged. Some people reflected on this action of the King, as mean in a sovereign at any time to lay hands upon his subject, and cruel to inflict a capital punishment on one, whom he had already corrected for his fault. But this severity struck the soldiers with such a terror, that the country was freed from all violence during the whole march to Commalin, Castle-Durmant, and so beyond Carlow; from whence the King detached the Duke of Ormond with a party of horse to take possession of Kilkenny, and so to secure the Protestants and other inhabitants of the adjacent countries from being plundered by the enemy, who by this time began to look behind, and committed great depredations. From Carlow the army marched on to Kells, thence to Lough-land-bridge, and so to Bennet-bridge; and on the 19th of July his Majesty was splendidly entertained at dinner by the Duke of Ormond at his castle of Kilkenny, which had the good fortune to be preserved by Count Lauzun with all the goods and furniture, and a cellar well stored. On the 21st the army encamped at Carrick, from whence Major General Kirk, with his own regiment, and Colonel Brewer's, as also a party of horse, was sent towards Waterford. Kirk being arrived before the place, dispatched a trumpet to summon the town, which at first refused to surrender, there being two regiments then in garrison. However their answer was so civil, that their inclinations were easily understood; for soon after they sent out to know what terms they might have, which were the same with Drogheda. But not liking these, they proposed some of their own, which were 1690. were rejected, and the heavy cannon drawn down that way, and some more forces ordered to march. The Irish being informed of these preparations, thought it advisable not to put themselves to extremities, and thereupon agreed to march out with arms and baggage on the 25th, and so were conducted to Mallow. The fort Dunannon, a place of strength, which commands the river of Waterford, was also surrendered to the King upon the same articles with Waterford; which last place was viewed by the King the day it was given up. Here he took care, that no persons should be molested: And among the rest the Lord Dover was admitted to a more particular protection as having formerly applied himself, when the King was at Trillick, by Kirk's means, to desire a pass for himself and his family into Flanders. The Lord George Howard likewise embraced the King's mercy.

On the 27th of July the King left the camp at Carrick, and went to Dublin, intending, as he was advised, to go over to England, but he found letters there of another strain. Things were in so good a posture and so quiet in England, that they were no more in any apprehension of a descent, so the King went to Chapel-Izard, and spent there some time to hear divers complaints, and redress several grievances. Here he likewise ordered a weekly fast, and published on the 1st of August a second declaration, to confirm the former, in favour of all poor labourers, common soldiers, country farmers, ploughmen, &c. and declaring withal, "that if " those of superior rank and quality, and also
" such as had borne office under his Majesty's " enemies, whether military or civil, should by " the 25th day of that month of August surren" der themselves to his obedience, and should be " content, during the rebellion of that King" dom, to betake themselves to such town or " city as should be assigned them, they should " be secure of their lives, and have the liberty
" of such town or city; and, if they were desti" tute and in want, should also have a subsistence
" allowed them, according to their respective " qualities. As to strangers of what nation so-
" ever, who had taken service in that Kingdom
" against him, he did further declare, that if " they should forsake the enemy, and come in-
" to his quarters within the time aforesaid, they " should not only receive his protection, whilst
" they were in the Kingdom, but forthwith have " passports given them to go directly home in-
" to their respective countries. But if these ma" nifestations of his grace and favour should " not be valued as they deserved; or if any " should persist in that barbarous and unchri-
" tian way of burning and desolation, which
" in some places had of late been practised, he " should hold himself discharged of those con" sequences and calamities, which must inevita" bly follow, since those who were obstinate " against his mercy, became the authors of their " own confusion. It was hoped, that the ful-" nefs of the pardon of the Commons in this and " the former declaration might have separated them " from the gentry; and that by this means the " latter would be so forsaken, that they would " accept of such terms as should be offered them.
" The King had intended to have made the pardon
" more comprehensive, hoping by that to " bring the war soon to an end. But the English
" in Ireland opposed this, thinking that the present opportunity was not to be lost of breaking the great Irish families, upon whom the inferior sort would always depend. In compliance with them the indemnity now offered was so limited, that it had no effect; for the priests, who governed the Irish with a very blind and absolute authority, prevailed with them to try their fortunes still; and the news of the victory, which the French had gained at sea, was so magnified among them, that they made the people believe that the French would make such a descent upon England, as must oblige the King to abandon Ireland.

About this time the King having a farther account from England, that the designs of the Limerick.
male-contents were discovered and prevented, the loss at sea repaired, and that the French had only burnt one small village in the West of England, and so gone off again; he returned to the army, which on the 4th of August he found encamped at Golden-Bridge, and by the 7th reached Carricklish, a place within five miles from Limerick, where he was joined by Douglas. The next day the Earl of Portland and Brigadier Stuart were detached toward Limerick with nine hundred horse, and twelve hundred foot, who advanced within cannon-shot of the town with little opposition from the enemy; and in the evening the King himself, accompanied by Prince George, Monsieur Overkirk, Lieutenant-General Ginckle, and several other great officers, went to view the posture of the enemy and the avenues to the town. On the 9th the whole army camped at five in the morning, and made their approaches in good order, two hundred horse and dragoons, with a thousand chosen foot, leading the van. The country being full of hedges and ditches, the pioneers were immediately employed to cut down the one first, and fill up the other; which being done the army advanced, and drove the enemy before them till they came to a narrow pass between two bogs, within half a mile of the town, which was not above a hundred and fifty yards, and this likewise full of hedges and other incumbrances. In this pass were lanes leading to the town, in the middlemost of which, being the broadest, stood the Irish horse, and to the right and left of it the hedges were lined with musketeers. The detached party of English foot was upon the advance towards the centre; the horse a little to the right of them, the Danes to the left, and the blue Dutch, with several English regiments, upon the right. Whilst these things were going on thus, the King ordered two field-pieces towards the left, where they could bear upon the enemy's horse, and fired from thence with so good success, that the enemy soon quitted that post. At the same time Colonel Earle led on his foot, who marched with so much bravery, though the enemy made a great fire through the hedge, that they forced them to retire, and continued their hedge-fight for two hours; driving the Irish under the very walls of the town, possessing themselves of two advantageous posts; called Cromwell's Fort, and the Old Chapel, and being hardly stopped there by the orders, which his Majesty sent them. The Irish upon this plied the English forces with their great guns, that killed some few men as they marched in, which the whole army did by five in the afternoon, and most of them incamped within cannon-shot. The Danes, according to their post, encamped

Orders were also given forthwith to plant four field-pieces on Cromwell's fort to play upon the town from the out-works.

The army being posted, August the 9th, the King sent a trumpeter with a summons to the town. A great many of the garrison were for capitulating; but Monsieur Boisseleau the governor, the Duke of Berwick, and Colonel Sarsfield, opposed it with much vehemence, saying, there were great divisions, and even an actual insurrection in England; that the Dauphin was landed there with a great army; and that the Prince of Orange would quickly be obliged to withdraw his forces thither. Upon this Boisseleau sent the trumpeter back with a letter directed to Sir Robert Southwell, Secretary of State, (to avoid the rudeness of addressing himself directly to the King without giving him the title of Majesty) importing, "That he was surprized at the summons; and, that he thought the best way to gain the Prince of Orange's good opinion, was by a vigorous defence of the town, which his Majesty intrusted him withal." About eight in the evening the King went to his camp, a little mile from the town, having been on horseback from five, in the morning, giving the necessary orders, and exposing himself amidst the greatest dangers, which the Prince of Denmark shared all along with him. The cannon played from both sides, and several of the enemy's shot fell near the King's tent, or flew over it. The same evening a party of dragoons was sent to the ford at Annagbeg, about two miles above the town, where six of the enemy's regiments of foot, three of horse, and two of dragoons, were posted on the other side of the river with a breast-work to cover them, who all fired upon the English, but neither killed nor wounded one of them. The advantage, which the enemy had, was such, that the English expected to have met with great difficulties in passing the river, which is very rapid, and the bottom stony; but in the night the Irish abandoned their station; so that Ginckle, who was commanded with a detachment to force his way over it, performed it the next morning, with about five thousand horse and foot, without any opposition. Two or three hours after the King himself went over the Shannon, and posted there three regiments of foot, with some pieces of cannon. Neither were the besieged idle; for all this while they were raising forts between the assailants and the Irish town; one to the south gate, and the other towards the east, which proved very serviceable to them, though not so great a disadvantage to the English, as the surprising of their train of artillery, which was coming up to join the army.

Some deserters, and amongst them a gunner, who got into Limerick, having given the enemy an account where the King's tent stood, and of those guns and other things, that were upon the road from Kilkenny, under a small guard, they played very briskly from the King's tent, which he was at last prevailed with to remove. Nor was this all, for on the 11th one Manus O Brian, a country Gentleman came to the camp, and gave notice, that Sarsfield, which a body of five or six hundred horse and dragoons had passed the Shannon in the night, nine miles above Limerick, and designed something extraordinary. Though several concurring circumstances, and Sarsfield's activity and resolution, which fitted him for such an enterprize, rendered this Gentleman's relation at least probable, yet little heed was given to it at first; and a great officer, instead of inquiring more particularly into the matter, interrogated O Brian concerning a prey of cattle in the neighbourhood; of which the Gentleman could not forbear complaining afterwards, saying, he was sorry to see general officers mind cattle more than the King's honour. However, after he had met with some acquaintance, he was brought to the King, who, to prevent the worst, gave order, that Sir Jahn Lanier, with five hundred horse, should march to meet the train. But wherever the fault lay, it was one or two in the morning before the party set out, and even then they advanced very slowly, till after they saw a great light in the air, and heard a strange rumbling noise, which some justly conjectured to be the train blown up. For the artillery having the day before marched beyond Cullen to the little old ruinous castle of Ballenedy, not seven miles from the camp, Sarsfield lurked all that day in the mountains; and having notice where and how the men, who attended it, lay, he took with him guides, that brought him to the very spot, where he fell in among them, before they were aware, and killed several of them, with many of the waggoners, and some country people, who were carrying provisions to the camp. The noise of the slaughter having awaked the officer, who commanded in chief, he ordered his men to get to their horses, that were a grazing, and put themselves in a posture of defence. But most of those, who endeavoured to fetch them, were cut to pieces, and the rest obliged to shift for themselves, so that there were in all about sixty men killed. The convoy being thus totally routed, the Irish gathered the carriages and waggons, with the bread and ammunition, and as many of the guns, as the shortness of the time would permit them, into one heap, and having filled the guns with powder, and placed their mouths into the ground, that they might thereby certainly split, they, at their going off, set fire to the heap, which was blown up into the air, with a most astonishing noise. The Irish got some booty on this occasion, but took no prisoners; only a Lieutenant of Colonel Earle's being sick in a house in the neighbourhood, was stript and brought to Sarsfield, who used him with civility, and told him, "If he had not succeeded in that enterprize, he would have gone for France." The party of horse, that was sent from the camp, came up in sight of the enemy's rear, after the business was over; but wheeling to the left to intercept them in their retreat over the Shannon, the Irish passed another way and got safe into Limerick.

The unwelcome news of this adventure occasioned great murmurings in the camp, and some warm words passed between Duke Schomberg, son to the late Duke, and the Earl of Portland, as if the latter, and Count Soimes, had neglected to send in time a detachment of sufficient strength to secure the train. Others said, that the King was altogether unconcerned at this accident, as having no real design to make an end

1690. the Irish war, but only to keep the enemy cantoned towards Limerick, and preserve the cantonment he made this summer (1). But these were ill grounded conjectures; and the siege was pursued. The trenches were opened on the 17th of August, and some great guns being arrived from Waterford, a battery was raised below the fort to the right of the trenches, which dismounted some of the enemies cannon. The same day the Prince of Wurtemberg, with the Major Generals Kirk and Tatteau, and Brigadier Bellefleur, with seven battalions, entered the trenches, advanced near three hundred paces, and made themselves masters of the redoubts. On the 18th, the trenches were relieved by Lieutenant General Douglas, the Lord Sidney, and Count Nassau, and Brigadier Stuart, who approached towards another strong redoubt of the enemy. Nor was the King less in danger than the rest; for in the thickest of the enemy's fire he rid up to Cromwell's fort, and as his horse was just entering the gap, he was staid by a gentleman, who came to speak to him, when, in the same moment there came a cannon-ball, that struck in the very place, and covered the King with dust. He took little notice of it, but alighting, came and laid himself down on the fort. On the 19th the trenches were relieved by the Prince of Wurtemberg, who advanced further towards the said redoubt, which the King ordered to be attacked the 20th. Douglas, Sidney, Nassau and Stuart, being then again on the guard, and the signal given about two in the afternoon, the English, to the number of one hundred and fifty, besides officers, and several resolute French volunteers, attacked the fort with undaunted bravery, and after an obstinate fight drove out the enemy, killing forty of them. About half an hour after the Irish made a great rally with near two thousand horse and foot, but were vigorously repulsed. The 21st, the trenches were carried on and finished, so as to hinder any more sallies. The next day the besiegers batter'd the enemy's high towers, from whence they fired into the trenches, and quite levelled them; and in the night threw several bombs and carcasses into the town, as they did the day following red-hot bullets, which set several houses and a magazine of hay on fire. All the batteries being finished and thirty pieces of cannon mounted on them, the trenches by the 25th were advanced within thirty paces of the ditch; a breach was made in the wall near St. John's gate, and part of the palisades on the counterscarp beaten down. On the 26th the engineers having assured the King, that there was a sufficient breach, and there being an impossibility to make it wider for want of bullets, he resolved, to take the town by mines; and in order to that, commanded the covered way or counterscarp

(which here was almost the same with the ditch,) and two towers that were on each side the breach, and contiguous to the wall, to be attacked the next day, and that the men should go no further, but lodge themselves there. Accordingly Douglas detached Monsieur de la Barthe, a brave experienced French Lieutenant Colonel, with nine companies of grenadiers, strengthened by an hundred French officers and volunteers, to begin the attack; which was performed with such bravery and success, that the enemy was soon dislodged from the covered way and the two forts. The assailants pursuing their good fortune, entered the breach with the runaways; and de la Barthe, with some bold adventurers, and above half the Earl of Drogheda's grenadiers, were actually on the rampart, and others, still more eager than the rest, went into the very place. This action had been decisive, if the engineers had made a lodgement in time, or if the Counts Solmes and Nassau would have suffered the detachment, that was to second the grenadiers, to go further that the counterscarp; for the Irish were all running from the walls quite over the bridge into the English town; but seeing that few of the English had entered the town, they rallied again, faced the assailants, and plied them so warmly, that several of them were killed, and many mortally wounded. Elated with this success, the Irish ventured upon the breach again, and the resoluteness of their women was so great, that they incessantly pelted the English with stones, broken bottles, and all such other instruments of destruction, as came next to their hands. The men, on their part, could not for mere shame be less valorous; so that after three hours unequal fighting, the English were forced to retire to their trenches. But this was not all; for during the heat of the action a Brandenburg regiment being with great bravery got upon the enemy's black battery, the powder happened to take fire, which blew up a great many of them. Besides, though Colonel Cuts, who was commanded by the Prince of Wurtemberg to march towards the Spur at the South gate, beat in the Irish, who appeared on that side, yet he lost several of his men, and was himself wounded; for he boldly advancing within half musket shot of the gate, all the men lay exposed to the enemy's shot, who lay secure within the Spur and the walls. The French Protestants the Dutch, and the Danes behaved themselves very gallantly in their respective posts; and the whole action, which lasted from three till seven, was very brisk every where, and cost the besiegers six hundred men killed upon the spot, and as many mortally wounded.

This disappointment, and the approaching ill weather, occasioned the raising of the siege of Limerick (2); for on the 30th of August the heavy

(1) Lanier, whom the King had sent to secure the convey, might have overtaken Sarsfield; but the general observation made of him (and of most of the officers who had served King Jama, and were now on the King's side) was, that they had a greater mind to make themselves rich, by the continuance of the war of Ireland, than their master great and safe by the speedy conclusion of it. Burnet, II. 58.

nary at the court of Hannover, gives the following account of the raising the siege of Limerick. "Nothing induced the King to quit the siege but the season of the year, and the nature of the country, which in those parts is so much subject to be overflowed, that the soldiers could no longer remain in the trenches in wet weather; and no art nor industry could remedy this mischief. The deserters do agree, that if the weather would have permitted the King to remain there a few days longer, the necessities and despair of the people in the town would have forced the officers

The King, after he had constituted the Lord Sidney and Thomas Coningsly, Lords Justice of Ireland, and intrusted Count Salmes with the command of the army, who soon after resigned it to Lieutenant General Ginckle, he embarked at Dunannon fort with Prince George of Denmark, and some other persons of distinction, on the 5th of September, and arrived safe next day in King's road near Bristol, and on the 9th at Windsor, where he was received by the Queen with that joy, which none but his own could equal.

The Earl of Marlborough's expedition to Cork. Story. Boyer.

Besides Limerick, there were still other towns in the possession of the Irish; and their army was yet very numerous, which gave King James's friends some hopes of the restoration of that kingdom to his obedience. But they were not a little surprized to hear, that the English fleet was arrived before Cork harbour the 21st of September, with some forces under the command of the Earl of Marlborough. When the English fleet was refitted, and the French retired to Brest, the Earl of Marlborough had proposed, during the siege of Limerick, that five thousand men who had lain idle all the summer in England, should be sent into Ireland, and with the assistance of such men as the King should order to join them, they should try to take Cork and King'sale. The King approved of this, and ordered the Earl to come over with them, and left orders for about five thousand more under the command of the Duke of Wirtemberg, and Major-General Scravenmore to join him. Accordingly the Earl immediately acquainted them with his arrival. The next day, in entering the harbour, he was opposed by the enemy, who had a battery of eight guns there; but he having sent three armed boats ashore, they by their quick firing obliged the Irish to quit their guns. On the 23d, the greatest part of the land-forces were sent up the passages, headed by the Duke of Grafton, six miles from Cork, and being come by the 24th within a mile of the town, they began to mount their cannon, having near six hundred scamen, gunners, and carpenters, who did them considerable service. There being a report, that the Duke of Berwick designed to raise the siege, Scravenmore sent a messenger to hasten the Duke of Wirtemberg's march; and on the 25th ordered a party of horse to go and cover the Duke's foot. The same afternoon Tetteau, with a party of one thousand men, having drawn some cannon to the Fair-Hill, resolved to attack one or both of the new forts and new Shannon castle; but the Irish no sooner observed his men posted in order to that design, but they set fire to the suburbs between him and them, and quitting both the forts and castles, retired in haste into the town. Upon this the English possessed themselves of Shannon castle, and planted there some guns. Scravenmore came about that time with twelve hundred horse and dragoons, and took up his quarters at Kill-Abbey. On the 26th the Duke of Wirtemberg with his Danes, and Brigadier la Melliniere with some French and Dutch foot, arrived and encamped before the town. Wirtemberg and Marlborough being both Lieutenant-Generals, there happened a warm dispute betwixt them about the chief command; Wirtemberg bluntly claiming it, because he was a Prince; and Marlborough with more temper, alledging, that the general command properly belonging to himself, both as the elder officer, and because he led the troops of his own nation; whereas the Duke of Wirtemberg was only at the head of auxiliaries. But la Melliniere interposing, the Earl was contented to share the command with the Duke, left his insulting on his full right should retard the King's service. Accordingly the Earl commanded the first day, and gave the word, Wirtemberg; and the Duke commanded the next, and gave the word, Marlborough.

This difference being adjusted, and the enemy on the 27th having abandoned their works at the Cat-Fort, without a blow struck, the English forces took possession of it; and having raised a battery there, they threw their bombs into the city, and played their guns upon the fort, from the Fryars Garden, and from another battery above the fort near the abbey. Besides, being masters of a Church, Scravenmore ordered a party of men into it, who from thence galled the Irish within the fort. All which, together with another battery set up by Red-abbey, soon made a breach in the city wall, and brought the besieged to demand a parley. Hoistages were thereupon exchanged, and a truce granted till next morning; when the besieged not accepting the terms offered, the besiegers began to play again very furiously with their cannon. A considerable breach being made, the Danes from the north, and four regiments of English from the south, under Brigadier Churchill, passed the river up to the arm-pits into the East Marsh, in order to storm the town. The Grenadiers under the Lord Colchester led the van, and marched forward with incredible bravery, though all the while exposed to the enemy's fire, being encouraged

"obliging the King to retire, that he did not meet

"by this means left to the mercy of the Irish, but "most of them withdraw to places within the army's

"the more unhappy for coming at the end of the "campaign, yet the progress the King has made to-

"would have been esteemed at first sufficient for one "year, and enough to render it a glorious campaign." And in another letter dated October 21. the same Gentleman writes thus: "I have endeavoured to in-

"loss to our men was, in gaining the redoubt, and "assaulting the counterescarp; the rest happening in "the trenches, where about ten men a day might "be killed. He computes the whole at a thousand "or twelve hundred at the most. He observed a "thing not unworthy your notice, that where a
"Colonel or Captain was deficient in his full num"ber of men, if he was ordered on service, he "would deliver in his loss, as if his regiment or com-

"not much greater than what I tell you." MS. p. 396.

(1) The

1690. raged by the Duke of Grafton, and some other resolute volunteers; but in the approach the Duke of Grafton received a wound in the shoulder, of which he soon after died (1). The van immediately posted themselves under the bank of the marsh, which was, as it were, a counter-scarp to the city wall; and at the same time the Salamander and another vessel came up with the tide, and lay at the end of the marsh, directly before the city wall, played their cannon at the breach, and threw their booms likewise into the city. All things being now ready, on the 28th of September, for a general assault, the besieged thought fit to prevent it by beating a second parley; and at last the Earl of Tyrone and Colonel Ricaut, being sent from Colonel M^r Ellicut, who commanded in the place, agreed to the Earl of Marlborough's conditions; which were, "That the garrison, consisting of four thousand men, should be all prisoners of war, both officers and soldiers: That no prejudice should be done to them, or to the inhabitants: That the General would use his endeavours to obtain his Majesty's clemency towards them: That all the arms, as well of the garrison as inhabitants, should be secured: That all the Protestant prisoners should be set at liberty: That the old fort should be delivered up within an hour, and the two gates of the city the next morning: And that an exact account should be given of the warlike ammunitions and provisions in the magazines." The prisoners of note taken at Cork were the Earls of Glencarty and Tyrone, the Governor of the place, Colonel Ricaut, and several other officers.

Animated with this success, the same day the Earl entered Cork, he sent a detachment of horse and dragoons, under the command of Brigadier Villiers, to summon the town and forts of King'sale. Upon his approach the Irish were ready to set the town on fire; but being prevented by the sudden arrival of the English, they retreated in haste to the old and new forts. The Earl of Marlborough set out from Cork on the 1st of October, arrived at Five-mile Bridge the same day, and the next before King'sale; and having formed his camp in the evening gave directions to make his approaches towards the new forts, while Tetteau was ordered to attack the old. The next morning early, Tetteau having passed the river in boats made a feint of storming the fort in the weakest place, where most of the besieged were ready to receive him; but in the mean while another detachment made a bold assault upon another place, where the enemy least suspected them, and by that means were soon masters of a bastion. At the same time several barrels of powder happening to take fire, whereby near forty of the Irish were blown up, the rest retired into an old castle in the midst of the fort, and immediately submitted to be prisoners of war, having lost about two hundred men out of four hundred and fifty. This business being over, the Earl of Marlborough sent to summon the new fort, which was much more considerable than the other; but Sir Edward Scott, the Governor, resolutely answered, "that it would be time enough to capitulate a month hence." Upon this the English on the 5th of October opened their trenches, and on the 9th had advanced them to the counter-scarp; but the ill weather hindered the coming up of the cannon till the 11th when part of it arrived. The 12th in the morning six pieces were mounted at the Danes attack, and two mortars at the English, which fired all that day. The 13th two twenty four pounders were placed on the same battery; and the next day the rest of the cannon arrived, three of which were mounted on the English battery. And the Danes, commanded by Wurtemberg, having made a considerable breach, the night following, to disturb the enemy, they made a false attack. The 15th the cannon continued to play all the morning; and all things were preparing for a storm, when the enemy beat a parley. Hostages being exchanged, the articles were agreed on and signed about midnight, by which the middle-bastion was to be delivered up the next morning, and the garrison, consisting of about one thousand one hundred men, was to march the next day after, with arms and baggage, and be conducted to Limerick. The loss of the English before this place was little less than three hundred men killed or wounded; which yet was of no moment, considering the great advantage they gained by subduing this sea-port town, and that of Cork; for by this means a stop was put to all supplies from France, at least on this side of Ireland; and the Irish were almost confined to the Province of Ulster, where they had great difficulty to subsist. The Earl of Marlborough having performed this glorious expedition in thirty seven days, embarked again for England, and arrived at Kensington the 28th of October, where he was received with great civility by their Majesties; and the King was heard to say, that he knew no man so fit for a General, who had seen so few campaigns. Aboard the ships which came back with the Earl of Marlborough, were brought prisoners, the Earls of Glencarty and Tyrone, the Lord Carme, Colonel M^r Ellicut, and other officers of note.

During these proceedings, Count LAUZUN The with the French troops, lay about Galway, without attempting any thing. He sent over to the Court of France an account of the desperate state of their affairs, and desired, that ships might be sent for the transporting of their forces. This was done, yet the ships came not till the siege of Limerick was raised; and probably, if the Court of France had known how much the state of affairs was altered by that event, they would have sent contrary orders. But Lauzun was weary of the service, and was glad to get out of it; and therefore failed away without staying for new orders, leaving the general command of the Irish forces to the Duke of Berwick, which was afterwards given to Monsieur St. Ruth. this conduct Count Lanzan lost the little reputation, which he was beginning to recover at the Court of France. Tyrconnel went over with him, and gave full assurances, that though the Irish were like to suffer great hardships the next winter, yet they would continue firm, if they were still supported by France. And as it had appeared on many occasions, that the French and Irish soldiers did not agree well together, he proposed, that no more soldiers, but only a number of good officers, together with arms, ammunition, and clothes, might be sent over to them. In the mean while the Irish tormented themselves into many bodies, which by a new name were called Rapparees; who knowing all the ways, and the bogs, and other places of retreat in Ireland, and being favoured by the Irish, that had submitted to the King, robbed and burnt houses in many places of the country; while the King's army studied their own ease in their quarters, more than the protection of the inhabitants. And many of them were suspected of robbing in their turn, though the Rapparees bore the blame of all. However, between them the inhabitants were dreadfully harassed, and their stock of cattle and corn was almost quite destroyed in many places.

The Rapparees.

Thus ended the campaign in Ireland. With respect to foreign affairs, the grand alliance, to which the King had acceded, was also strengthened by the accession of the Duke of Savoy (1). He had, since the kindling of the war, professed a neutrality, with which the French appeared the least satisfied, though they seemed to have most reason to be so. For though the Duke had been so compliant to the King of France, as to imprison, banish, and at last destroy by the sword his own Protestant subjects, the miserable Fandans; yet nothing was able to continue him in that King's favour, but his receiving a French garrison into the citadels of Turin and Ivrea, for the securing of his pretended neutrality. These proposals could not but appear harsh to a Court, which was ever used rather to gain than lose by the division of her neighbours. However the Duke, who, even at four and twenty years of age, challenged a place amongst the ablest politicians, prudently amused the King of France with civil messages, and at the same time endeavoured to make the Emperor buy his alliance with the acknowledgment of his claim to the kingdom of Cyprus, and the giving him the title of Royal Highness, which at last the Emperor consented to. This concession being made publick, the French began to suspect the confederations, upon which his Imperial Majesty had made it, and expostulated the matter with the Duke; who thereupon declared to the King of France by his Minister, that he had no design to abandon his friendship, or to do any thing derogatory to the treaties, that were between that crown and himself. But this general answer not satisfying the French, Monsieur Catinat, who was to command the French troops on that side, passed the mountains, and arrived at Turin in the spring, leaving his army of about eighteen thousand men in Dauphiné, with orders to follow him by easy journeys into the Duke's territories. The presence of this military envoy somewhat discomposed the Duke of Savoy, who, to rid himself of a troublesome guest, before the arrival of his more troublesome

(1) The author of the French Continuation of Monsieur Rapin's history says, that King William had for a long time courted that Duke, who being weary of the long slavery, under which he had been retained by France, heard with pleasure every thing, that tended to rescue him, from that yoke. The House of Austria had no less interest to gain him; and it is said, that this house ever since the first infractions of the treaty of Nimègue, in order to revenge itself, formed a project, of which the two principal articles were the raising of King William to the throne of Great Britain, and the making a league with Léopold II. Duke of Savoy. This latter article was negotiated, as it was said, in 1685, a little after the truce for twenty years; and there was a person, who having learned this at Rome from the mouth of Christina of Sweden, then upon ill terms with Louis XIV., came to Turin to discover that secret to the Abbe d'Eftrader, the French Minister at that Court. But the latter having refused the private audience, which the other desired of him, this important discovery was buried in silence.

Two years afterwards, in 1687, it was found by means of two hundred thousand livres given to a Monk, who was a private agent of the Duke, that under pretence of diverting himself at the carnival of Venice, he had concluded there an alliance with the Emperor and several of the German Princes, upon the plan of the famous League of Augsbourg; and a copy of this treaty was likewise procured. This step ought to have given some uneasiness to the Court of Versailles. But, whether prosperity had accustomed that Court to despise its enemies, or whether it imagined that the Duke would deceive his new allies, the French Ministers interested themselves so much the less in that affair, as they flattered themselves at all adventures with the notion of being able to take their revenge whenever they should think proper.

The Duke taking advantage of this security of theirs, concluded his treaty with the Emperor and his allies. By the first article, the Duke obliged himself not to enter into any treaty of alliance, peace, or truce with France, without the consent of the Emperor, to whom he promised a faithful and inviolable attachment. He engaged by the second and third articles to act in concert with the Emperor, Spain, and their allies, and to employ his forces in conjunction with theirs against France. The Abbe Vincent Grimaldi on the other hand promised in the name of the Emperor and Empire, not to enter into any treaty of peace or truce with France without including the Duke in it. 2. To take such order, that the Governor of Milan shall employ all the forces of that state for the preservation of the Duke's territories; and that the Spanish fleet should take care to secure the city and country of Nice. 3. That his Imperial Majesty should immediately send six thousand of his choicest men to join the Duke's forces, which his Imperial Majesty engaged to pay without their pretending to any winter quarters in Piedmont: 4. That his Imperial Majesty shall endeavour to the utmost of his power, that the Vaudois, the French refugees, and the eight thousand men, which the Marquis of Borgomaiore, Ambassador of Spain, had promised should be sent into Piedmont, should join the troops of the Duke; the Emperor leaving to him the care of employing all those forces jointly with the Governor of Milan, as they should find most convenient. 5. That the Emperor and the confederates should endeavour the restoration of Pignerol into the hands of the Duke, either by force of arms, or by a treaty, without laying any claim to Monferrat, which his Imperial Majesty should renounce, notwithstanding the ancient treaties. 6. That his Imperial Majesty should lay no claim to any thing; that may happen to be won from France on that side, but would leave the Duke and the Governor of Milan to agree that point together.

The time was now passed, when the French insulted their 1690. some retinue, offered to furnish the King of France with two thousand foot, and one thousand horse. The Pope's Nuncio at Turin endeavoured likewise to send away Catinat in good humour; but that General not satisfied with any offers that were made him, positively demanded Vercell for a place of arms, protesting, that he would not hearken to any accommodation but upon these terms. Though the Duke had by this time made choice of his side, yet it had been great imprudence in him to declare his intentions, since the French were ready to attack him, and the Spaniards from the Milanese not in a condition to assist him. He therefore made use of all imaginable address to protract the affair, which produced these new proposals from France, "That the King was willing to refer his concerns to the Pope and the Republic of Venice, upon condition, that the Duke would consign Vercell, Carmagnola, and Susa into the Pope's hands, until the end of the war." The Duke being pressed so far, and considering, that it was to no purpose to conceal a thing, which was already but too much suspected, and must necessarily be known, boldly declared, "That he was engaged with the Emperor, and could not go from his word. However, in regard the alliance he had made with his Imperial Majesty, tended no farther than to oppose the unjust designs of France, if his most Christian Majesty would put Casal and Pignerol into the hands of the Republic of Venice till the end of the war, he would lay down his arms, and for the same put into the Pope's hands one of his own towns, as a pledge for the observation of a neutrality." It will be easily imagined how France relished this answer, which, at best, was but a civil declaration of war; the consequence of which was, the immediate liberty and recalling of the Vaudois, and the encouragement given them to arm themselves against France; and the publick avowing of the Duke's treaties, first with the Emperor, and then with the King of Spain, whereby they respectively engaged themselves to join their forces against France, and never to make a separate treaty with that crown, without their joint consent. Besides, by the first article of the treaty with Spain, made on the 3d of June, his Catholic Majesty promised to cause the Duke of Savoy to be comprehended in the alliance with the Emperor, King William, the States General, and all his other Allies.

Catinat being by this time at the head of his army in the Duke's territories, the Duke gathered what force he could to drive him out; and joining himself with the troops of the Milanese, earnestly sought an opportunity of signalizing his courage. But the Count de Lorignez, who commanded the Spanish troops, continually represented to him, that Catinat could not receive supplies but with great difficulty, and that his army wasted every day by desertion or diseases; whereas the Duke's forces had plenty of every thing, and increased daily with new reinforcements; and therefore he ought to expect victory rather from time than the success of a battle, which he could not try without disadvantage, the French being not only superior in number, but also better disciplined. These reasons prevailed for some time with the Duke of Savoy, to content himself with observing the enemy; but being elated with the success of some of his troops, which had repulsed the French of Saluses, from before Carignan, and drove them out of the vallies and town of Lucerne, he advanced towards Catinat, who made a shew of attacking Saluses, and offered him battle. The French General gladly accepted the challenge; and having observed, that the enemy's left wing was covered by a morass, he caused the same to be sounded, and finding it had a firm bottom, ordered his men to begin the attack that way. The Duke's left wing was so surpris'd at this unexpected charge, that they made no long resistance; but the right wing stood firm for above three hours, till being overpowered they betook themselves to flight. The Duke himself retired with his broken remains to Carignan, and Catinat pursuing his victory, the very next day made himself master of Saluses, and not long after of Savillana, Villa Franca, and several other places, and then marched his army towards Carignan.

their enemies with a haughty and contemptuous indifference. They had then an extreme attention to every thing, that was doing. They had discovered, that the Duke of Savoy had practis'd upon the Vaudois, and maintained a private correspondence with England and Holland; that these three powers were projecting a diversion into Bresse and Dauphine, and designed to employ in that attempt the troops of the Milanese, those of Savoy, the Vaudois who had retired into Wirttemberg, the French refugees, and the new converts, whom they would try to engage in an insurrection. Lewis XIV., who was now in the train of discoveries, was informed soon after of the engagements, which the Duke was entered into, and therefore sent twelve thousand men into Piedmont under the conduct of the brave and able Monsieur Catinat, afterwards Marshal of France, with orders, to demand of the Duke as a pledge of his fidelity, that he would deliver up to France his troops, together with Verrue and the citadel of Turin. The Duke, confounded with this unforeseen stroke, endeavoured to amuse his enemy by submissions and offers, till he could procure assistance from the Emperor and Spain. But Lewis XIV. was not to be deceived, and therefore reinforced his army in Piedmont, and declared to the Duke, that he expected of him the delivery of Verrue and the citadel of Turin, or, instead of the latter, Carmagnola, Susa, and Montmelian, to be restored to the Duke after the peace, under the guaranty of the Pope and the Venetians. He added in a kind of Manifesto, "that if the Duke chose rather to trust in the hands of the republic of Venice, during the course of the war, the citadel of Turin and Verrue, and to receive a Venetian garrison, he would withdraw his troops upon these two conditions: First, that if this Prince, contrary to the promises which he should be obliged to give, should join his troops to those of the allies, or give them a passage into his territories, the Venetians should in that case be obliged to put into the hands of France the two places intrusted to them. Secondly, that the Emperor and Spain should oblige themselves not to attempt any thing in Italy against the Princes, who were neutral or allies of France, and that the Pope, Venice, and the Grand Duke should be guaranties of that Convention."

The Duke was then too much engaged on both sides to be able to give a faithful promise. But at last he declared himself on the 2d of June; his treaty with the King of Spain was signed the next day, and that with the Emperor the day following; and hostilities were begun at the same time by the French in Piedmont and Savoy.

(1) The

Carignan. The Duke not finding himself in a condition to wait his coming, left a strong garrison both in that place and in Charmagnola, and retreated to Moncalier to recruit his army, and to stay for the Germans, that were coming to his assistance. With this reinforcement, besides some Milise troops, being near twenty thousand strong, he decamped from Moncalier, and marched towards Catinat; who having likewise been strengthened with some regiments from France, had formed a design upon Susa, a town considerable for its situation, as being the key of Dauphiné into Piedmont. To secure this place the Duke sent the Count de Lovigniez with six battalions of foot and some horse; of which Catinat having received information, left the common road, and marched his men with great expedition for six days together over the mountains. Upon this motion of Catinat, the Duke imagined, that the siege of Susa was only a feint, and that the true design of the French was to give him battle; and therefore sent orders to Lovigniez to leave Susa, and forthwith to join him with all his forces. This was no sooner done, but the French immediately invetted the town, where there was only six or seven hundred men in garrison, who not thinking themselves able to defend such a weak post against a numerous army, surrendered upon honourable terms. With this action the campaign ended in Piedmont, for Catinat divided his army, sending part of it into Frevence, and the other into Savoy; which Dukedom (the town of Montmelian excepted) Monsieur St. Rube had not long before reduced to his master's obedience. The Duke of Savoy finding how little he ought to depend either upon the Emperor or the King of Spain, who had made him great promises of assistance, in which they were never wanting, when their affairs required it, though they totally failed in the performance, he wisely bethought himself of making application to the States General, and especially to King William, the head and support of the grand alliance, by the Count de la Tour, President of his Finances, one of his Privy Council, and a man of great parts. That Envoy extraordinary having dispatched his business at the Hague, came immediately over into England, and at his first public audience delivered himself to the King in the following terms:

SIR,

"HIS Royal Highness, my master, does by me congratulate your sacred Majesty's glorious accession to the crown. It was due to your birth, and derived by your virtue, and is maintained by your valour. Providence had designed it for your sacred head, for the accomplishment of his eternal decrees, which, after long patience, do always tend to raise up chosen souls to repress violence, and protect justice. The wonderful beginnings of your reign are most certain presages of the blessings, which heaven prepares for the uprightness of your intentions; which have no other scope than to restore this flourishing Kingdom to its first greatness, and break the chains which Europe groans under.

"This magnanimous design, worthy of the heroes of our age, filled his Royal Highness with inexpressible joy; but he was constrained to conceal it in the secret of his heart; and if at last he has been free to own it, he is obliged to the very name of your Majesty for it, since that alone has made him conceive some hopes of liberty, after so many years of servitude.

"My words, and the treaty, which I have signed at the Hague, with your Majesty's ministers, do but faintly express the passion, which my master has to unite himself by the most inviolable ties to your service. The honour, Sir, which he has to be related to you, has tied the first knots of this union. The infinite respect, which he has for your sacred person, has, as it were, knit them faster; and the generous protection, which you are pleased to grant him, will, without doubt, make them indissoluble. These are the sincere sentiments of his Royal Highness; to which I dare not add any thing of mine; for how ardent soever my zeal may be, and how profound the veneration, which I bear to your glorious achievements, I think I cannot better express either, than by a silence full of admiration."

The King was not displeased with so agreeable a compliment, and at the same time readily embraced this opportunity to engage the Duke of Savoy in the interests of the confederates, by promising him speedy assistance; in which he fulfilled his engagements.

As the enemies of France increased, so the Campaign seemed proportionably to increase in power, being very formidable this year, not only by sea, of which the confederate fleet felt the effects, but also by land. The allies being sensible of this, it was agreed, that the army of the states under Prince Waldeck should oppose in Flanders that of France, commanded by the Duke of Luxemburg; while the Elector of Brandenburg should, upon the Moselle, observe the Marquis de Boufflers. But the French, according to their usual forwardness, having taken the field early, the Dutch were constrained to draw out their garrisons to attend the enemy, before those of Brandenburg were come to the posts assigned them; which gave Boufflers an opportunity to encamp between the Sambre and the Meuse, from whence he maintained a free communication between his army and that of Luxemburg.

The Dutch, under these circumstances, encamped near the river Pieton, in one of the most advantageous posts in all Flanders, waiting till the Brandenburgers took the field, and thereby caused the enemy to divide their forces; but in the mean time the Duke of Luxemburg drew near the Sambre with a design to cross that river between Namur and Charleroy, and then to waste the Spanish countries or put them under contribution. Prince Waldeck knowing of what importance it was to keep the French beyond the Sambre, and being likewise thoroughly lolling Jun. 10. cited by the Spaniards to oppose the designs of the enemy, decamped from the Pieton, and the next day detached the Count of Berlo with fifteen hundred horse, to observe whether the French endeavoured to pass the Sambre or not. This detachment was, in case of necessity, to be supported by four or five regiments of cavalry, commanded by the Count de Flodrop; and the Count of Webbenum, with another party of horse was posted on this side a narrow lane, which was to be passed through before they could come to the enemy.

Berlo being advanced as far as the village of The Battle Fleras, found, that a good part of the French of Fleras army

1690. army had already passed the Sambre, and posted themselves against the village, which they kept to their backs; of all which he instantly informed Prince Waldeck, who was posted between Mellin and Fleurs. On the other hand, the enemy having notice of Berle's approach, marched directly towards him. And at the same time the Duke of Luxemburg dispatched away several troops privately thorough by-ways to fall upon him in the rear. Upon this Berle sent for a reinforcement, especially of foot; but instead of sending him more force, they gave him orders to retreat. Yet he not receiving those orders till he was almost surrounded on every side, was obliged to put himself in a condition to defend a narrow lane, which he had before possessed by his dragoons. The enemy charged him very vigorously, and there he lost his life, as did also Major Casleman and some other officers. The count de Flodrop was likewise advanced too far to retire without fighting; and indeed his party stood their ground very stoutly for a while, but being oppressed by numbers, they were forced to retreat to Count Webbenum, who commanded the third detachment, and was posted on the other side the hedge. Some squadrons of the French boldly pursued Flodrop thro' the hedge, but were so vigorously repulsed, that they were constrained to retreat. When this was over Flodrop and Webbenum joined their main army, which was drawn up in order of battle, and continued in that posture all night. The next morning the Dutch understood by a deserter, that Luxemburg was resolved to fight; but two spies, who made it their business to betray both armies, reported presently after, that he was repassing the Sambre. Prince Waldeck continued in this uncertainty till eight in the morning, when he saw the French drawn up in battle-array, and that there was a necessity of engaging. The Dutch army consisted only of about five and twenty thousand men; the Spaniards and Brandenburgers, who should have reinforced them, not being yet come up; so that the Prince could not make above two lines, which extended from Flerus to St. Arnand. The French army was above forty thousand strong, Luxemburg having almost drained the French frontier-towns, and having been reinforced three days before by eighteen battalions of foot, forty five squadrons of horse from Bouffers's army, and the flying camp of the Count de Gournay. The fight being resolved upon, Prince Waldeck gave the command of his right wing to the Prince of Nassau, General of the horse, accompanied by Lieutenant General d'Huby, a Spaniard, and the Prince of Birkenfeld with his brigadiers; and assigned the charge of the left wing, and the main battle, to the Prince of Nassau, Governor of Friesland, and Mareschal de Camp, and the Lieutenant Generals d'Alva and Webbenum. He likewise, before the fight began, sent some horse to line the right wing of the army, which was advantageously posted. But whether none were sent to line the left, or that those, who were commanded thither did not perform their duty, the enemy, without being perceived, slipped several troops behind a rising ground and a small wood near the Sambre, who posted themselves behind the second line of the left wing. This constrained that line to face about, and turn their backs to the first; whereby being very much weakened, some battalions of the right wing were sent to secure their flank, and assist them to maintain their ground. Luxemburg no sooner observed that motion, but he told the Duke de Mayne, who was then near him, see what the enemy are doing; I foretell they will be beaten. Which being said, he ordered the left wing to be attacked at the same time in the front, rear, and flank. The first line being already weakened to reinforce the second, was soon compelled to give way; upon which the enemy marched on to the second, to fall upon their rear. By this time that line was advanced to make head against the cavalry, which they had before them, and which they had driven back in disorder upon the French infantry; but the enemy having three lines, no sooner was one overthrown, but fresh battalions renewed the fight, by which means they at last repulsed the Dutch, quite tired with the onsets they had already sustained. Prince Waldeck observing the left wing in a staggering condition, and that the horse had, for the most part, given ground, sent to their relief the horse of the second line of the right wing, from whence the foot had already been drawn for the same purpose. While this was doing on that side, the first line of the right wing was also engaged with the enemy, and had bravely repulsed and routed them several times, being supported by the Spanish horse, who had made themselves masters of ten pieces of the enemy's cannon, and kept them a considerable time. But the French having three lines on that side also, and being continually supplied with fresh men, the Dutch cavalry was dispersed and broke to that degree, that the whole body could never be rallied again. Count Flodrop indeed with great difficulty assembled about twelve hundred horse after an hour's riding from the field of battle, and brought them on again; but then it was too late, for the infantry was retreated.

From this time, during the whole course of the war, the Dutch horse had the misfortune to be accounted the worst amongst the confederates; and indeed, had they behaved themselves as well as the infantry on this occasion, the victory would certainly have been on their side, notwithstanding the inequality of numbers. As for the foot, never did any troops perform greater wonders; for after they were abandoned by the horse, they alone sustained the charge of the French cavalry and infantry, and being attacked in front, flank, and rear, all at once, yet remained firm, unbroken, and impenetrable. They let the enemy's horse approach within pistol-shot of them, and made their discharge with such an unconcerned and steady aim, that the whole squadron together seemed to sink under the ground, scarce thirty of the whole number escaping; and this course they so accustomed themselves to observe, that at length they laughed at their enemies, and challenged them to advance. The French, on the other side, were so confounded with the execution done upon them, that they fled as soon as the Dutch began to present their muskets; nor durst they any more come near them, but suffered them to retreat in good order without offering to pursue them. This unparalleled firmness and bravery made the Duke of Luxemburg say in their commendation, "That they had surpassed the Spanish infantry at the battle of Rocroy," where the Spaniards had greatly signalized themselves; adding 1690. em., withal, "That Prince Waldeck ought ever

"to remember the French horſe, and himſelf
"never to forget the Dutch infantry." (1)

This action was very bloody on both ſides, the Dutch themſelves owing the loſs of four thouſand ſix hundred men killed upon the place, and a great many wounded; above four thouſand priſoners, and the greateſt part of their artillery taken. The moſt remarkable perſons among the ſlain were the Prince of Saxe-Meyenburg, the Count of Stirum, one of the young Counts of Neſſau, the Baron de Lyde, and ſeveral Colonels, Captains, and inferior officers. As for the French, excepting the priſoners and the field of battle, they had no reaſon to boaſt of any advantage, the number of ſlain being at leaſt equal with that of the Dutch. And tho' Prince Waldeck might have committed an error in not availing a battle, after the informations, which were given him concerning the conjunction of the French forces; yet it is certain, he did all that could be expected from an experienced General.

The French were not able to draw any advantage from this ſucceſs; for the Dutch repaired their loſſes with admirable diligence, ſo that Prince Waldeck being reinforced by the five Engliſh regiments, which were not in the action, eight or nine thouſand men from Hanover, and ten thouſand more of the Biſhoprick of Liege, Brandenburgers and Hollanders, under Count de Tilly, he joined the Elector of Brandenburg with all his forces. By this conjunction the confederate army being reckoned fifty-five thouſand ſtrong, bent their march to Genap, and ſo to Bois-Seigneur-Isaac. And though Luxemburg had been likewiſe conſiderably reinforced, yet he ſat contented with the glory of having gained a ſignal victory this ſummer, and fortified his camp ſo, as not to be obliged to fight without conſiderable advantage. On the other hand, the States-General ſent poſitive orders to Prince Waldeck not to hazard another engagement till the ſeet ſhould be again at ſea; and this reſtrained the Elector of Brandenburg, who, in conjunction with the Dutch, was ſuperior in numbers to Luxemburg. And afterwards, when the States ſuperſeded thoſe orders, he did not think fit to hazard his army. Such is the fate of confederate armies, when under a different direction, that when the one is willing, or at leaſt ſeems to be ſo, the other ſtands off. So there was no further action in Flanders this campaign.

Though the Emperor, towards the latter end of the preceding year, was very preſſing with the Proteſtant Electors to meet at Augsburg, yet neither letters nor meſſages were able to prevail with them. However, the Electoral College being met, together with Envoys of ſuch as were abſent, the Emperor made a ſpeech to them upon the occaſion, for which they were aſſembled, conſiſting of three principal heads: The firſt was the ſecurity of the empire againſt the deſigns of France: the next, the neceſſity of chuſing a King of the Romans: and, laſtly, he earneſtly recommended to them to caſt their eyes upon his ſon Joſeph, Archduke of Austria, and King of Hungary, to advance him to that dignity. Whatever the Electoral College reſolved in relation to France, they proved unanimous in the choice of his ſon, juſtly ſuppoſing, that there could be no better method for obviating the deſigns of France upon Germany, than to continue the Imperial dignity in the Auſtrian family. Thus Archduke Joſeph was choſen and crowned Jan. 4.

(1) The Marquiſs de Fouquieres's tells us, that the Duke of Luxemburg, by the ſuperiority of his genius over the Prince of Waldeck, completed the deciſion of this great battle of Flerus, the ſucceſs of which was owing to the ſeaſonable time, in which the Duke ordered the left wing of his horſe to form a motion, of which the enemy could have no knowledge, becauſe it was intirely effected out of their view, though it happened to be made very near them. This was ſuch a maſterly expedient, as could only be conceived by a truly great man, whoſe admirable penetration could ſingle out the critical moment for directing ſuch a motion, and concealing it from the enemy's obſervation; ſince it would have been too hazardous to have attempted it, had the enemy diſcovered his proceeding. The Prince of Waldeck had drawn up his troops on a tract of land, which roſe a little to his right, and formed a ſlope on the other ſide, which was unobſerved by the extremity of the right wing, and continued in an eaſy declivity to the level, on which the Duke of Luxemburg was marching to his enemy. When the front of the French army arrived at the place, where this elevation was high enough to conceal the left wing of their horſe from the Prince of Waldeck in the continuation of their march, the Duke improved the important moment with a ſurpriſing capacity, and ordered Monſieur de Gournai, a very expert officer of the horſe, to take the advantage of the oppoſite ſide, which prevented the enemy from diſcovering the motion he was to purſue, and to pour all the left of his horſe upon the enemy's right flank, with a particular caution to order his march ſo, that the right of his left might rejoin the left of the foot, at the inſtant they were preparing to charge the front of the enemy's foot. This motion, which would have proved ſo hazardous, had the enemy diſcovered it, but which decided the battle in favour of the French, was executed with a capacity equal to the judgement that formed it. All the left wing of the French horſe was diſpoſed into a kind of rectangular form on the flank of the enemy's right wing, though they extended to the French line of foot. And thus the Dutch ſaw themſelves aſſaulted in flank by a front equal to that, which they poſſeſſed: when they therefore found their right charged in flank, at the ſame time, their centre and left were attacked by the centre and right of the French army, it was impoſſible for the Prince of Waldeck to remedy the diſorder on his right; which was ſoon communicated to the centre and left, and ended in their precipitate retreat from the field of battle with the loſs of all their artillery, and the greateſt part of their foot; becauſe the Prince had poſted too large a body of infantry in the village of Ligni, and could not draw them out, after they were abandoned by the horſe. "The relation of theſe particulars, adds Monſieur de Fouquieres, makes it evident, that a field of battle, choſen with great attention by a general, who determines to await his enemy there, can never be ſo level, ſo open, or ſo equal in all the advantages of ſituation, as to prevent a more expert general from improving ſome little conveniences in the diſpoſition of the ground, that frequently afford him an opportunity of bringing the battle to a glorious deciſion. "This action may be juſtly ranked among the nobleſt achievements of the Duke of Luxemburg, when we conſider the admirable capacity and profound judgment he diſcovered in the art of war, as well as the peculiar vivacity, with which he accompliſhed his deſigns. This great commander formed in one moment the plan of his march againſt the enemy, and completely executed his whole ſcheme with ſo much vigour, as made it impoſſible for the enemy

1690. crowned King of the Romans, to the great satisfaction of the Emperor, and most of the empire, and the no less disappointment of the King of France, whose enemies still increased in this very conjuncture. For the memorial, which the Duke of Lorraine presented to the diet at Ratisbon towards the close of the last year, about his being restored to his Duchy, was now succeeded by a manifesto from the same Prince, in which he declared war against France, alledging how unjust it was in Louis XIV. to detain his territories from him under frivolous pretences; promising to himself to enter into Lorraine the approaching summer, at the head of forty thousand men, and exhorting all his subjects to shake off the yoke of France, and all the Nobility and Gentry to assist him to regain his ancient patrimony, under the pain of being degraded and deprived of all their privileges. But this brave Prince, who in all probability might have given a very considerable shock to the power of France, being upon the road to Vienna, at a small village called Wells near Lintz, was seized with a quinzey, which soon deprived him of the use of his speech, so that he was obliged to write down part of his confession; and, perceiving himself near his end, he wrote the following letter to the Emperor:

"I departed from Innsbruck, in order to come and receive your orders; our God calls me hence, and I am going to render him an account of a life, which I had devoted to you. I humbly beseech your Majesty to remember my wife, who is nearly related to you, my children, whom I leave without any fortune, and my subjects, who are oppressed."

April 8.

He expired soon after, aged forty-seven years. It was reported, that his death was occasioned by poison, and imputed to the Court of France. To support this opinion, it was urged, that his death had been mentioned in the papers printed in France, fifteen days before it happened, and that many of the circumstances, which accompanied it, were likewise foretold. And it was affirmed, that one of the first ministers of that kingdom laid a wager, that the Duke would never command the Imperial army again. Besides, it was said, that the Jesuits of Strasbourg having drawn up publicly in their school an Horoscope, which threatened him with death in the space of three weeks, he died fifteen days after; and that the physicians, who opened him by order of the Emperor, found his body corrupted in such a manner, as could only be the effect of a violent poison. To which were added the Duke's own suspicions, who was reported to have written to the Emperor in these terms, I am dying. I know not, whether I am paying by my death the ordinary debt of nature, or whether I am sacrificed to the unjust and ambitious designs of a crown, which has declared itself an implacable enemy of my family.

The Duke was one of those indolent genius's, His Character who never exert themselves but from mere necessity. The melancholy situation, in which he saw himself, when he began to reflect, and the disgraces, which his delicacy in point of honour drew upon him in France, Poland, Rome, and Austria, were but too capable of depressing and extinguishing the courage of a young Prince, who had nothing before him but the most gloomy prospect. For even at Vienna, where his services and alliance with the Emperor ought to have put him in a situation of displaying his abilities, the jealousy of the ministers obliged him to contract himself, and by a politic indolence conceal his talents and inclinations for war and government. This struck Europe with amazement, upon seeing him in his first campaigns distinguish himself by actions worthy an old experienced General. But every one recovered from this surprize, when they saw him maintain and even surpass these first attempts by new victories. Nor was his valour only admired, but the depth and solidity of his judgment, and the extent and justness of his views were likewise acknowledged; and nothing contributed more to persuade people, that France had recourse to poison, to remove so formidable an enemy.

His

"enemy to avoid the fatal blow he was preparing to give them."

Another French writer, the Marquis de la Forre, gives the following account of that battle. He observes, that Monsieur de Louvois, who was an enemy to the Duke of Luxembourg, not being able to hinder that Duke from commanding the principal army in Flanders, found means however to procure a detachment of a great part of it to compose another for Marshal d'Humières towards the sea-coasts, and at the same time sent positive orders to the Duke, who was between the Sambre and the Meuse, to pass the former of those rivers; which exposed that General to a blow almost inevitable, if the Prince of Waldeck had been as vigilant a commander as he. But though the Prince was an experienced General, he was not very enterprising; and stopping too long at Flerus, which is not above two or three leagues from the Sambre, the greatest part of the French army was actually passed that river, before he stirred to oppose their passage. (The first body of horse, which he detached for that purpose, was engaged by the Gens d'Armes, and, after a vigorous fight, was pursued till they came in sight of their own camp. The Prince of Waldeck had a great army posted to considerable advantage. But the Duke of Luxembourg, who could not avoid repassing the Sambre before the enemy, without engaging them, spent all the night in preparing to attack them the next day. The front of their main body was covered with a brook, so that there was no possibility of attacking them except on their left. In this situation, the Grand Prior, who was near the Duke of Luxembourg, made all his right pass over, one after another, and fell upon the flank of the left, while we charged their right; which determined the conflict, and routed their cavalry: Yet their infantry rallied again, and made a great fire. The Duke of Maine had an horse there killed under him; and near him Monsieur Suffal, (who was his Governor, as he had been also to the Duke of Vendôme) was slain. Some afterwards blamed the Duke of Luxembourg for having separated his army in sight of the enemy, who might have taken advantage of it; but the ground being such, that they could not perceive the separation. "I am, says Monsieur de la Forre, of opinion, that this General thereby merited great praise. This battle happily won was the source of all the other good success, which France had during this war. The Duke of Luxembourg was for marching forward, and making the advantage of this victory; but the orders of the Court, or, to say better, those of Monsieur de Louvois, suspended that action; and he was put upon beholding Charleroy, which made so brave and long a defence, that the taking of it at last was the only fruit of this battle, which might have had more advantageous consequences." Memoir. du Regne de Louis XIV. Cap. His sudden death, as it damped the rejoicings of the Court of Vienna upon the marriage of the Princess Dorothea Sophia of Neuberg with the Prince of Parma; so it allayed the sorrow at Versailles upon the death of the Dauphinefs, which happened two days after the Duke of Lorraine's, though it did not retard the journey of the Dauphin to Strasbourg, from whence he put himself at the head of the French army, that lay near Landau.

Life of
p. 214.

The command of the Imperial army was given to the Elector of Bavaria, with whom, at length, joined a body of Saxons headed by the Elector himself with his two sons. These four held a conference at Eppinghen, together with the Field-Marshal Caprara and Sereni; after which there were great expectations, that the principal part of the army would have fallen upon Hunninghen; but there was nothing put in execution on that side, nor indeed any where else worth relating. For the Imperialists having for some time encamped in the Marquisate of Baden Durlach, it was thought very surprizing, that instead of marching on towards the upper Rhine, they fell down on a sudden towards Mentz; the Elector of Saxony at the same time being posted near Philipsburg, General Dunewaldt commanding a flying camp towards fort Louis, and General Souches keeping his former post on Hunninghen side. The Dauphin was no sooner informed of these motions, but he passed the Rhine at fort Louis to maintain his army in the enemy's country, and that in order of battle, as expecting some opposition in his march. On the 16th of August he encamped in the plain of Stellhofen, having the mountains on one side, the Rhine on the other, and a large morass before him, being about forty thousand strong, and in expectation of being considerably reinforced. His design was to have taken some forts, that opened him a passage into Wirtemberg, a province yet untouched by either army, and which consequently would have afforded plentiful subsistence for his men. The Duke of Bavaria prevented the accomplishment of his project; for returning back with long marches, and joining the Saxons, the two Electors marched directly towards the Dauphin, who by hard and cautious marches avoided an engagement; and the rather, because the Imperialists were superior to him in force, upon his detaching twelve thousand of his men towards the Moselle, to obviate the designs of the Lunenburghers and Hessians, who were got near Coblentz, on purpose to pass the Rhine, and fall on the Archbishoprick of Triers, and so drive the French out of their country. And thus ended the campaign on the German side without any remarkable action.

Insurrection in Catalonia.
Boyer.

An insurrection happened in Catalonia towards the beginning of this year, which created no small trouble to the Viceroy and Court of Spain. The pretence was, that the Spaniards kept too great a number of troops in that province, and overcharged it with taxes contrary to its antient privileges, of which the Catalans were always extremely jealous. The revolt begun in this manner; two wealthy countrymen had interest enough to draw together about a thousand more; and with that body they stopp'd up all the avenues to Barcelona, where the Duke of Villa Hermosa the Viceroy resided; seized upon two troops of horse, that lay in the neighbouring villages, and committed some spoil. But upon the Viceroy's sending a party of the garrison of Barcelona against them, they immediately fled to the mountains, and from thence in a short time after sent to beg pardon, which was granted them. This sedition, which seemed intirely extinguished, was only suppressed for a time to break out in a greater flame; for the rebels upon the first rally had shewn themselves too soon, by reason the French, who were to have supported them, were not within reach to do it; so that the Catalans kept fair for a time, till they had assurance of protection from France, when they threw off their masks more daringly than before, and increased in numbers every day; so that the Court of Spain was obliged, besides the forces, that were already in that Province, to send for more out of Navarre to suppress them. By this means the rebels were reduced to so great necessity, that though the Duke of Noailles hastened with all expedition to Perpignan, and used all the industry imaginable to draw his army together to countenance them, yet they had before in a manner dwindled into nothing. However he reaped this advantage from their revolt, that he anticipated the Spaniards in the field, as he did the year before, when he took Campredon from them, which spent them this whole campaign in retaking it, though they could not prevent the demolishing of it. Thus the Duke of Noailles had the opportunity of taking San Juan de Abadesas, a small fort two leagues beyond Campredon, and six from Gironne, which encouraged him to proceed: and so possessing himself of divers castles, that embarrassed his progress, he advanced as far as Foulen, about four small leagues from Gironne, upon which last town he seemed to bend his thoughts; but finding himself not strong enough for such an enterprise, and yet being desirous to take the advantage of the slowness of the Spaniards, he left Gironne upon the left hand, and advanced near the city of Vich, maintaining his army at the expence of the Catalans, and destroying all he could not make use of. As for the Spaniards, August was come before they had between ten or twelve thousand men together, with which the Duke of Villa Hermosa marched towards the enemy. But the French army being now weakened by a detachment sent into Dauphiné, Noailles prudently declined fighting, and retired by the way of Rouffillon, and so ended the campaign on that side.

After this view of the foreign transactions which have any relation to King William, as head of the confederacy against France; it is time to return to England. The King at his coming from Ireland was so little wearied with that campaign, that he intended to have gone over to his army into Flanders. But it was too late, for they were going into winter quarters. Wherefore, he resolved to hold the session of Parliament early, that so the funds being settled for the next year, he might have an interview with the German Princes, who intended to meet at the Hague, and concert measures for the ensuing campaign.

Accordingly on the 2d of October the Parliament met at Westminster, and the King made the following speech to both Houses.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

The King's "SINCE I last met you, I have used my speech. "best endeavours to reduce Ireland into Pr. H. C. "such a condition this year, as that it might II. 384. "be no longer a charge to England. And it "has pleased God to bless my endeavours with "such success, that I doubt not but I should "have been fully possessed of that kingdom by "this time, had I been enabled to have gone "into the field as soon as I should have done,
 "and as is more especially necessary in Ireland,
 "where the rains are so great, and begin so
 "early.

"I think myself obliged to take notice, how "well the army there have behaved themselves
 "on all occasions, and borne great hardships
 "with little pay, and with so much patience
 "and willingness, as could not but proceed
 "from an affectionate duty to my service, and "a zeal for the Protestant religion.

"I have already made it evident, how much
 "I have preferred the satisfaction of my subjects
 "before the most solid advantages of the crown,
 "by parting with so considerable a branch of "its inheritance. And it is no less apparent,
 "that I have asked no revenue for myself but "what I have readily subjected to be charged "to the uses of the war.

"I did at my departure give order for all "the publick accounts to be made ready for "me against my return; and I have command"ed them to be laid before the House of Com"mons, by which they will see, that the real
 "want of what was necessary beyond the funds
 "given, and the not getting in due time that
 "for which funds were assigned, have been the "principal causes, why the army is so much in "arrears of their pay, and the stores both for "the navy and the ordnance not supplied as "they ought to be.

"Now as I have neither spared my person
 "nor my pains to do you all the good I could;
 "so I doubt not, but if you will as cheerfully
 "do your parts, it is in your power to make
 "both me and yourselves happy, and the na"tion great. And, on the other hand, it is "too plain, by what the French have let you "see so lately, that if the present war be not "prosecuted with vigour, no nation in the "world is exposed to greater danger.

"I hope therefore, there will need no more
 "upon that subject, than to lay before you,
 "Gentlemen of the House of Commons, the "state of what will be necessary for the sup"port of the fleet and armies, which cannot "possibly admit of being lessened in the year en"suing; and to recommend to your care the "clearing of my revenue, so as to enable me to "subsist, and to maintain the charge of the civil

"list; the revenue being so engaged, that it must "be wholly applied, after the first of Novem- "ber next, to pay off the debts already char"ged upon it. And therefore a present con"sideration must be had of the arrears of the "army, which shall likewise be laid before
 "you, and for all which I must desire a suffi"cient and timely supply.

"It is farther necessary to inform you, that "the whole support of the confederacy abroad
 "will absolutely depend upon the speed and vi"gour of your proceedings in this session. And "here I must take notice, with great satisfaction
 "of the readiness, which my subjects of all de"grees have shewn both in this city, and in their "several counties, by giving their assistance so "cheerfully as they did in my absence, while the "French fleet was upon our coasts. And be"sides this so convincing mark of the good in"clinations of my people, I have found thro'
 "all the counties, where I passed, both at my "going into Ireland, and in my return from "thence, such demonstration of their affection,
 "that I have not the least doubt, but I shall "find the same from their representatives in "Parliament.

"I cannot conclude without taking notice
 "also, how much the honour of the nation has "been exposed by the ill conduct of my fleet
 "in the last summer's engagement against the "French. And I think myself so much con"cerned to see it vindicated, that I cannot "rest satisfied till an example has been made of "such, as shall be found faulty upon their ex"amination and trial, which was not practi"cable, while the whole fleet was abroad, but is "now put into the proper way of being done as "soon as may be.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

"I look upon the future well-being of this "kingdom to depend upon the result of your "councils and determinations at this time; and "the benefit will be double by the speed of "your resolutions, inasmuch that I hope you "will agree with me in this conclusion, that "whoever goes about to obstruct or divert your "applications to these matters, preferably to "all others, can neither be my friends, nor
 "the kingdom's."

Both Houses began with addresses of thanks and congratulation to the King and Queen, in which they set forth the sense they had of their great care of their people; of their courage and good government, in the highest expressions that could be conceived, with promises of standing by them, and assisting them with every thing that should be found necessary for the publick service (1).

The

(1) As these addresses seem not only to express the sense of both Houses, but of the whole nation (except the disaffected) at that time, the substance of them is here inserted. The Lords began with their address to the King, wherein they expressed, "How "extremely sensible they were of the great benefit and "advantage his late expedition into Ireland had pro"cured to all his subjects in general, and also the "success of his arms in that kingdom; which was,
 "under God, owing to his Majesty's personal valour

"and conduct. Wherefore they thought it their "duty to return him their humble and hearty thanks
 "for all those signal evidences he had given of his ex"traordinary affection for his people, which had car"ried him, on so many occasions, to venture a life,
 "that was so dear to them, and to despise all hazards
 "to procure the settlement of his kingdoms, the peace
 "and quiet of his subjects, and the establishment of "their religion. And as it was not possible but so "much bravery of mind, such an undaunted courage,
 "and

1690. The same day these addresses were presented, the Commons, to make good their affections of affection to the government, and their promises of assistance (1), voted, pursuant to an estimate laid before them of the next year's charges, a supply of money for the use of the government that ever had

"and an heart so exalted above any apprehensions in the midst of all dangers, must gain his Majesty the admiration and reverence of all the world, and even of his enemies themselves, who had felt the effects of so great virtues; so they did not doubt, but that such extraordinary qualities must unite the hearts of all his people in such a tenderness, as well as duty, for his royal person, as was necessary for the finishing what his Majesty had so gloriously begun."

The next day their Lordships also acknowledged the great advantage, which the nation had received by the eminent resolution, as well as prudence, which her Majesty had shewn in the absence of the King, and in such circumstances of difficulty, as would have discomposed a mind, that had not been raised above them, as her Majesty had approved her's to be, by this undeniable evidence. And they declared, that her Majesty having preserved the quiet and peace of the Kingdom, by her prudent administration, against the dangers threatened by a powerful enemy, the remembrance of such extraordinary virtue must ever dwell in their minds, and engage them in justice, upon all occasions, to express their gratitude, as became her Majesty's most dutiful subjects."

The Commons likewise on the 9th of October represented to the King, "their grateful sense of that unparalleled goodness and tender affection to his people, which for the rescuing his kingdom of Ireland from a tyrannous and foreign yoke, and for his subjects of this kingdom of the excessive charge of a lingering war, had induced his Majesty to undertake a hazardous voyage, and to expose to all the dangers of war that invaluable life, upon which the whole Protestant interest, and the common liberty of Europe did so much depend. That it was, next under God, to his conduct and example, that they must ascribe the success of the expedition, and to which they must owe their hopes of the speedy and entire reduction of that kingdom, and of seeing themselves in a condition to make their enemies sensible of the strength and power of England under a King, who knew and pursued its interest. They most heartily congratulated his Majesty's success, and safe return to his people, who were unanimously persuaded, that their peace, security, and happiness, were bound up in his safety. And they did in the name of all the Commons in England assure him, that they would be ever ready to assist him to the utmost of their power; and, as the best and truest way of expressing their gratitude, would endeavour effectually to support his government against all his enemies."

In their address to the Queen, on the same day, they expressed the "deep sense they had of that goodness, wisdom, and courage, which her Majesty had manifested in the greatest difficulties and pressing dangers, during the King's absence, at a time when a potent enemy was upon the coast, when the nation was weakened in that part, which was its proper strength, and deprived of the security of his Majesty's presence. They declared, that the resolution, which her Majesty shewed in the administration, gave life to her subjects, and made them exert a strength and force unknown to the former reigns: That her zeal for the publick encouraged them to shew such cheerfulness in their duty, as disappointed the hopes and designs of all the open and secret enemies of the government; and that the grateful remembrance of this, which renewed the memory of the most happy times, would for ever remain in the hearts of her people, and could never fail to be expressed in all instances of loyalty and obedience from themselves and all the Commons of

(1) This favourable disposition of the Commons and the posture of affairs at that time, will appear from the following original letter of Bishop Burnet to his cousin Mr. Johnston, Envoy extraordinary at the Court of Berlin, dated from London, October 14, 1690.

"I have been now a week in town, and have had leisure and opportunities to inform myself of our affairs, and of the temper of people's minds among us; and I must freely own to you, that I was never more surprized in my whole life than I am, to see the House of Commons in such a temper. All that I know, say plainly, they dare not go back into their country, if they do not give money liberally. So they have already voted above four millions for the fleet, the land-army, and the ordnance; and they seem to be in a disposition to give what is necessary for clearing the revenue of anticipations. The article of the fleet met with no opposition; and there were only two no's to that of the land-army, which were Seymour and Charles. There will probably be a land-tax of eighteen months in the old way of assessment, but double at one hundred and forty thousand pounds a month, and a poll-bill; but how the rest will be raised, is not yet so visible; for they seem still extreme averse to any thing, that looks like an excise. In a word, the French fleet, by lying so long on our coast, as it then did us no harm, so now produces such effects, as if we had brought them thither; since it has both united and animated the nation to a degree beyond any thing, that the most sanguine could ever have promised themselves. And the King's behaviour in Ireland, as well as King James's meanness, has made so wonderful a change in all men's minds with relation to them both, that we seem now not to be the same people, that we were a year ago, and the nation seems resolved to support the King in the war, to the utmost, to which it can possibly stretch itself. I pray God give us such success next year against France, as we have had this year in Ireland; and then we may hope quickly to see happy days."

"The business of the Earl of Torrington will now be, as I believe, speedily dispatched; for our house has already voted that a Peer has no privilege to exempt him from being tried by a court martial. But there is some difficulty in this, whether the Commissioners of the Admiralty have the power of a Lord Admiral, since the act for a court martial speaks only of a Lord Admiral; and it is probable the matter cannot be legally settled without naming a Lord Admiral pro tempore."

"I do not see any other thing, that is like to give the House any great disturbance this session; so by all appearance, it will be a calm and by consequence a short one."

"Dr. Sherlock's taking the oaths has very much disturbed the Jacobite-party, for they had set him up in their thoughts as the chief writer of their party. The Bishops, who have hitherto stood out, seem still more positive than ever; and I make no doubt but that matter will be settled as the session of Parliament is at an end. All the accounts we have from Ireland seem to assure us, that the rebels will be forced to submit long before the winter is done, or perish for want of all things. There begins to be already both a face of trade and justice there, and that Ireland, by the total depression of the Irish, will be within four or five years in a better condition than ever."

"The feebleness of the motions of the confederates all this year has much exalted France, but I hope we shall see another scene next year. The King intends to go over to Holland as soon as his affairs here will admit of it. I have now told you every thing relating to our affairs, that occurs to me, and have not writ to you as to a minister, that must 1690. had been asked by a King of England for the maintenance of the navy and army (1). The funds proposed for raising this sum were agreed to and settled (2), but proving deficient, it was resolved, 'That the sum of one million be raised, upon the credit, or by the sale of the forfeited estates in Ireland, and that an address be presented to his Majesty, that he would be pleased to command the commissioners in Ireland, to make a return of the names of the persons in rebellion in that kingdom, and of their estates and value thereof; and that the same might be transmitted to the House of Commons.' This address was drawn up and reported to the House by Sir Thomas Clarges, but upon the question it was rejected. However, it was resolved, that a bill be brought in for attainting the persons, that had been in rebellion in England or Ireland, and for confiscating their estates, and applying the same to bear the charge of the war. Near six weeks passed before any progress was made in this bill; but it being at last presented to the House, a clause was brought in to empower the King to grant away a third part of those confiscated estates, to such as had served in the war; and to give such articles and capitulations, to those who were in arms, as he should think fit. But this clause was rejected, and upon the bill many petitions were offered, by the creditors of some, and the heirs of others, who had continued faithful to the government, and desired proviso's for their security. But the House seeing, that there was no end of petitions for such proviso's, rejected them all, imitating in this too much the Parliament, which King James held at Dublin, in which about three thousand persons had been attainted without proof or process, only because some of them were gone over to England, and others were absconded or informed against in Ireland. At length the bill, with several amendments, being passed, was sent up to the Lords, who thought themselves bound in justice to hear all petitions; upon which the bill was like to be clogged with many proviso's; and the matter must have held long. But to stop this, the King sent a message to the Commons, and spoke to the same purpose afterwards from the throne to both Houses. He promised that he would give no grants of any confiscated estates, but would keep that matter entire, for the consideration of another session of Parliament. By this declaration the King intended only to assure them, that he would give none of those estates to his courtiers or officers; but he thought he was still at liberty to pass such acts of Grace, or grant such articles to the Irish, as the state of his affairs should require.

About this time Captain James Campbell, a Scots Gentleman, brother to the Earl of Argyle, assisted by Archibald Montgomery and Sir John Johnston, forcibly seized on Mrs Mary Warton, a rich heiress of about thirteen years of age, and carried her away from her parents in Great Queen-street, and married her against her will. Upon this a proclamation was issued for comprehending Captain Campbell and his abettors. Not long before there had been a bill brought into the House of Commons, to prevent clandestine marriages; and it was imagined, that the passing of it would have been forwarded by the violence committed by Campbell. But upon consideration, that this bill was attended with many inconveniencies, and might hinder younger brothers

' must lie for his country, but with the plain simplicity of truth. I am with all possible affection and esteem &c.

' The conspiracy in Scotland has been a safe and foul one; and I doubt very many have been concerned in it. Every thing is confessed and known, though I do not yet hear, that there are legal proofs and discoveries, that will be witnesses. But that matter will be laid open as soon as the money bills are in good forwardness. There is also another discovery will be made, of which I know no particular; but I am fully assured from good hands, that it will give a full satisfaction concerning the importure of the pretended Prince of Wales.

' The Presbytery of Scotland proceeds with so blind a fury, that as they are turning out all the Episcopal Clergy, so they will raise a flame here, which may obstruct the King's business in England, and may very much increase the animosities, that are amongst us.

' Every body is most mightily pleased with my Lord Sidney in Ireland.

' I have now brought Mr Allix to Salisbury, who is hard at work upon an edition of the Councils, in four Volumes.

(1) For the navy and building of new ships was granted the sum of 1,791,695 l. and for the maintenance of an army of 69,636 men, the sum of 2,294,560 l.

(2) The money bills were,

1. An act for doubling the duty of excise upon beer, ale, and other liquors, during the space of one year, ending Novemb. 17. 1691.

2. An act for certain impositions upon all East India goods and manufactures, and upon all wrought silks, and several other goods to be imported after the 25th of December 1690, to November 10. 1695.

No. 11. Vol. III.

3. An act for granting an aid of 1,651,702 l. 18 s.

4. An act for the continuance of several former acts therein mentioned, for the laying several duties upon wines, vinegar, and tobacco. The acts continued here, are that of the duties upon wines and vinegar, and that of tobacco and sugar, both 1 James II. namely,

	l.	s.	d.
For every tun of French wine and vinegar imported	8	0	0
For every tun of Spanish wines imported	12	0	0
For every pound of tobacco from our plantations	0	0	3
— of Spanish or foreign tobacco	0	0	6

These duties were granted to King James, from June 24. 1685, to June 24. 1693, and now continued from that time to the 20th of June 1696.

5. An act for encouraging the distilling of brandy and spirits from corn, and for laying several duties on low wines or spirits of the first extraction, viz.

Every gallon of low wines of the first extraction drawn from foreign materials	0	0	8
From brewers wash or tilt	0	1	0
From drink made of malted corn	0	0	1
From cyder or perry	0	0	3

This act begins December 24. 1690, and was to end December 25. 1695.

6. An act for several additional duties of excise upon beer, ale, and other liquors, for four years, to begin when the act for doubling the excise ends.

1690. brothers from making their fortunes, it was Dec 5. dropped in silence. However, another bill was brought in, for making void the marriage between Mrs Wharton and Mr Campbell; which, notwithstanding the Earl of Argyle's petition in his brother's behalf, passed through both Houses (1).

As there were no grievances to inflame the House, (by which in former reigns the most promising beginnings of some sessions had often miscarried) great dispatch had been used in granting the supplies, for which the King gave them thanks, assuring them that he would take care to see the money diligently and strictly applied to the uses for which it was given; and desiring them at the same time, to finish with the utmost expedition what business remained to be done, because the posture of affairs abroad required his presence at the Hague.

However, some began to complain of a mismanagement of the publick money: but the ministry put a stop to that, by moving for a bill for appointing and enabling commissioners for examining into the publick accounts, giving them authority to bring all persons, whom they should have occasion for, before them, and to tender them an oath to discover their knowledge of such things, as they should ask of them.
This was like the power of a court of inquisition;
but how unusual soever such a commission was, it seemed necessary to grant it for the filencing all scandalous reports. In the House of Commons the method of appointing these commissioners was, that the several members put into glasses at the table the several lists of nine persons names; and the choice fell upon Sir
Dec. 22. Peter Rich, Sir Thomas Clarges, Mr Paul Foley, Colonel Robert Auzon, Sir Matthew Andrews,
Sir Benjamin Newland, Sir Samuel Barnadiston, Sir Peter Colleton, and Mr Robert Harley. When the bill was carried up to the House of Lords, it was moved, that since the Commons had named none but members of their own House,
the Lords should add some of their number.
This was done by ballot; and the Earl of Ro- chester having made the motion, the greatest number of ballots were for him. But he refused to submit to this with so much firmness, that the other Lords, who were named with him, seemed to think they were in honour bound to do the same; and therefore as no Peer would suffer himself to be named, the bill passed as it was sent up.

Many complaints were made of the illegal commitments of persons suspected of high-treason, though there was nothing sworn against them. But the danger was so apparent, that the House of Commons made a precedent for securing a ministry, that should do the like upon the like necessity, and yet maintained the Habeas Corpus Act, for they indemnified the ministry for all that had been done contrary to that act.

Great complaints were brought over from Ireland, where the King's army was almost as heavy on the country, as the Rapparees. There was a great arrear due to them; for which reason, when the King settled a government in Ireland of three Lords Justices, he did not put the army under their civil authority, but kept them in a military subjection to their officers;

for he said, that since the army was not regularly paid, it would be impossible to keep them from mutiny, if they were put under strict discipline, and punished accordingly. The under-officers, finding that they were only answerable to their superior officers, took great liberties in their quarters, and instead of protecting the country, oppressed it. The King had brought over an army of seven thousand Danes, under the command of a very gallant Prince, one of the Dukes of Wirtemberg; but they were cruel friends, and thought they were masters. Nor were the English troops much better. The Dutch were the least complained of. Ginckle, who had the chief command, looked strictly to them; but he did not think it convenient to put those of other nations under the same severe measures.
But the pay due for some months, being now sent over, the orders were changed; and the army was made subject to the civil government.
Yet it was understood, that instructions were sent to the Lords Justices, to be cautious in the exercise of their authority over them; so that the country still suffered much by these forces.

There was an important debate moved in the House of Lords, by those, who intended to revive the old impeachment against the Marquis of Carmarthen, namely, 'Whether impeachments continued from Parliament to Parlia'ment; or whether they were not extinguisht
'ed by an act of Grace.' Some antient precedents were brought to favour this by those, who intended to keep them up; but in all those precedents there had been an order of one Parliament to continue them on to the next. For this reason they did not come up to the present case; and how doubtful soever it was, whether the King's pardon could be pleaded in bar to an impeachment, yet since the King had sent an act of Grace, which had passed in the first session of this Parliament, it seemed very unreasonable to offer an impeachment against an act of Parliament. All this discovered a design against the Marquis, who was believed to have the greatest credit both with the King and Queen, and was again falling under an universal hatred. In a House of Commons every motion against a minister is apt to be well entertained:
some envy him; others are angry with him;
many hope to share in the spoils of him; and a love of change, a wantonness of mind, make the attacking a Minister a diversion to the rest.
The scheme was well formed, and fourteen leading men had undertaken to manage the matter against the Marquis; in which the Earl of Shrewsbury had the chief hand, who had a very bad opinion of the Marquis, and thought his advices would, in conclusion, ruin the King and his affairs. But a discovery being at this time made of Lord Preston's plot, and managed chiefly by the Marquis's means, it put an end to the designs against him for the present.

1690-1. The King being impatient to be at the congress in Holland, came January 5. to the House of Lords, and having passed all the bills that were ready, made this speech to both Houses:

My Lords and Gentlemen,

The King's speech.
 I. H. C. II. 338.
 Having only told you, that it would be necessary for me to go into Holland much about this time, I am very glad to find that the success of your endeavours to bring this session to a happy conclusion has been such, that I am now at liberty to do it. And I return you my hearty thanks for the great dispatch you have made in finishing the supplies you have designed for carrying on the war, which it shall be my care to see duly and punctually applied to that service, for which you have given them. And I do likewise think it proper to assure you, that I shall not make any grant of the forfeited lands in England and Ireland, till there be another opportunity of settling that matter in Parliament in such manner, as shall be thought most expedient.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

As I have reason to be very well satisfied with the Proofs you have given me of your good affections in this session of Parliament, so I promise myself the continuance of the same at your return into your several countries. And as every day produces still fresh instances of the restlessness of our enemies, both at home and abroad, in designing against the prosperity of this nation, and the Government established; so I cannot doubt, but that the union and good correspondence between me and my Parliament, and my earnest and constant endeavours on the one hand, joined with the continuance of your zeal and affection to support me on the other, will, by the blessing of God, be at all times too strong for the utmost malice and contrivance of our common enemies.

And then the Lord Chief Baron Atkins Speaker of the House of Lords, declared to both Houses, that it was his Majesty's pleasure, that they should adjourn themselves until the 31st of March next; and that if his Majesty should think fit, that the Parliament should then sit, he would give them timely notice thereof by proclamation (1).

On the 15th of November the King ordered a new commission to pass the Great Seal, constituting the Lord Godolphin, Sir John Lowther, Mr Richard Hampden, Sir Stephen Fox, Mr Thomas Pelham, Commissioners of their Majesty's treasury. About a month after, his Majesty disposed of the vacant Bishopricks of Ireland, and appointed Sir Charles Porter to be Lord Chancellor of that Kingdom, and one of the Lords Justices, in the room of the Lord Viscount Sidney, who was recalled to be made one of the Secretaries of State on the 26th of December; in the beginning of which month Colonel John Cuts was made Baron Cuts of Gewran, in the Kingdom of Ireland. On the 30th of the same month George William, Duke of Zell, eldest Prince of the House of Brunswick and Lunenbourg, was made a Knight of the Garter; an honour which just a year before had been conferred upon the Elector of Brandenburg, afterwards King of Prussia. And on the 1st day of January 1690-1, Sir John Trevor, Speaker of the House of Commons, and first Commissioner of the Great Seal was admitted into the Privy Council.

The King having settled affairs at home, began his voyage for Holland on the 6th of January, notwithstanding the rigour of the season, and lay that night at Sittingborne; intending to embark the next evening at Margate. But finding, upon his arrival at Canterbury, that the wind was set in Easterly with a hard frost, he returned to Kensington on the 9th, and seven days after he set out again from Whitehall, and embarked at Gravesend, with a numerous retinue under a convoy of twelve men of war commanded by Rear-admiral Rooke, on the 18th in the morning, the vessels that attended his Majesty, being come up with the Goree, he was informed by a fisherman, that they were within a league and a half of the shore, whereupon being weary of the sea, he left his yacht, attended by the Duke of Ormond, the Earl of Devonshire Lord Steward, the Earl of Dorset Lord Chamberlain,

(1) Besides the acts mentioned, others passed this session were:

1. An act for reviving a former act for regulating the measures and prices of coals for seven years, from December 1. 1690. Sea coals by this act are to be sold by the chaldron of thirty-six bushels. Other sorts of coals by the hundred weight Averdupois. The Lord Mayor of London and the Court of Aldermen, and the Justices of Peace of the several counties, or any three of them, are empowered to set the prices of coals as shall be sold by retail, as they shall judge reasonable.

2. An act for paving and cleansing the streets in the cities of London and Westminster, and other places within the weekly bills of mortality, and for regulating the markets therein.

3. An act for raising the militia for the year 1691.

4. An act for preventing vexatious suits against such as acted for their Majesty's service in the cause of the kingdom. This act was passed, because the Privy Council, and other Lords and Gentlemen being magistrates and officers, had, whilst the French were upon the coast, apprehended several suspected persons, and raised the militia, otherwise than was authorized by the laws.

By a private act the proprietors of the water-works in York buildings were incorporated.

Besides the acts that were passed, there were several bills, as well as that for the forfeited estates in Ireland, which were left unfinished, particularly a bill to regulate trials in cases of treason, which was much talked of in the House of Commons, and yet was deferred from time to time: Another to oblige the Lords Commissioners of the Treasury to take the like oaths as the Lord Treasurer: Another relating to the African trade: Another against robbers on the highway: Another for the speedier determining elections of members of Parliament: Another to charge the estate of the late Lord Jessfres in Leicestershire with the sum of 14760*l.* and interest, to Edmund Prideaux: Another for regulating and licensing hackney coaches: And another for the enabling chirurgeons to administer inward medicines in cases of chirurgery; which was petitioned against by the physicians and apothecaries. A bill was also brought in for reducing interest money from six, to four per cent. which after a second reading was rejected.

The seamen themselves were afraid, as the frost had been very severe, and the ice near the shore was so great, as made it dangerous to attempt landing; and all the persons of quality about his Majesty would have dissuaded him from that attempt. But nothing being able to move him from his resolution, they put away from the fleet, and quickly lost sight of it. Night came on, and the King remained for eighteen hours exposed to the injuries of the air and cold, to the mercy of the sea, and the chance of privateers, having nothing but his cloak to cover him; and the sea ran so high, that he and all his company were washed with the waves; tho' neither he nor any of them were the worse for all this cold and wet weather; and when the seamen seemed apprehensive of their danger, he said in a very intrepid manner, What are you afraid to die in my company? At last the shallop, by break of day, came near the Isle of Goree, where the King went ashore, and got a little refreshment in a fisherman's cottage.

Then he went into the boat again, and about two in the afternoon landed at Oranien-Haak not far from Meilandstuyts. At Houndslardyeke he was received by Van Opdam, Belard, Wutzen, and Urylery, appointed by the States for that purpose; and about six in the evening he arrived at the Hague. The States General, the States of Holland, the Council of State, the other colleges, the congress of foreign ministers, and all the persons of distinction at the Hague, made their compliments to him upon his safe arrival; and because he was come so suddenly, as to prevent the solemn reception, that was intended by the magistrates of that place, he was prevailed upon to make his public entry on the 26th, which was performed with great solemnity, several triumphal arches having been erected to represent his achievements, and all the Burghers appearing in arms with unusual magnificence, 1690-1. In the evening the fire-works were played and the cannon discharged on the Vierberg opposite to his palace, and bonfires lighted through the whole town. Two days after the King went to the assembly of the States-General, then to the States of Holland, and lastly to the Council of State: He made a speech to each of those assemblies. He told the States General that the last time he was with them, he had declared his intention of going over to England, to deliver that Kingdom, from the evils with which it was threatened. That God had so blessed his just intentions, that he had met with success even beyond his hopes. That the English having offered him the crown, he had accepted it, as God was his witness; not out of ambition, but solely to preserve the religion and laws of the three Kingdoms, and to be able to assist his allies, and especially the United-Provinces against the power of France. That he could have wished to have aided them sooner, but was prevented by the affairs of Ireland, which being now in a better condition, he was come to concert measures with the allies, and to exercise the functions of Stadtholder. The rest of his speech consisted of expressions of his zeal and affection for the Republick. He was answered with the respect and acknowledgment due to a Prince, who was looked upon as the father of his country, the deliverer of Europe, the preserver of the Protestant religion, and the foul of the Grand-alliance.

After this was opened the most glorious congress, that ever yet appeared of Christian Princes and ministers, who were assembled at the Hague, to concert measures with King William, for the defence of the liberties of Europe, against the encroachments of France (1). King William in a very pathetic speech represented to them; that the imminent dangers, wherein they found themselves, sufficiently discovered the errors, that had been committed; so that he 1690 1. 'needed not use many arguments to shew them the necessity of taking juster and better measures. That in the circumstances they were in, it was not a time to deliberate, but act. That the enemy was master of all the chief fortresses, that were the Barrier of the common liberty; and that he would quickly possess himself of all the rest, if a spirit of division, slowness, and particular interest, continued among them: That every one ought to remain persuaded, that their respective particular interests were comprised in the general one. That the enemy's forces were very strong, and that they would carry all things, like a torrent, before them. That it was in vain to oppose complaints, and fruitless clamours, or unprofitable protestations against injustice.

'That it was neither the resolution of a barren Diet, nor the hopes of some men of fortune, arising from frivolous foundations, but soldiers, strong armies, and a prompt and sincere union between all the forces of the allies, that must do the work; and that these too must be brought to oppose the enemy without any delay, if they would put a stop to his conquests, and snatch out of his hands the liberty of Europe, which he held already under an heavy yoke. And that as for himself, he would not spare his credit, forces, or person, to concur with them in so just and necessary a design; and would come in the spring at the head of the troops faithfully to make good his Royal word, which he had so solemnly engaged to them.' 1690-1.

This speech from a Prince, in whom they all confided, had so good effect, that they came to a resolution of employing two hundred twenty two thousand men against France; of which the King of England was to furnish twenty thousand, and the rest of the Princes and States in proportion (1).

But notwithstanding the large quota's promised by divers Princes and States of Germany, England and Holland were forced to pay them, and to bear the burthen of the war. The congress determined likewise the operations of the next campaign; and though the Duke of Savoy was then reduced very low, King William took such care of him, and both furnished, as well as procured him such supplies, that his affairs had quickly a more promising aspect. Things were concerted among the Princes themselves, and were kept so secret, as they did not trust them to their ministers; at least, the King did not communicate them to the Earl of Nottingham, as he protested solemnly to Bishop Burnet, when he returned to England. The Princes shewed the King all the respects that any of their rank ever paid to a crowned head; and they lived together in such an easy freedom, that points of ceremony occasioned no disputes among them, though those are often, upon less solemn interviews, the subjects of much quarrelling, and interrupt more important debates (2).

The

(1) The Emperor was to furnish twenty thousand, the King of Spain in Flanders twenty thousand; the States General thirty five thousand; the Duke of Savoy and the Troops of Milan twenty thousand; the Elector of Bavaria eighteen thousand; the Elector of Saxony twelve thousand; the Landgrave of Hesse eight thousand; the Circles of Suabia and Franconia ten thousand; the Duke of Wirtemberg six thousand; the Elector of Brandenburg twenty thousand; the Prince of Liege six thousand; the Bishop of Munster seven thousand; the Elector Palatine four thousand; and the Prince of Lunenburg sixteen thousand.

(2) The following declaration was generally said to have been agreed upon at the congress, though some of the articles seem doubtful: 'Since we look upon the union, that is between us, as the work of God alone, it is but reasonable that we should make a solemn protestation to him, to deliberate nothing in this assembly, but what may be very just and equitable. We solemnly protest before God, that our intentions are, that we will never break off this union, nor make any peace with Lewis XIV, 'till the following articles be executed, to the execution of which we oblige ourselves for ever.

'I. 'Till he has made reparation to the Holy See for whatsoever he has acted against it; and 'till he has annulled and made void all those infamous proceedings against the holy father Innocent XI.

'II. 'Till he has restored to each party concerned what he has taken since the peace of Munster; and 'till he has demolished Brisac, and delivered up the country of Cœcy to the canton of Bern.

'III. 'Till he has restored to the Protestants all their possessions and goods; and 'till there be an entire liberty of conscience throughout the whole extent of the French dominions.

'IV. 'Till the estates of the kingdom be re-established in their antient liberties, so that the Clergy, the Nobility, and the Third Estate, may enjoy their antient and lawful privileges; and 'till the Kings, for the future, shall be obliged to call together the said estates, when they desire any supply, No. II. Vol. III.

'without the consent of whom they shall not raise any money, after any manner, or for any pretence whatsoever.

'V. 'Till the tax upon salt, that upon the third estate, and an infinite number of other unreasonable taxes and impositions, be abolished for ever.

'VI. 'Till he has restored to the Parliaments their antient and rightful authority; that so they might be enabled to distribute to every one justice freely, and without constraint, according to their consciences.

'VII. 'Till all the towns of the kingdom be re-established in their antient privileges, and till their revenues be restored, which had been taken from them with such violence and injustice.

'God, who knows the intention of our hearts, knows, that we bear no hatred against the French nation; and that we do not aspire to have the lawful dominions of the kingdom of France. And if all those, who are inhabitants, would join with us, we should soon dispatch this affair without effusion of blood, and without desolation of the kingdoms. And we promise all those, that shall do it, that we will treat them as our particular friends, and preserve their towns and possessions, as if they were our own. And as for those, that shall not do it, we shall look upon them as persons, that have approved and abetted all these persecutions, burnings, and other devastations, that have been made; and we will make them feel, without mercy, those pains and torments, which they have been the occasion of, that so many poor people have suffered.

'We were willing, that the whole world should have a perfect knowledge of our resolutions, particularly the French Gentlemen and persons of honour, who are oppressed with the heavy load of the government, and can no longer endure the slavery, which they lie under; to the end they may be able to take such measures, as may be assisting to us in recovering for them their antient liberty, which has been so cruelly and so unjustly taken from them.'

Mons besieged by the French.
1691.

The congress broke up about the beginning of March; but the early and unexpected motions of the French, not only put a sudden stop to King William's journey for England, but likewise convinced the confederates of the truth of what he had said to them in his speech, that it was not a time to deliberate, but to act; a maxim which the King of France knew best how to practise. For on the 5th of March a detachment of French cavalry invested the strong city of Mons, before which place his most Christian Majesty arrived himself six days after, accompanied by the Dauphin, the Duke of Orleans, and the Duke of Chartres. The next day the trenches were opened; and the besiegers raised large batteries, and with threescore pieces of cannon, and five and twenty mortars, made prodigious havoc in the town. The garrison within consisted of about six thousand horse and foot, commanded by the Prince de Bergue, who was not wanting in his duty; but notwithstanding the vigorous resistance of the besieged, the French were advanced so far by the 22d of March, that having filled up the ditch of an imperfect horn-work on the south side of the town towards the gate of Barlemont, they boldly assaulted that out-work, and after the loss of a great number of men, began to make a lodgement upon it. Upon this the besieged, headed by some of their bravest officers, attempted to beat them off, and in effect obliged the workmen, and the grenadiers, that supported them, to give way; but at last the assailants regained their post, drove the enemy into the town, and pushed on the siege with so much the more vigour, as they were informed, that the King of England was advancing to raise it.

Mar. 11.

The King, upon the news of the siege, returned from Loo to the Hague, from whence he dispatched Prince Waldeck to Hall near Brussels, where the forces, that were drawing together for the relief of Mons, had their general rendezvous. From thence the King went to Breda, having before his departure named the general officers, who were to command in the army; and on the 27th of March arrived at Hall, where though he had an army of near fifty thousand men, yet he found that, through the neglect of the Spaniards, there was nothing provided for his expedition, not so much as even the necessary carriages.

rendered.

In the mean time the siege of Mons was carried on but with indifferent success; for the French had only gained an horn-work, and there still remained two half-moons for them to take before they could come to the counterescarp of the place; and in the attack, which they made upon one of these half-moons, they were repulsed with considerable loss. But the Burghers being terrified by the enemy's bombs, which had burnt part of the town, and their fears being improved by the influence of their Priests, the principal of them with two Abbots went to the Governor, and pressed him to capitulate. The Governor, who was confident, that he might hold out eight or ten days longer, having had but three or four hundred men killed during the siege, and wanting neither ammunition nor provisions, refused to comply with their demands. Upon this they sent a drum of their own to beat a parley, and threatened to open the gates, and deliver both him and the garrison into the besiegers hands. Things being brought to this extremity, the Governor consented at last 1691. to capitulate, and surrendered the town on very honourable conditions. Whereupon King William immediately left the army, returned to the Hague, embarked for England, and arrived safely at Whitehall on the 13th of April.

The chief transaction during the King's absence, was the discovery of a plot. Towards the latter end of the year 1689, King James King's ab-and his popish counsellors in Ireland laid the fence foundation of the Lancashire plot, having sent St. Trials, over commissioners into that and other northern P. 241.
counties to raise an army, which that King engaged himself to head in person in August 1690. But the plot being discovered by some of the confederates, and soon after effectually suppressed by his defeat at the Boyne; another project was set on foot by the Jacobites in England, who thought the opportunity of the King's going to the congress at the Hague was not to be lost. They fancied it would be easy, in his absence, to bring about the restoration of King James, now that there was so small a force left in the kingdom, and the nation so incensed at a burthen of four millions in taxes. The men that laid this design were the Earl of Clarendon, the Bishop of Ely, the Lord Preston, and his brother Mr Graham, and Pen the famous Quaker. It was resolved among them, that to prevent delays, some persons of Quality and known abilities should go over to France, to transact the affair for the whole party. The Lord Preston, Mr Ashton, a servant of King James's Queen, and Mr Elliot, were pitched upon for that purpose, and to carry letters, from those who had joined in the design, to King James and his Queen. The Bishop of Ely's letters were writ in a very particular stile. He undertook both for his elder brother and the rest of the family, which was plainly meant of Sancroft and the other deprived Bishops. In his letter Burnet's to the Queen he assured her of his and all their zeal for the Prince of Wales, and that they would no more part with that than with their hopes of heaven.

The Gentlemen thus appointed by the party having hired a vessel of Mrs Jane Prat, of Barking in Essex, went on board near Battle-Bridge on the 30th of December 1690; but Nicholas Prat, husband of the woman and owner of the vessel, being a man zealous for the government, had discovered all that he knew, which was only, that he was to carry some persons over to France. The notice of this was brought to the Marquis of Carmarthen, and the matter so ordered, that Lord Preston, Ashton, and Elliot, were falling down the river as far as Gravesend, when Captain Billep, who had been ordered to attend their motion, came on board on pretence of searching for and pressing seamen, and drew the three passengers out of the hold, in which they were hid. Lord Preston left his letters behind him in the hold, together with King James's signet; and Ashton took them up with a design to have thrown them into the sea, but they were taken from him, and both they and their papers were brought to Whitehall. Lord Preston's mind sunk so visibly, that it was concluded, he would not die, if confessing all he knew would save him. Ashton was more firm and sullen; and Elliot knew nothing. There was among their papers one, that contained the heads of a declaration, to be prepared,

1691. in order to be published when the French have had success at sea, with assurances of pardon, and promises to preserve the Protestant Religion and the Laws (1). The most important of all was the result of a conference between some Lords and Gentlemen, both Tories and Whigs, in which it was undertaken to prove the possibility and method of restoring King James by a French power, without endangering the Protestant religion and civil administration, according to the laws of this kingdom (2). Besides these there were some other papers and letters (3); and particularly a paper, containing 1691. undertaken to prove the possibility and method of restoring King James by a French power, without endangering the Protestant religion and civil administration, according to the laws of this kingdom (2). Besides these there were some other papers and letters (3); and particularly a paper, containing

(1) The heads of the declaration were as follow :

" That the King will return with a design of making an intire conquest of his people, is so ridiculous as well as difficult, that it needs not be spoken to.

" That the King's declaration be worded in general terms, that he will govern by the laws, that they shall be the rule of his actions; that he will endeavour to settle liberty of conscience by law, that whatsoever things were formerly done by him, which occasioned jealousies in the minds of his people, shall be left to the determination of a Parliament, to be formally and regularly called as soon as is possible.

" That he has given sufficient evidence of his unwillingness to bring an army of strangers into his Kingdom, by refusing the succours the King of France offered him, and which were even ready to be embarked upon the first notice of the Prince of Orange's intended invasion.

" That he brings with him such an army only, as is necessary for his own defence, and for the security of his loyal subjects, who shall resort to him: that he will dismiss them as soon as he shall have rid the nation of those foreigners, who have invaded it, and trampled upon the laws and liberties of his people.

" The King's large exercising his dispensing power gave the great alarm to his people, and contributed most of all toward a general defection. Yet when that power came to be debated in the last Convention, there appeared so many difficulties in the limiting of it, every body, even the present Judges, believing it necessary, that a dispensing power should be in the King, that it was left fall, and that point remains as it was. And without mentioning that or any other particular, the King can be in no danger by leaving all things, which have been the occasions of jealousies, to the determination of a Parliament, where besides the King's professed friends and servants, there will not want others, who will be glad of opportunity to ingratiate themselves."

(2) The result of the conference was as follows :

* France. " I. F. * must either oblige or conquer us: If the last he will find few helps here, but a bloodier resistance than ever the Romans, Saxons, or Normans found, it being incredible, how unanimous and obstinate that very thought renders the people, so that it may make us a heap of ruins, but no nation that can ever help or import any thing to F.

* King Lewis. " II. If K. L* desires to oblige us, and make the work easy, that he may be at leisure to ply the Empire or Italy, or to have an advantageous peace, he must take off the frightful character we have of him, and shew us he has no such design, as returning our offended K. a conqueror upon us, but that he can and will be our friend and mediator; upon which terms he will find, that many Lords and Gentlemen will speedily shew themselves to his satisfaction, especially if he makes haste, and loses no approaching opportunity.

St Ger-mains. " III. If he incline to this sort of sense, he must over-rule the bigotry of St G.* and dispose their minds to think of those methods, that are more likely to gain the nation; for there is one silly thing or other daily done there, that comes to our notice here, which prolongs what they so passionately desire.

" The methods thought upon are these :

" First, to prevent dangerous and foolish intelligence, by forbidding all in that court to write any news hither, and that King James only have his correspondence, by whom to hear from, and speak

" to people here; since letters so often miscarry, and are filled with nothing but what we should not hear, and what we have, are arguments for the most part against the King's restoration.

" Secondly, Since there is a great body of Protestants, that never defected, and that many thousands are returning, and that they are the natural weight and power of these Kingdoms, by having the heads, hands, and wealth of their side, to the odds and advantage of at least two hundred protestants to one catholic; the K. may think of nothing short of a Protestant administration, nor of nothing more for the Catholics, than a legal liberty of conscience; for much a mutt* is against all other notions, to * Mathe. which all private passions and artificial frames in maticks. Government must yield or break. He may reign a Catholic in devotion, but he must reign a Protestant in Government. Cromwell could not, yet on a broader bottom, with a victorious army, subsist or keep what he had got.

" Thirdly, he must give us a model of this at St G. by preferring the Protestants, that are with him, above the Catholics; one being loyal upon less ties of interest, and to tell the nation here what they are to hope for when he comes.

" Fourthly, he must give encouragement to Lords and Gentleman here to come to him, at least seven or nine for a standing council, which will make us here think he is in some degree ours again, and that we have a relation to him, and some interest and share in him, by the men of quality of our own religion, that are with him. This will incomparably facilitate the matter here; nor will they, when they come, come empty, and in their own names, which is still better, and will be more satisfactory there.

" Fifthly, to induce this, English protestants should be encouraged by an edict of liberty from the K. of F. to have chapels at their own cost, in which to worship God after their respective ways, by which that King will make us reflect upon his conduct towards his Huguenots, rather to flow from the hazard he thought himself in by their anti-monarchical and refusing principles, than a desire of persecution.

" Lastly, all other requisite measures depending upon the acceptance this finds, an answer hereunto is impatiently desired by those, that have discoursed the K's. business to this maturity. So ended with an unanimous consent both Tories and Whigs upon this occasion, that are in a way of closing in his interest."

The following letters were directed in false names, and are most of them written under divers cants, as under the colour of trade, law-suits, mortgages, &c. yet evidently relate to King James's restoration. The two first were supposed to be written by Dr Turner, Bishop of Ely.

To Mr Redding.

SIR,

"Though the bearer of this will do us the justice to assure you, we are as full of duty, as unfeignedly and unconcernedly yours, as yourself could wish; yet this Gentleman has undertaken. — You will forgive the presumption, if I do myself the honour to give you this fresh assurance in a few words, which I hope we do by our accounts. I shall omit no occasions, not neglecting the least, and making zealous wishes for the greatest, to shew ourselves such as we ought to be. Sir, I speak in the plural, because I write *my elder brother's sentiments as well as my own, and the rest of the family, though lessened in number, yet if we are not mightily out in our accounts, we are growing in our interest, that is, in yours. He that delivers this, will, I hope, intirely to your satisfaction, represent us, and me in particular, as with all the devotion imaginable and unchangeable affection, Yours. God grant the happiest new year."

* This passage is supposed to mean Archbishop Sancroft and the rest of the deprived Bishops.

To Mrs Redding.

"As 'tis impossible for me to express that extraordinary great satisfaction it gave me this time twelve-months when I had the honour to receive that mark of your favour and goodness under your own hand; so I have lived in some pain for an opportunity to write you my humblest acknowledgements and trust duty, from which, by the Grace of God, I am no more capable of swerving, than of renouncing my hopes of heaven. I say this in behalf of my elder brother and the rest of my nearest relations, as well as for myself. You may entirely depend upon us, not only for a constant adherence to so well chosen a principle, but for our utmost activity to promote your interests, which are inseparable from our own. I need come to no particulars by this bearer, who can and will tell you our whole hearts;

and I wish you could see them, how sincerely they are devoted to your service. God grant you a most happy new year, and many, very many, and very happy. Our young master hath all our best wishes: he daily gains more friends, and we get ground of his adversaries.
"New year's Eve."

A letter directed for Mrs Charlton, Decem. 31. 1690.

"I must not let this bearer depart, Madam, without assuring you of my best respects. I have written by him to a friend of yours, but depend upon you to give my note credit.

"Though my creditors were no friends to the match, which has been so long in treaty, for your relations have been very hard upon me this last summer, yet as soon as I could go safely abroad, I pursued the business, and do beg you to believe, that no endeavours of mine shall be wanting to perfect the settlement. You once put me in hopes of seeing you before this Christmas. Your friends are sorry for the disappointment, pray lose no more time than is of absolute necessity. The bearer will tell you all things may now be easily settled, if the right way be taken. I long to hear how your young daughter does: the will find many friends, and I hope her portion will be well secured. God fend you a happy new year, and that I may be merry with you before it be far spent; and I beseech you, keep me in the good opinion of your friend. I will always make good what I promised to you."

A letter directed to Mr Jackson, Decem. 31. 1690.

"The bearer can give you so full an account of all things relating to your estate here, that I need not have troubled you at this time, but that I am desirous to lay hold of any opportunity I think safe, to assure you of my service; and that I will never quit your interest whatever the rest of the freeholders do. Your adversary has been so hard to his neighbours, that he has extremely dishonoured all the old tenants, and a little matter would redeem the whole estate, if you would appear in Westminster Hall yourself: the best counsel have a good opinion of your title, and will zealously pursue your instructions. I only beg you would hasten them to us, and that you will appear yourself as soon as is possible. No time should be lost and the cause may be brought to a final hearing before the end of Easter-term, if it be well solicited. I heartily wish you a happy new year, and I beg you to tell Mr Charlton, that I long to know wherein I may serve him, and that I will follow his directions to the utmost, while I live, God keep you and yours."

Decem. 31.

"The interruption of the former correspondence had a very ill effect many ways, but for that reason no opportunity ought now to be lost, and I hope this will prove a happy one.

"In trade, as well as in government, schemes must be laid; for there is no living from hand to mouth any more in commerce than in politics. Lay therefore your designs probably, and pursue them diligently, and with vigour; though it be a hazardous time, yet by venturing boldly where venturing is advisable, it often returns great profit.

"There is nothing more to be said but to give the bearer fit and full seasons to tell what he knows, both as to the goods fit for our market, and when and where to be sent. The sea will quickly grow so troublesome, that unless you dispatch what you intend for us, you will lose a great opportunity of advantage. I hope the account he has to give of our negotiation here with the merchants, that deal with us, especially those, that have lately brought us,

1691. were named (1). On the 16th, 17th, and 19th of January the Lord Preston, and Mr Aston, were us their custom, will both encourage a larger trade, and excite the utmost diligence. I will say nothing of myself; it shall be enough, that I can live in the good opinion of one I bear so great a reverence and affection for. But for this honest factor, I must own I can hardly say enough. Truth and boldness are excellent qualities in a servant, and he has shewn both, as occasion has required him to show them.

I have but one word to add, and, pray, take it as the truest mark of unalterable respect. Chuse well, but have to do but with a few; for a multitude may give, but can never keep counsel.

I shall, with more impatience than becomes me, wait the result of this; and it will be a great mark of goodness to let us have the best and safest way.

Once more, let not the season spend unprofitably, for a more likely one can hardly come than between this and the first of March. Interpret this, I pray, as no private interest of my own, or partial motion of any other persons. It is my sense, my duty, and my friendship, which will not let me prevaricate, nor suffer those I love and honour to lose so happy and pressing an occasion of advantage. With the best wishes I close up this, and am, &c.

Decemb. 31.

It is a presumption incident to those, that are any where upon the spot, to think, that they know better than those, that are not, what is fittest to be done in any occurrence. This makes me say, that now is the time to make large advantages by trading, the sea being freer than two months past, or we can hope it will be two months hence. This Gentleman is well instructed in our markets, and what the goods are we want, and when and where they shall be sent. It is most earnestly desired, that this happy opportunity may not be lost, especially by the late undertakers; and I would not for much they should receive the least disgust. They are somewhat positive in their terms; but they also say, they will be good and constant customers; and I have more than once seen the mischief of over-rating and over-staying the market. Opportunities are to be used; they cannot be given by men.

The bearer needs nothing from me to recommend him, but he is deserving in our opinion here, and many will take their measures by the usage he finds there. And indeed the pressing posture of our trading affairs will not permit more experiments.

If the several parcels arrive not, that have been promised, before the 10th of March at furthest, (especially the copper and linnen, of which the bearer will be more particular) I am satisfied we shall lose this summer's profit. I am the more pressing, because I am well assured of what I write; and if ever I judged right, it is upon this occasion.

I have said nothing of another Gentleman, that takes this opportunity to see those parts; but he has shewn a zeal and a sincerity in this affair equal to most. Yo. is not yet gone, by a misfortune; but he will follow with a good postscript in this affair. Of myself I will say nothing. I hope I need not, for nobody, without vanity, can be more sincerely and affectionately a friend and servant to the company than myself. I writ at large yesterday, and cannot write what the hand, that gives this, can say; and therefore will write no more, but that with the greatest respect I am, &c.

A Letter without direction.

S I R,

I vow to you, I do not repine at having lost all for your sake, which I got by your favour: but it grieves me extremely, that there is not that left, which can secure me from being troublesome to you; for that is the thing in the world I would not be. I have told my Lord my condition. What I desire of you, he thinks very moderate; I hope you will. Pray, Sir, be not backward in settling No. 11. Vol. III.

my little affair, for I have deserved your care. Your daughter and I must starve, if this government can make us. I hope our interests are not divided; that is, you have an equal tenderness at least for both. If you think fit to speak what I would have you to this bearer, he will give me a just account of it. You know he is obliged to be my friend, and I believe him grateful, since he ventures so boldly for you. He brings with him some merry papers. Adieu, for I dare write no more, but pray send a messenger on purpose to me, that I may exactly know what you will do, and would have me do. If you send upon no other business, there will be no danger. Pray, Sir, ask my Lord, and he will tell you, how I have been used, and upon what account. I believe you know it not.

Decemb. 29.

Your daughter is very well, very tall, and very pretty, as I am told.

Another Letter without direction.

Decemb. 31. 1690.

Was my condition more desperate and uneasy than it is, I desire no greater satisfaction than to have done my duty to so good a master. I with it was of more use to him; that is not my fault, nor of those I have acted with. Let it be looked into what has been foretold both as to England, Scotland, and Ireland, and see, if most of it is not come to pass already, and the rest will follow, if not prevented. I with it may also be considered what usage we have met with from men employed, and how they left your business and friends. How they managed it, you will know from all hands. Things they could not do, nor durst not undertake, were better undone, than not done by them, men in this place, and in these times, must have some courage as well as sense to do any thing with the people here. It is not my own ill usage makes me say this, but my concern for one I with the best in the world, and will give my proofs of this upon all occasions. I need not enlarge, since all our grievances are known to him, that brings this. For my own part, I will stay here so long as I can be safe, if with ne'er so great trouble; but it would be some comfort to know men (when driven from hence) may be so. Therefore the reports of the people's usage are terrible, as well as of the indifference of St Germ. family. We feel the smart of it by ridiculous letters falling daily into the hands of the government. Their master and mistress are little obliged by it no more than we. If there is any thing, Sir, you do particularly command me, or depend upon me for, let me know it. I cannot undertake much, nor furnish more. I have still helped every body, and paid to every thing I could; and if a twelvemonth ago my condition was what I then represented, you best know, if it has been mended. Use, and considering that of others, makes me grow more contented; and if the prospect of misery to us all was any satisfaction, that is now plainly seen.

Pray God bless us all, by restoring every man his own, and you with long life.

He, that gives you this, hath furnished for your use to me, &c. two hundred pounds, which I desire may be repaid.

I only beg, Madam, no ill malicious report may take any place in your thoughts, in regard to me. I value your good opinion, and will endeavour to deserve it. I can do little towards, but wish most heartily for your happiness. I know no interest, Madam, but my master's and your's, nor do I think they are to be made two. If you command me in any thing, I will faithfully obey you, as I ever have done him.

We all depend here upon this bearer's accounts of us and condition, his faith and courage hath been enough experienced.

(1) Short memorials in Lord Preston's own hand.

This

(1691. were brought to their trials at the Old Bailey. Their design of going to France, and the treasonable papers found upon them, were fully proved. Some of them were written in the Lord Presfon's, and some in Mr Ashton's hand. They alledged in their defence, that similitude of hands was not thought a good proof in Colonel Algernon Sidney's case. But this was now only a circumstance: In what hand soever the papers were writ, the crime was always the same, since they were open, not sealed; and consequently they knew the contents of them, and thus were carrying on a negotiation of high-treason with the king's enemies. They were therefore found guilty and condemned.

Ashton executed.

Mr Ashton would enter into no treaty with the Court, but prepared himself to die, and was accordingly executed at Tyburn on the 29th of January, the Queen having remitted that part of his sentence which related to his drawing and quartering. He suffered with great decency and firmness. He left a paper behind him, in which he owned his dependance on King James, and his fidelity to him, and affirmed, that he was sure the Prince of Wales was born of that King's Queen; but denied, that he knew of the contents of the papers, that were taken with him (1). This made some conclude, that his paper was drawn up by some other person, and too hastily copied over by himself, without making due reflection on this part of it; for Bishop Burnet compared this paper, which he gave the Sheriff, and which was written in his own hand, with those found about him, and it was visible, that both were written in the same hand.

The Lord Presfon went backward and forward; he had no mind to die, and yet was not willing to tell all he knew. He acted a weak part in all respects. When he was heated by the importunities of his friends, who were violently engaged against the government, and after he had dined well, he resolved to die heroically. But the next morning that heat went off, and when he saw death in full view, his heart failed him. The scheme he carried over was so foolish, so ill concerted, and so few engaged in it, that those, who knew the whole secret,

Lord Presfon pardoned. Burnet. Boyer.

This paper consists of many heads and particulars, without order or method, and seems to be only memorandums made by his lordship, to put him in mind what he was to enlarge upon when he came to France. It was as follows:

* Lady D. two thousand pounds, and two hundred pounds for shop-debts.

* Pension upon the

* 14 — 3 deckt ships — Britannia, ad.

* Sovereign out and R — James.

* 33 3d rates make the 14 and 30, sixty-seven.

(1) The paper at large was as follows:

* Mr Sheriff,

* Having observed, that the methods of making speeches at the place of execution were not always * attended with the designed success; and thinking it better to employ my last minutes in devotion and

* holy communion with my God, I have prepared this paper to leave in your hands, as well to assert my

* principles, as to testify my innocence.

* As to my religion, I profess by God's grace, to die in the faith, into which I was baptized, that of * the Church of England, in whose communion (nothing doubting of my salvation through the merits

* of my Saviour) I have always thought myself safe

* and 1691. cret, concluded, that if he had got safe to the Court of France, the project would have been so despised, that he must have been suspected as sent over to draw King James into a snare, and bring him into the King's hands. He was therefore pardoned. And as for Mr Elliot, there being no positive proof against him, he was not brought to a trial. Soon after, on the 25th of February 1690-1, the Queen issued out a proclamation for discovering and apprehending Dr Turner, the late Bishop of Ely, William Penn, the famous Quaker, and Mr James Graham, as accomplices of the Lord Preston and Mr Ashton; and the Earl of Clarendon was seized and committed to the Tower on the same account; but after some months, the King, in regard to that Earl's relation to the Queen, would proceed to no extremities against him, but gave him leave to live confined to his house in the country. But the Bishop of Ely, Graham and Penn absconded.

Four days before the King's arrival, a fire ^{Whitehall} happened at ^{burnt.} Whitehall, which began about eight ^{Apr. 9.} o'clock at night, by the negligence of a maid ^{MS. letter} servant, (who, to save the pains of cutting a ^{Pulney} candle from a pound, burnt it off, and threw the ^{to Sir W.} rest down carelessly before the flame was out) at ^{Calc.} the lower end of the stone gallery, in those lodgings which were the Dukes of Portsmouth's, and burnt very violently till four the next morning; during which time almost all the stone gallery and buildings behind it, as far as

and happy. According to her principles, and late much esteemed doctrine (though now unhappily exploded) I have regulated my life, believing myself obliged by my religion to look upon my rightful lawful Prince (whatever his principles were, or his practices might be), as God's vice-gerent, and accountable (if guilty of male-administration) to God only, from whom he received his power, and always believing it to be contrary to the Laws of God, the Church, and the Realm, upon any pretence whatsoever, to take up arms against him. And let all the world take notice in this belief I die. But I have more particular obligations to the King, my master, whom I had the honour to serve, and received many signal favours from him for sixteen years past; so that gratitude (a thing not much esteemed at this time) as well as duty and religion, commanded the utmost service I could pay him. And when I had these considerations, that we were born his liege subjects; that we had solemnly professed our allegiance, and often confirmed it with oaths; that his Majesty's usage, after the Prince of Orange's arrival, was very hard, severe, and (I may say) unjust; and that all the new methods of settling this nation have hitherto made it more miserable, poor, and more exposed to foreign enemies; and that the religion we pretend to be fond of preserving, is now much more than ever likely to be destroyed; there seemed to me no way to prevent the impending evils, and save these nations from poverty and destruction, but the calling home our injured sovereign, who, as a true father of his country, has (notwithstanding all his provocations and injuries) a natural love and tenderness for all his subjects. And I am so far from repining at the loss of my life, that had I ten thousand, I should rather think myself obliged to sacrifice them all, than omit any just and honest means to promote so good and necessary a work. And I advise and desire all my fellow-subjects to think of their duty, and turn to their allegiance, before the severe judgments of God overtake them for their perjury and rebellion. But certainly the good and interest of these nations, abstracted from all other considerations, will ever long convince them of the necessity of doing it.

Having thus frankly declared my principles, I know the inference will be, that I have acted accordingly, and consequently, that I am now justly condemned. But, as I ingenuously own the inference, so I as positively deny the consequence; for whatever my inclinations or actions have been, yet as to the matter I was sentenced to die for, I declare myself innocent. And I will appeal even to the Judges themselves, whether or no, upon my trial, there appeared the least proof, that I knew a title contained in the papers. But presumptions were with the Jury thought sufficient to find me guilty, though I am told I am the first man, that ever was condemned for high-treason upon bare suspicion or presumption, and that contrary to my Lord Coke's and other eminent Lawyers opinions. The knowledge of my own innocence, as to the indictment and charge against me, was that that armed me with so much assurance, and occasioned my casting my life upon the first twelve men of the panel, without challenging any. But though I have, I think, just reason to complain of the severe charge given by the Judges, and hard measure I have received; not to mention my close imprisonment, the hasty and violent proceedings against me, nor the industry used in the return of fitting persons to pass upon me; the denying me a copy of the panel, &c. Yet as I beg pardon and forgiveness at the hands of God, I do most heartily pray for, and forgive them, and all my enemies, all the world, nay even that Judge and Juryman, who did so signally (contrary to common justice) expose themselves to destroy me. But let the will of God be done; I rely wholly upon his mercy, and the merits of my blessed Saviour, for salvation. I do cheerfully and entirely resign myself into his hands, as into the hands of a faithful Creator, in sure and certain hopes of a happy resurrection. Bless, protect, and strengthen, O Lord God, my good and gracious King and master; in thy due time let the virtue, goodness, and innocence of the Queen my mistress make all her enemies blush, and silence the wicked and unjust calumnies that malice and envy have raised against her; make her and these nations happy in the Prince of Wales, whom, from unanswerable and undoubted proofs, I know to be her son. Restore them all, when thou seest fit, to their just rights, and on such a bottom, as may support and establish the Church of England, and once more make her flourish, notwithstanding the wounds she hath received of late from her perverting sons.

Forgive, forgive, O Lord, all my enemies; bless all my friends; comfort and support my dear afflicted wife, and poor babes; be thou a husband and a father to them: for their sakes only I could have wished to live; but pardon that with, O good God, and take my soul into thy everlasting glory. Amen.

JOHN ASHTON.

This paper was immediately followed by an answer to it, supposed to be written by Dr Edward Fowler, afterwards Bishop of Gloucester, in which it is observed, that there was reason to suspect that paper to have been drawn up by another hand than that of Mr Ashton; that the uncharitableness at least of the paper was unbecoming a person going out of the world; that passive obedience was not the cause of Mr Ashton's suffering, but the want of it; that King William was our only lawful sovereign then; that the measure of obedience is determined by law; that the Revolution is to be justified by several considerations; that Mr Ashton had no hard measure, since treason was proved upon him. The severity of the charge, says the answerer, lay in applying the statute 25 Eduw. III. to his fact, which was a design to carry into France sees filled.

Kennet.
Burnet.*

The King, after having given the necessary orders for the reduction of Ireland, and for fitting out a large fleet which Admiral Russel was appointed to command, bestowed his care on filling the vacant ecclesiastical dignities. He had suffered the deprived Bishops to continue, now above a year, in their Sees. They all the while neglected the concerns of the Church, doing nothing, but living privately in their palaces. Bishop Burnet had, by the Queen's order, moved both the Earl of Rocheſter and Sir John Trevor, who had great credit with them, to try, whether, in case an act could be obtained to excuse them from taking the oaths, they would proceed to discharge their functions in ordinations, institutions, and confirmations, and assist at the publick worship, as formerly. But they would give no answer; only they said, that they would live quietly, that is, keep themselves close, till a proper time should encourage them to act more openly. Upon this all thoughts of this kind were laid aside. One of the most considerable men of the party, Dr Sberlock, upon King James's going out of Ireland, thought, that this gave the present government a thorough settlement; and in that case he thought it lawful to take the oaths, and therefore not only took them himself, but publicly justified what he had done; which exposed him to very severe reproaches from those, whom he had abandoned. The discovery of the Bishop of Ely's correspondence and engagement in the name of the rest, gave the King a fair opportunity of filling the vacant sees, which he resolved to lay hold of. He judged rightly, that it was of great consequence both to his own service, and the interests of religion, to have the see of Canterbury well filled, since the rest would turn upon that.

By

France a treasonable scheme and project of an invasion, in order to deposing the King and Queen. This last the Judges declared had been always held to be High-treason. All the question then was, whether such a fact were an overt act of such a design; and so it was left to the jury, whether Mr Aſton intended to go over with such a design or not. If there be any severity here, it must be in the law; and that all those, who suffer by a law, are apt to complain of.

He particularly chargeth that Judge and that jurymen, who did, he saith, signally, contrary to common justice, expose themselves to destroy him. This is a very hard charge from a dying man, and ought to have great evidence to reconcile it to common charity; but he offers none. The jury were to act according to their consciences; and if they did so, how could they expose themselves contrary to common justice to destroy him? But what evidence told he give, that they did not so? Some have told him, that he was the first man, that was ever condemned for High-treason, upon bare suspicion or presumption, and that contrary to my Lord Coke, and other eminent lawyers opinions.

The main point as to the jury was, whether they were satisfied in their consciences, that Mr Aſton intended to go into France with such a design. And where the fact lies in the intention, there can be no direct evidence, without seeing the heart, but it must be gathered from a concurrence of circumstances strong enough to determine an honest man's judgment; and such the jury believed to be in his case. My Lord Coke's words are on the case of treason, that the compassing, intent, or imagination, though secret, is to be tried by the Peers, and to be discovered by circumstances precedent, concomitant, and subsequent, with all endeavour evermore for the safety of the King. It is true he saith afterwards ſel. 12. that conjectural presumptions, or inferences, or strains of wit, are not sufficient, but there must be good and manifest proof. Yet still this proof must be such as the thing will bear; for there can be no direct and plain proof of a secret intention. Either therefore no man can be justly condemned for a secret intention, manifested by an overt act; or there must be such a proof allowed, as is sufficient to satisfy a man's conscience, although it come not up to plain and direct evidence, as it is opposed to the highest degree of presumption.

But it may be said, that the presumption lies in judging the intention from the overt act; but that overt act must be manifestly proved. The overt act in this case was the carrying over treasonable papers into France, in order to an invasion. The sole question then was, whether there was manifest proof as to these papers. That the papers were found about him, was manifestly proved; and he owns, ſel. 110. that they were unfortunately found upon him, but he saith, that he knew not the importance of them. It was manifestly proved, that he had an extraordinary concernment to have these papers thrown overboard, which he saith was perfectly out of friendship; and whether that was a true answer, was left to the consciences of the jury, who were to judge of this by all the circumstances antecedent, concomitant, and subsequent, by which they concluded him guilty. And I cannot see, how they went against common justice therein, especially since Mr Aſton well knew, that one of the most material papers taken, was of his own hand-writing, not the first draught, but the copy, which was showed him in the court; and when it was so, he desired, ſel. 106. that the original may be read, and not the copy. And he had good reason for it; for, as far as I can judge upon perusal of both, it is the very same hand, in which this speech was written. But what said Mr Aſton to the jury to clear this matter? He saith, ſel. 129. that his hand was not proved to any of the papers, and therefore there was nothing but supposition, or suspicion against him. It is true, there was no direct and plain proof of the hand, as there was in the case of my Lord Preston, (and it is a wonder it was omitted, for that would have been plain proof of his knowing what was in those papers.) However all the other circumstances put together were a sufficient proof of his privacy to the contents of them. And I wonder how Mr Aſton could so confidently in his paper declare himself innocent as to the matter, for which he was sentenced to die; when he knew the paper was of his own hand-writing, and plain proof hath been since made of his own delivery of it to a third person. Can a man be innocent and guilty of the same thing?

The only thing to be taken notice of, which remains, is a reflection on the government for his close imprisonment, and the hasty and violent proceedings against him. If there were any thing more than usual in such cases, as to his imprisonment, he ought to have mentioned the particulars; for otherwise it is to arraign the common justice of the nation. As to the hasty and violent proceedings of his trial, it was then told him, that the greatest advantage he had was in putting off his trial; for by that he knew how to lay the papers on my Lord Preston; which yet could not clear him as to those papers, which were not written with my Lord's hand, nor related any ways to him; but one of them was written with his own hand.

(1) During the King's absence, Sir Robert Cotton of Cambridgeshire, and Mr Thomas Frankland were made Post-masters general in the room of Major Wildman, who was removed by the Queen. And Sir Edward Villiers was on the 20th of March, created Baron Villiers of Hoo, and Viscount Villiers of Harford in Kent. He was master of the horse to the Queen.

(1) This

1691. By the choice, which he was to make, all the nation would see, whether he intended to proceed with his first design of moderating matters, and healing the divisions in religion; or whether he would go into the passions and humours of a high party, that seemed to court him as abjectly as they inwardly hated him. Dr Tillotson had now been well known to him for two years; his soft and prudent counsels, and his zeal for his service, had begot both in the King and Queen a high and just opinion of him. They had both for above a year pressed him to come into this post; and he had struggled against it with great earnestness. As he had no ambition nor aspiring in his temper, so he forelaw what a scene of trouble and slander he must enter into now in the decline of his age. The prejudices, which the Jacobites would possess all people with for his coming into the room of one, whom they called a Confessor, and who began now to have the publick compassion on his side, were well foreseen by him. He likewise apprehended the continuance of that heat and aversion, which a violent party had always expressed towards him, though he had not only avoided to provoke any of them, but had, upon all occasions, done the chief of them great services, as often as it was in his power. He had large principles, and was free from superstition. His zeal had been chiefly against Atheism and Popery; but he had never shewn much sharpness against the Dissenters. He had lived in a good correspondence with many of them, and had brought several over to the Church, by the force of reason, and the softness of persuasion and good usage, but was a declared enemy to violence and severities on account of differences in religion. He laid before the King all the ill effects, which, as he thought, the promoting him would have on his service; but all this served only to increase the King's esteem of him, and fix him in his purpose. Dr Tillotson therefore, though with great uneasiness to himself, submitted to his command. Dr Simon Patrick, Bishop of Chichester, was likewise translated to the Bishoprick of Ely, in the room of Bishop Turner, and Dr Beveridge Rector of St. Peter's in Cornhill, was to be promoted to the Bishoprick of Bath and Wells, in the room of Bishop Kenn; Dr Fowler to the See of Gloucester, in the room of Bishop Frampton; Dr Cumberland to the See of Peterborough, in the room of Bishop White; Dr Moor to the See of Norwich, in the room of Bishop Lloyd; and Dr Grove to the See of Chichester, void by the translation of Bishop Patrick; and Dr Sherlock, inalter of the Temple, to the Deanery of St. Paul's; Dr Comber to the Deanery of Durham, in the room of Dr Granville; Mr. William Talbot to the Deanery of Worcester, in the room of Dr. George Hickes; and Dr Woodward to the Deanery of Sarum. Not many weeks after their Majesties nominated Dr. John Sharp, Dean of Canterbury, to the Archbishoprick of York, in the room of Archbishop Lamplugh; Dr Ironside, Bishop of Bristol, to succeed Dr. Herbert Crofts, lately deceased, in the Bishoprick of Hereford; Dr. John Hall to be Bishop of Bristol; and Dr. Richard Kidder, Dean of Peterborough, to be Bishop of Bath and Wells, Dr. Beveridge having declined that Bishoprick (1), so that in two years time the King had named fifteen Bishops; and they were generally esteemed as the most learned, the wisest, and best men, who were in the

(1) This gave great occasion to a pamphlet, printed, May 1691, intitled, A vindication of their majesties authority to fill the sees of the deprived Bishops; in a letter out of the country, occasioned by Dr. B—'s refusal of the Bishopric of Bath and Wells. It was afterwards reprinted in the collection of State Tracts published on occasion of the late Revolution in 1688, and during the reign of King William III. The author of this piece begins with observing, that Dr. Beveridge's refusal had occasioned great talk, and different censures, as men were divided in their interests and opinions; and that tho' he could easily apprehend several reasons, which might move wise and good men, where there were no greater and more pressing obligations to the contrary, rather to choose an ecclesiastical preferment void by death or cession, than by deprivation; yet 'our present circumstances, says he, are such, as ought to over-rule all niceties, the mischiefs of such a refusal being so intolerable, as nothing can excuse, much less justify it, but the absolute unlawfulness of succeeding in such preferments, while the deprived Bishop lives; which would be very odd for them to pretend, who have submitted to the present government.' He then endeavours to show, that friendship for the former incumbent is no good reason for refusing; and that such a refusal would give an unpardonable scandal both to the enemies and friends of the government, and to the government itself; and he states the Doctor's case in this manner. 'He submitted to the government, and took the oath of allegiance as early as any man; and never, that I heard, had the least scruple about it; and yet this was the time to have been scrupulous, if he would have been so; for it seems a little of the latest, when he is become a sworn subject to King William and Queen Mary, to question their authority to make a Bishop. and if the former Bishops were deprived, and new Bishops made, by such an authority as he can swear allegiance to, I cannot understand, that it can be unlawful to accept a Bishoprick from the hands of those, whom he owns, by his swearing allegiance to them, to have authority to give it; for this is an authority, which belongs to the imperial crown of England. Besides this, Dr. B— was one of those, who by commission from the Dean and Chapter of Canterbury; hath exercised Archbishopric authority, during the vacancy of the see by the deprivation of the Archbishop, as it is expressed in the commission. And I take this to be altogether as unlawful (if either of them were unlawful) to seize upon the authority of the Archbishop upon the account of his deprivation, as to take the Character, and exercise the authority of a Bishop in the see of a deprived Bishop. To receive the consecration of a Bishop, I suppose, is not the thing he accounts unlawful, nor to exercise the authority of a Bishop; and, then there is nothing he can think unlawful but to exercise the authority of a Bishop in the see of a deprived Bishop. And it seems to me as unlawful for a Presbyter to do this, as for a Bishop to do it, unless a Presbyter may do it without the revenues of the Bishoprick, but a Bishop must not do it with them. But this can be no ecclesiastical scruple, as so great a canonist must needs know; for if the civil power cannot dispose of such temporal matters, it can do nothing.'

The author remarks, that in a Christian nation and government the Church is incorporated into the state, and the sovereign power has a supremacy in all ecclesiastical causes; and that this supremacy, though it do not extend to the administration of holy offices or church censures, yet it reaches the persons and external jurisdiction of Bishops and the other Clergy, and the regulating and ordering the externals of religion; as the making and deposing Bishops, when there is just cause for it, belongs to the supremacy; which authority was exercised by the Jewish Kings over the High-priest himself: That therefore, when

And it was visible, that in all these nominations, and the filling the inferior dignities, which became void by their promotion, no ambition nor court-favour had appeared, but on the contrary men were sought for, and brought out of their retirements, and most of them very much against their own inclinations. They were remarkable for their moderate principles and calm tempers: and their promotions were such a discovery of their Majesties designs with relation to the Church, that it served greatly to remove the jealousies, which some other steps the King had made, were beginning to raise in the Whigs, and very much softened the ill humour, which was spread among them.

The King goes to the Hague.

On the last day of April the King, in pursuance of his resolution to command in person the confederate army in Flanders, set out from Kensington, embarked at Harwich on the 2d of May, set sail with a fair wind for Holland, attended by a squadron of men of war under Rear-Admiral Rooke, landed the next day near Maesland Sluice, went from thence to Hounscardick, and arrived the same evening at the Hague; where we shall leave him for a while, to see how his orders were executed in Ireland.

After both armies had gone into winter-quarters the preceding year, they remained quiet on both sides for a time; and though several designs were formed by each party against the other, yet no considerable action happened between them (1). The greatest mischief done to the English was by the Irish Rapparees, who committed great cruelties and depredations, and then retreated to their bogs and fastnesses, where the regular forces could not reach them. Nor were the Lords Justices more successful in their attempts to suppress them, either by offers of mercy to such as should submit to their Majesties obedience, or by proposing a reward for every head of a Rapparee. But now the English army having taken the field about the beginning of June, the Rapparees mixed themselves with King James's forces, with whom they must wait the fortune of war. King William's forces being considerably augmented by the addition of those troops, which under Mackay had completed the reduction of the Scots Highlanders, Lieutenant General Ginckel, commanded in chief, and decamped from Mullingar, and next day came before Ballymore: the Marquis de Ruvigny being sent before with a detachment of horse and dragoons to possess himself of a pass between that place and Athlone. The batteries being raised, the General sent a message to Colonel Burke, who commanded in the town, 'that if he and the garrison would surrender within two hours, he would save their lives, and make them prisoners of war; if not, they were to expect no mercy.' To which the Governor made an evasive kind of answer, in hopes of obtaining better terms; but the cannon and bombs having made two breaches, the pontons being put into the water, and all things ready for storming the place, it occasioned so great a consternation among the enemy, that the same evening the garrison, which consisted of seven hundred and eighty men, besides four field-officers, and two hundred and fifty-nine Rapparees, laid down their arms, and submitted at discretion.

(1) The most remarkable events, as well as the general State of Ireland, will appear from the following extracts of original letters written by Mr John Pulweny, Under-Secretary to the Lord Viscount Sidney, to Sir William Cole, Envoy extraordinary at Hanover.

S I R,

Whitehall, 24 February, 1690-1.

'Yesterday came in nine or ten mails, the last with letters of the 12th instant from Dublin. The news they bring is in substance, that Tyrconnel arrived at Limerick about the 14th of January with three frigates and nine vessels laden with provisions, clothes, some arms and ammunition; but that notwithstanding the joy, which this supply occasioned among the Irish, the officers shew but melancholy countenances, looking upon themselves to be but in an ill condition: That since the repulse of the Irish at Fermoybridge, which they attacked the 24th of January last, and were beaten off with the loss of about twenty of their men, they had drawn together again about fourteen troops of horse and dragoons, and fifteen hundred foot, and moved towards Ballymoghely under the command of Brigadier Carrol; and that thereupon Major-General Tetteau having assembled about seven hundred horse and three hundred foot from Corke and the neighbouring garrisons, marched against the rebels, who would not stand an engagement, but upon the approach of our troops fled in great confusion towards Limerick. That since Tyrconnel's arrival the rebels had been likewise in motion towards Athlone, giving our troops an alarm, as if they intended to attack Mullingar, our principal garrison and magazine on that side; which occasioned the marching thither of Colonel Faulke's regiment from Dublin. But the enemy stopp'd half way between Athlone and Mullingar at a place called Ballymore, and built there a small fort, which they will as soon quit, when our men think it worth their while to march thither. That the Rapparees continue to commit great depredations in the country, and are very numerous; but that our parties often meet with them, and generally kill or take as many as they can come up with; and by the measures now taken it was to be hoped they would be soon reduced to a small number. Our parties had likewise had several rencounters with some of the enemy's formed troops with their usual success, killing divers of them, and taking some prisoners; but the particulars are not worth the mentioning here. That the Lords Justices had put out two proclamations, one to prevent the robberies and plunderings of the soldiers; for which satisfaction is to be made out of their pay upon due proof before some justice of the peace in the county, wherein such offence is committed, besides other punishment, according to the nature of it. The other, appoints William Robinson, — Johnston, Edward Corker, John South, and William Melneux, Esquires, or any three of them, to be commissioners for stating the accounts of the army, and ascertaining all debts due to and from the said army, and examining all accounts of money whatsoever paid unto or disbursed by any person for the use of the army. That Lieutenant-General Ginckel had likewise put out a declaration, wherein, after taking notice of the artifices made use of by the pensioners of France to delude the Irish, and to make them obnoxious to their ruin, he declares, that an Irish Roman Catholic gentleman, that came out of the enemy's quarters, 1691. to Ballymore, and put that town into a better condition for defence, they marched from thence on the 18th of June, and being joined the same day by the Prince of Wirtemberg, encamped at Balymory's pass, whilst a strong detachment of horse advanced towards Athlone. On the 19th, very early in the morning, the vanguard marched from Balymory, and beat the enemy from several out-ditches of the English town of Athlone on this side the Shannon, and lodged themselves there. The next day a battery of ten 18 pounders having ruined a bastion near the water-side, looking towards Lansborough, the General ordered an assault to be made; which was performed accordingly; and though the Irish made considerable resistance, yet the English went on, and kept firing till they came to the breach, which a French Captain of Grenadiers first mounted, throwing his grenade, firing his piece, and ordering his men to do the same. His bravery so encouraged his party, that though he was killed in the action, yet the Irish were soon forced to quit their post, some retiring over the bridge to Connaught side, and the rest leaping into the Shannon, where many were drowned.

After this success batteries were planted against the Irish town, which being finished by the 22d, the cannon and mortars began to play very briskly on the north-east side of the castle, where it was weakest, and continued to do so the next day, when the pontoons came up. The 25th was spent in raising batteries, one below, and another above the bridge, while a third was erected without the town-wall by the river-side, opposite to a bastion, which the Irish had made on the other side the river. At the same time the General was contriving methods to march part of his army over the Shannon, at a ford towards Lansborough; but that design being frustrated, he resolved to force his way through Athlone, and therefore laboured hard to gain the bridge, wherein he found no small difficulty. However, on the 27th in the evening, the English burnt the wooden breast-work, which the enemy had made on the other side of the broken arch; and the next morning had laid their beams over, and partly planked them; which a party of the besieged endeavouring to destroy, they were all killed in the attempt. This did not deter another party of ten men from setting about the same work, which they resolutely effected, throwing down the planks and beams into the river, notwithstanding all the firing and skill of the English; which made the General resolve to carry on the work by a close gallery on the bridge, and to pass the Shannon the next day; but they met with such opposition, especially by having their gallery burnt by the enemy, that the farther prosecution of the attack was deferred for that day. On the 30th a council of war being held, it was warmly debated, whether it were advisable to make another attempt, or to draw off. There were not wanting strong reasons for the latter; but the Duke of Wirtemberg, the Major-Generals Mackey, Talmagh, Ruvigny, and Telleau, and Colonel Cambon urged, 'That no brave action could be performed without hazard: that the attempt was like to be attended with success;' and they proffered themselves to be the first, who should pass the river, and attack the enemy.

Their

ters, upon humble application to their majesties, had been fully informed of the mercy and indulgence designed to such of the Irish army and inhabitants, as did submit to their government; but that he having been hitherto obstructed to make his message known, the said Lieutenant-General had thought fit to take this way of making it public: that he had authority, and was ready to grant reasonable terms to them, who are willing to return to their duty, their majesties not desiring to oppress the Irish either by persecuting them for their religion, ruining them in their estates, or enslaving them in their liberties; their Majesties having a greater regard to the preservation of the inhabitants of that kingdom, than to the just resentment, which their behaviour had deserved. Lastly, that the Lords Justices had held several consultations with Lieutenant-General Ginkel, and the rest of the General officers, about the affairs of the army; and making the necessary preparations for an early campaign.'

Whitehall, 6. March, 1690-1.

'This day came in several letters by the common post, of the 3d instant, but all to private persons, and from one and the same hand, which is the Mayor of Liverpool, who writes, that a master of a vessel from Dublin, put in there that day, reports, that on the 27th past there happened, a very sharp engagement between our army and the rebels near Ballymore, in which we gave them an entire defeat, killing and taking prisoners between five and six thousand of them, and all their bag and baggage, with the loss of but two hundred on our side. That it was reported Sarsfield was mortally wounded; and that General Ginkel was brought to Dublin on Saturday night in a coach sorely wounded. This is the substance of the letters. There were other particulars, which I have omitted, because this account coming but after an odd manner, we must wait for a confirmation of it from a better hand.'

Whitehall, March 10, 1690-1.

'I have nothing to trouble you with this post, but to refer you to yesterday's Gazette, which you will receive from Mr Le Pin; wherein you will find an account of a late engagement, with a defeat of the rebels in Ireland, which, though small in itself, yet will undoubtedly in its consequences prove very considerable, it being just upon the opening of the campaign, and a fresh instance of their not daring to stand against an English force, though never so small. But to let you see, how little reason there is to apprehend any great danger from such an enemy, I cannot but take notice to you of a passage omitted in the Gazette, which is, that they had placed their passadoes inwards; so that instead of hindering us from falling on them, they were a security to us from their breaking in upon our men. But I doubt not you will easily look upon this as an act of supererogation or Irish understanding. In fine, that Sarsfield, this mighty hero, is highly dissatisfied; and that there are great factions and discontents amongst them upon the account of the French, and the great necessities and distresses they labour under, we have all the reason in the world to believe, from the frequent accounts we have from deserters and prisoners daily taken from them.'

Whitehall, March 13, 1690-1.

'This day came in letters from Dublin of the 7th instant, which say, that Brigadier Stuart from his quarters near Ballarbat went out lately with a party of about seven hundred men towards James town, seventeen miles into the enemy's quarters, upon notice, that two regiments of the rebels were incamped

1691. Their opinion having prevailed, the detachment drawn out the day before was ordered still to be in readiness, and the General gave command that they should be brought down by six, the usual hour of relieving the guards, that the enemy might not suspect the design; which indeed they did not. All things being ready, the conjuncture favourable, and the signal given, Captain Sandys and two Lieutenants led the first party of sixty Grenadiers, all in armour, and twenty abreast, seconded by another strong detachment of Grenadiers, (which were to be supported by six battalions of foot) and with an unparalleled resolution took the ford, that was a little to the left of the bridge, against a battalion of the enemies, the stream being very rapid, and the passage very difficult by reason of some great stones, that were in the river. At the same time the English great and small shot began to play from their batteries and works upon those of the enemy on the other side, who fired as thick as possibly they could upon those who passed the river. But at length these, by an incredible effort of bravery, forced their way through the enemy's bullets, fire and smoke, and having gained the opposite bank, the rest laid planks over the broken part of the bridge, while the others were preparing the pontoons. By this means the English passed over so fast, that in less than half an hour they were masters of the town, and possessed themselves of the works, that remained entire towards the enemy's camp; the Irish being so amazed at the suddenness of the attack, and resolution of the English, that they quickly abandoned the place, and fled to the army, though not without considerable loss. The besiegers had not above fifty men killed in this memorable action, which Mackay and Tetsau, and la Millioniere conducted with great vigour, 1691. and to the good success whereof Talmash, who went with the Grenadiers as volunteer, the Duke of Wirtemberg, Count Nassau, and Brigadier Bellesis, greatly contributed by their courage and presence of mind. It would be difficult to shew in history so brave an enterprize, in which a fortified town was attacked across a river by only three thousand men, in the face of the enemy's army, that were masters of all the fords by the intrenchments, which they had cast before them. And therefore it was but just, that General Ginkel should entail on his family the honour of this achievement by the title, which was afterwards bestowed on him, of Earl of Athlone.

St Ruth, who commanded the French auxiliaries and the Irish army, did not upon this occasion, act suitable to the reputation, which he had formerly acquired. The English were no sooner entered the river, but an express was sent to him from the town, to which he only made this answer, 'That it was impossible for the English to pretend to take a town, and he near with an army to succour it; adding, That he would give a thousand pistoles they durst attempt it.' Sarsfield replied, 'That he knew the enterprize was not too difficult for English courage to attempt;' and therefore pressed St Ruth to send speedy succours to the town; which that General refusing to do; and still turning the undertaking to a jest, some warm expressions passed between him and Sarsfield, which bred a jealousy amongst them, that proved of fatal consequence not long after. St Ruth being soon convinced, that the English were in actual possession of the place, ordered several detachments to drive them out again; but then he was sensible of a former oversight, in not level-

'camped there with fifteen hundred rapparees, and a very great prey of cattle; and had it not been for one of the protected Irish, who gave notice to early of our motion, that Colonel Clifford had time enough to join two other regiments, one of horse, and another of dragoons, to their party, we had so surprized them, as in all probability had given them there a greater defeat than the other we lately did near Athlone, whereof the last Gazette gave you an account, and taken their cattle too. But the enemy, though above four times our number, flying before our men, as they came near them, little execution was done, our party killing only nine or ten of the enemy in their flight, without any loss on our side: That the Lord Justice Coningsby, who has been very ill of a fever, is now upon his recovery: That the Irish give no alarms, nor seem to be in a posture to do it: That a cornet and eight troopers, deserters, who came over from the rebels the day these letters bear date, report the confirmation was so great at Athlone, that they shut the gates upon them, and left all to our mercy, and many of them perished: That, pursuant to the King's orders, the regiment of Derry foot commanded by Colonel White, Colonel Russell's regiment of horse, six troops of Colonel Worsley's regiment of horse, and four troops of the Earl of Oxford's regiment, are forthwith to be broke.'

Whitehall, 20. March 1690-1.

'Our last letters from Dublin are of the 15th instant, which bring no account of any particular action in those parts, but in general, that several Protestants, and men of very good sense, who made their escape lately from Limerick, do report there are great discontents in that place: that the small sum of money, that the Lord Tyrconnel brought

'over with him from France, is applied to not other use than the works, and given to deserters from us; of which sort there are not any horse or English, but of the Danish foot above two hundred are lately gone over thither, though they refuse to take service with the Irish, and are therefore to be transported to their own country: That the garrison of Limerick has already begun to open the magazines of the last season, the old being all spent: That they have no expectation of men from France, nor are they making any preparations for taking the field: That Sarsfield and Tyrconnel do by no means agree together, the latter having sent several times for Sarsfield to Limerick before he would go: That three Danish deserters going towards the enemy were met by four deserters coming from them; and the three being taken prisoners, and brought back to their quarters, were immediately executed: And, lastly, that one Daily, a judge in the late King James's time, and others, have been secured upon suspicion of deligning to betray Galway into the English hands.'

Whitehall, 27. March, 1691.

'We have had letters this morning of the 23d from Dublin, which say, that upon examination of the murder of Colonel Parker's men, though they had light enough to be verily persuaded, that all the protected Papists, who live near the place, where it was committed, were privy to the fact, or at least well pleased with it, and that the whole kingdom over they are ready to do the like at the instigation of their priests that insensibly endeavour to weaken us; yet they had been only able to fix this murder upon one man, who was hanged, and at his execution owned, that he had buried them, but would not discover

General Ginckle having continued at Athlone till he had put it into a posture of defence, marched on with his army, and encamped along the river Suck upon Roscommon side, which was a very good pass, and which if the Irish had secured, they would have given the English a great deal of trouble. But they possessed themselves of a far more advantageous post, for they lay on other side of Aghrim castle, three miles beyond Ballinasloe, and were extended from the Church of Kilcommadon, on their right, to a Church called Gourtnapori, about two miles in length. On their left run a rivulet, having steep hills and little bogs on each side; next to which was a large red bog almost a mile over, in the end of which stood the castle of Aghrim, commanding the way that led to their camp, passable for horse no where but just at the castle, by reason of a small river, which running thro' a moist ground made the whole a morass. This morass extended itself along to the right, where there was another pass at Urachree, having a rising ground on either side of it; and the Irish camp lay along the ridge of an hill, on the side of which stood two Danish forts about half a mile's distance from the bog below, and this cut into many small inclosures, which the Irish lined very thick with musketeers, and managed a communication between them. General Ginckle having viewed the enemy's camp, found it very difficult of access; but considering, that he was now advanced so far, that he must either fight his way through, or retreat with loss and disgrace, ordered the army to march the next day towards the enemy. St Ruth supposing by the countenance of the English, that they were resolved to attack him, made a solemn speech to the Irish, in which he told them, 'How successful he had been in suppressing heresy in France, and bringing over a vast number of deluded souls into the bosom of the Mother-Church; That for this reason his master had made choice of him before others, to establish the Church in Ireland on such a foundation, that it should not henceforward be in the power of hell or heretics to disturb it; and that all good Roman Catholics depended on their courage to see these glorious things effected. He confessed, that matters did not entirely answer his expectation since he came among them; but that still all might be recovered. That he was informed, the Prince of Orange's heretical army was resolved to give them battle. That now or never was the time for them to recover their lost honours, privileges, and estates of their ancestors. That they ought now to remember, they were no mercenary soldiers; their all being at stake, and their design to restore a pious King to his throne, to propagate the holy faith, and extirpate heresy. And lastly, to animate their courage, he assured them of King James's love and gratitude, of Lewis the Great's protection, of himself to lead them on, of the Church to pray for them, and of saints and angels to carry their souls into heaven.' He closed his speech with a strict order, 'to give quarter to none, especially not to spare any of the French heretics in the Prince of Orange's army (1).' He took likewise the most effectual way possible to infuse courage into the Irish, by sending their Priests about among them, to animate them by all the methods they could think of; and, as the most powerful of all, they made them swear on the sacrament, that they would never forsake their colours.

On Sunday the 12th of July the English army early in the morning prepared to advance towards the enemy; but the weather proving foggy, they moved not till about twelve a clock, which was then done in as good order as the ground would permit. The general at the same time having viewed the posture of the Irish, and seeing the necessity of making himself master of the pass of Urachree, sent a Danish Captain with some horse to force it; but they not succeeding, he ordered two hundred of Cunningham's dragoons to march to certain ditches nigh the ford, to keep the enemy from coming over, and in the mean time the English army marched forward. By this time it was two of the clock, and the general finding it necessary to gain that ford, and the other ways, that led to the right of the Irish camp, as the most proper means of attacking them, commanded Cunningham's dragoons at the ditch to advance towards a party of the enemy posted on the other side; who upon their approach, with another party that sustained them, all retired behind a hill nearer the camp, where was posted a greater body. All these parties being still reinforced by others, obliged the English dragoons to retreat; whereupon General Ginckle ordered Eppinger's dragoons to get between those bodies and the enemy's camp. This motion was presently any of his accomplices; and on the 22d at night the Lords Justices were informed, that a considerable number of Irish designed to meet within two miles of Dublin, in order to some daring resolution for the rescue of their friends, who to the number of above eighty were prisoners there on that account; upon which a strong party was sent out to look after them, but they came back the next morning without meeting any such number of Papists, as was mentioned in the information. The carriage of the protected Papists, who on all occasions shew their implacable hatred to the English, and contribute all they can to their disturbance, will at last force the government to have recourse to greater severities than have yet been made use of. Whitehall, April 3. 1691.

While I am writing this, I come two packets from Dublin with letters of the 28th and 30th past, but without one word of news, except only the daily advantages the militia of that kingdom have over the Rapparees, and the progress that has been made into the discovery of the persons concerned in the murder of Colonel Faulkes's soldiers, which is little more than what the Gazette has already given you an account of.

1691, sently discovered by the enemy, who had the advantage in pouring in so many men upon the English, that they would still have been too hard for the dragoons, had they not been seconded by the Earl of Portland's horse, who behaved themselves here with great bravery. What was at first only a skirmish, had by this time engaged a considerable body on both sides; yet the enemy retiring in some time brought the generals together to deliberate, whether it were not best to defer the battle till next morning. Which was agreed on so far, that their tents were ordered to be sent for. But when they perceived the enemy to be in some disorder by what had already happened, it was resolved not to delay the attack, lest the enemy should march off in the night, and so afford no more opportunities for a decisive action. Wherefore by the advice of Mackay it was agreed to begin the fight on the enemy's right, thereby proposing to draw part of their strength from Agbrim castle, near to which their main body was posted, that so the right wing of the English might have the easier passage over to attack their left; and then the whole English army might have the opportunity to engage, which was otherwise impossible. This advice had it's desired success. About half an hour after four in the afternoon, a party of the English left wing moved towards the enemy, and by five the battle began. The ditches were strongly guarded by Irish musketeers, and their horse advantageously posted to sustain them. And here the Irish behaved themselves with undaunted courage, defending their posts with unparalleled obstinacy; nor would they stir from one side, till the English put their pieces over at the other; and then having lines of communication from one ditch to another, they would presently post themselves, and flank the English, which occasioned great firing on both sides, and continued on the left almost an hour and a half, before the centre and the right wing of the army began to engage. In the mean time the English main army advanced, and Mackay and the rest observing several bodies of the enemy's horse and foot draw off from the left, and move towards their right, where the English pressed them very hard, they laid hold of that advantage, and ordered the foot to march over the bog, which fronted the enemy's main battle. The regiments of Earle, Herbert, Creighton, and Brewer, going over the narrowest place, where the hedges on the enemy's side ran farthest into the bog, they had orders to march to the lowest of the ditches adjoining to the side of the bog, and there to post themselves, till the horse could come about by Agbrim castle, and sustain them, and till the other foot had marched over the other bog below, where it was broader, and supported by Foulke's and Stewart's regiments. According to these orders, Earle's and the other three regiments advanced over the bog, most of them passing up to the middle in mud and water; and upon their near approach to the ditches, received the enemy's fire. But that did not hinder them from marching to the lowest hedge, and to drive the Irish from thence, and soon from hedge to hedge, till they were got very near their main body. On the other hand, the Irish had so well ordered the matter, that they had made an easy passage for their horse among all those hedges and ditches, by which means they poured in great numbers, both of horse and foot, upon the English; which Colonel Earle observing, animated his men, by telling them, that now their safety lay wholly in their courage. However, being now both flanked and fronted, and exposed besides to all the enemy's fire from the adjacent hedges, the English were forced to quit their ground, and retreat to the bog again with considerable loss; and among others the Colonels Earle and Herbert were taken prisoners; Earle after being twice taken and retaken got free at last; but Herbert, was barbarously murdered after quarter given by the Irish, when they saw he was like to be rescued.

While these things passed on this side, Colonel St John's, Colonel Tiffin's, the Lord George Hamilton's, the French Protestants in the English service, and several other regiments, were marching over below the bog, while the Irish lay so close in their ditches, that several were doubtful, whether they had any men at that place or no. But no sooner were the French refugees and the rest got within twenty yards of the ditches, but the enemy fired most furiously upon them, which the other sustained with intrepidity, still pressing forwards, though they could scarce see one another for smoke, which the wind blew towards them. The battle seemed doubtful for some time, but now there was reason to believe, that victory was leaning on the side of the Irish; for they had driven the foot in the centre so far back, that they were almost got into a line, with the great guns, planted near the bog, of which the English had no benefit in that conjuncture, because the Irish were intermixed with their own men.

While the infantry was thus engaged, Ruvigny's regiment of French horse, which had formerly been the duke of Schomberg's, and Sir John Lanier's, being both posted on the right, Lanier's was afterwards drawn to the left, where they did very great service; and the right wing of the English horse were in the mean time making the best of their way to succour the foot, being sensible of their extreme danger, and that all lay at stake. The cavalry, besides the showers of bullets from a body of the enemy's dragoons and foot, that were conveniently posted under a covert place, was likewise obliged to press and tumble over a very dangerous pass; but having bravely surmounted all these difficulties, they lodged themselves at last in a dry ditch, in the hottest of the enemy's fire from Agbrim castle, and some old walls and hedges adjoining.

The English foot all this while laboured under very great disadvantage in the centre; which Talmash observing hastened to their relief with some fresh men, and gave orders to the broken regiments to halt and face about; which they immediately obeyed, and bravely charged the Irish, who had advanced upon them to the center of the bog, killed above three hundred of them, before they could retreat out of it, and then marched boldly up to their old ground again, from whence they had been so lately beaten. At the same time Mackay had fallen upon the enemy with a good body of horse on their left; and among the rest a French regiment of horse had forced a regiment of Irish dragoons from an advantageous post, and put to flight Tyrconnel's horse. Whereupon Ruvigny, at the head of the Earl of Oxford's regiment of horse, supported

And now the horse and foot of the English right and the Irish left being mixed, there was nothing but a continued fire, and a very hot dispute all along the line, the Irish with great resolution endeavouring to maintain their ditches, and the English with no less bravery to beat them from thence. However, the fight was not much longer doubtful; for though St Ruth, when he saw the English foot in the centre repulsed, in a bravado told those about him, that he would now beat the English army to the gates of Dublin, yet seeing, with great surprize, the regiments of Oxford, Ruvigny, Langston, and Bierly; together with Levison's dragoons; pressing over towards the cattle, he ordered a Brigade of his own horse from the right wing to march up to the left; then riding to one of his batteries, and giving orders to the gunners where to fire, and afterwards leading on some horse towards the place, where he saw the English endeavour to go over, he was killed by a cannon-ball, as he rode down the hill of Kilcommadon, the place where the main streſs of the battle was fought, being just under the English camp. His fall put his troops to a stand, and his guards drawing off with his corps, many of the rest drew off also; Sarsfield, who should have commanded them, (and who since the affair of Ablone, was upon the reserve with St Ruth) not knowing the order of battle. The English observing their disorder, pressed boldly on, and in a short time drove the enemy to the top of Kilcommadon hill, where their camp had lain; whereupon they began to commit their safety to flight, the foot running full speed towards a great bog behind them on their left, and the horse on the high-way towards Loughbreagh.

While this was doing in the right wing and centre, those who first engaged towards the left, bravely maintained their ground; and though the Irish once or twice made themselves masters of the chevaux de frise, that covered the French foot, yet the French resolutely regained them. However, little happened on that side for near two hours; neither did the Danish horse and foot, that were on the left of all, disturb the enemy as yet, but kept in awe several bodies of horse and foot, that faced them on the other side of the rivulet. But then perceiving Mackay's battalions in the centre to drive the enemy before them, left those bodies, that faced them, should fall back to the relief of the flying party, they engaged them very briskly, and were at first received with great resolution; but the Irish being upon the decline, they all fled out of the field, their foot being miserably slaughtered by the English horse and dragoons, and their horse pursued nigh three miles. The night coming on with a thick misty rain, prevented the English from getting between them and a very advantageous pass near Loughbreagh, which gave many of them an opportunity to escape. However it was computed, that there was no less than seven thousand of the Irish slain upon the spot, and of the English six hundred killed, and nine hundred and sixty wounded, which still makes this victory the more considerable, since the English army did not make up above eighteen thousand effective men; whereas the Irish were composed of twenty thousand foot and five thousand horse and dragoons. As for the honour of this great day, General Ginckle himself confessed, that it was principally owing to the conduct and bravery of Monsieur Ruvigny, and to the Oxford and the French regiments of horse.

The English lay upon their arms all night, and then after a few days refreshment, the General marched to Galloway, the most considerable place now left in the hands of the Irish next to Limerick; and having posted his forces before it, he sent a summons to the garrison. The Lord Dillon, the Governor, made answer, that Monsieur D'Usson, who commanded in chief, as well as himself, and the rest of the officers, were resolved to defend the place to the last. But notwithstanding this resolution, the English had no sooner marched part of the army over the river, and taken the fort, which the Irish were building, but the enemy beat a parley, and hostages were immediately exchanged. The Irish demurring upon the manner of surrendering, the General grew impatient, and sent once or twice to them to come to a speedy conclusion. At last Lieutenant Colonel Bourke, one of the Irish hostages, was permitted to go in, to whom Talmash, being as was believed inclined to lay the treaty aside, and take the town by storm, said, "When they were ready to begin a gain, give us a sign by firing a gun into the air." But the other replied, "that they would not fire a gun from within till they were provoked from without." After some time the articles were agreed on, and the town delivered into the hands of the English. The consequence of which was the submission of Balderick O Donnel, with a considerable number of men under his command; and not long after the marching of the English army towards Limerick, which was the only place, that stood out, and where Tyrconnel died on the 14th of August. He had, with a particular view, studied to divert the French from sending over soldiers to Ireland, designing, in case of new misfortunes, to treat with King William, and to preserve himself and his friends; and now he began to dispose the Irish to think of treating, since they saw, that otherwise their ruin was inevitable. But as soon as this was suspected, all the military men, who resolved to give themselves intirely up to the French interest, combined against him, and blasted him as a feeble and false man, who was not to be trusted. This was carried so far, that, to avoid affronts, he was advised to leave the army. He staid therefore all this summer at Limerick, where he died of grief, as was believed; but before he died, he advised all that came to him, not to let things go to extremities, but to accept of such terms as could be got. And his words seemed to weigh more after his death, than in his life-time; for the Irish began generally to say, that they must take care of themselves, and not be made sacrifices to serve the ends of the French.

On the 25th of August the English army reached Limerick, and the same day made themselves masters of Iraton's and Cromwell's forts, which were now ordered to be called Mackay's and Nassau's, because gained under those commanders. Two days after Castle Connell and Castle Carrick a Gunnell standing upon the Shannon three miles below the town, were attacked, and the garrisons of both made prisoners of war. And at the same time some English ships coming up the

But though the siege was vigorously carried on, and that in the mean time the Irish abandoned several small places in the country, and brigadier Levison routed many of their parties in the county of Kerry; though the bombs did very great execution upon their camp, and within the town, yet on the 17th of September it was warmly debated in a council of war, whether they should prosecute the siege, or march over the river to destroy all the enemy's forage in the county of Clare, and then turn the siege into a blockade. And it was so far carried for the latter, that an engineer was ordered to go with a detachment towards Kilmulock, and fortify that place. But before he got out of the camp, he was countermanded, and a great many palliades were brought into Mackay's fort, as if the army intended to winter there. On the 19th it was resolv'd to pass the river with a great party, either to press the siege on that side, or at least to burn the enemy's forage. The same day a battery was rais'd between Ireton's fort and the old church, to flank the Irish, in case of a sally from St John's gate; four mortars were brought from the great battery to Mackay's fort; that place being judg'd the fittest for bombarding, since the whole town lay in a line from thence; and orders were given, in case of an alarm from the Irish troops without, that every regiment should stand to their posts assign'd them for that purpose. On the 22d General Ginckle, who was indefatigable in his business, pass'd the Shannon over a bridge of boats, with strong detachments of horse and dragoons, ten battalions of foot, and fourteen pieces of cannon, leaving Wirtemberg, Mackay and Talmash to command on this side; and all that morning the enemy continually fired upon them from several batteries, but without any great harm. In the afternoon a party of Colonel Matthews's dragoons was vigorously attacked by a stronger detachment of the enemy, till the English foot coming up, the Irish retreated under their cannon. Then all the English grenadiers, sustained by four regiments of foot, were commanded to assault the works, that cover'd Thomond bridge, being one fort to the right, above a musket shot from the bridge, and another to the left somewhat nearer, besides several other fortifications, wherein the enemy had posted above two hundred men. The dispute was hot and obstinate for a while, and the attack extremely hazardous, the besieged plying the assailants with their cannon from the King's castle, and two or three more batteries, with some small shot from the wall. However, the Irish being undauntedly press'd upon by the grenadiers, they abandoned their posts. Upon which a strong detachment was sent from the town to support them; but the English went on with that courage and firmness, that they beat the enemy notwithstanding this reinforcement, and pursued them over the bridge to the town. A French Major, who command'd at Thomond-gate, fearing the English would enter the town with the runaways, order'd the bridge to be drawn up, and left the whole party expos'd to the fury of their pursuers, who killed six hundred of them, and made above one hundred and sixty prisoners, besides a great number that were push'd into the Shannon (1).

Upon this the English lodg'd themselves within ten yards of the bridge, notwithstanding a high tower, that stood near the end of the bridge next to them; and the Irish finding now all communication cut off between them and their horse, and despairing of the French succours, began to think of giving up the town. For soon after the action Colonel Waclop looking out of a tower, call'd to Scravenmore, and desired leave to come and speak with him, which was readily granted. After some discourse, he desired the same liberty for Sarsfield to speak with Ruvigny; which was likewise allow'd him, and accordingly both discours'd about terms for the surrender of the place, and towards evening they return'd into the town. The next day Sarsfield and Waclop came out again, and desired a cessation of arms for three days, till they could send to Lieutenant-General Sheldon, who lay with about fifteen hundred horse at Six-Miles-Bridge, in order that they might be included in the general capitulation, which was granted them; and the prisoners in the town were released. On the 26th Sarsfield and Waclop dined with the General; and it being then agreed, that hostages should be exchanged in order to a farther treaty, the Lord Cutts, Sir David Collier, Colonel Tiffin, and Colonel Piper, were sent into the town, in the room of the Lords Westmeath, Evagh, Timelstown, and Louth, who remained in the English camp. The next day the Irish sent out their proposals, but in such extravagant terms, that General Ginckle was so far from granting them, that he return'd answer, 'That though he was a stranger to the laws of England, yet he understood, that what they insisted upon was so far contradictory to them, that he could not grant any such thing;' and so order'd a new battery to be rais'd; but upon the request of the Irish he sent them twelve articles, which prov'd to be the sum of the capitulation. The Irish, it seems, were set on by the

'This is the measure of the wounds of the side of our Saviour Jesus Christ, which was brought from Constantinople to the Emperor Charmaine in a Coffin of gould, and is a most precious relique, to the end that he or she that carried the same about him, no fire nor water, nor wind, tempest, knaife, lance or sword, nor the devil cannot hurt him; and the woman with child

1691. the French to insist on very high demands, in hopes they would be rejected. But the King had given Ginckel secret directions, that he should grant all the demands they could make that would put an end to that war. This was the reason that the articles he sent them were so favourable, that a capitulation was soon agreed upon to the great disappointment of the French, and the no small grief of some English, who hoped this war should have ended in the total ruin of the Irish interest. On the 1st of October the Lords Justices of Ireland arrived in the English camp; and after some farther conferences with the commissioners on the part of the garrison, and their troops in the county of Clare, the articles for the surrender of the city of Limerick, and the castles of Ross and Clare, with all other places and castles, that were still in the hands of the Irish, were on the 3d of that month finally concluded. The Irish were all indemnified and restored to all they had enjoyed in King Charles's time. They were also admitted to all the privileges of subjects upon their taking the oaths of allegiance, without being bound to take the oath of supremacy. Not only the French, but as many of the Irish as had a mind to go over to France, had free liberty and a safe transportation. But Ginckel receiving a letter from a Lieutenant-Colonel in the Irish army, wherein he complained, that he was confined for refusing to go into France, he resented that violence to that degree, that he immediately ordered four guns to be planted upon Bolls-bridge, saying in some heat, 'that he would teach the Irish to play tricks with him.' Upon this Sarsfield came to the English camp, and some sharp expressions passed between him and the General, Sarsfield saying at last, 'that he was in the General's power.' 'Not so replied Ginckel, but you shall go in again, and do the worst you can.' However, the affair was at last composed, and the prisoners enlarged; and as many of the Irish as were willing to go, were shipped off for France, to the number of about twelve thousand, where, upon their arrival, they were welcomed by a letter from King James, directed to General Sheldon, then the officer in chief with them, the substance of which was; 'That having been informed of the necessities, which forced the Lords Justices, and the general officers of his forces, to surrender Limerick, and the other places, that remained to him in the kingdom of Ireland, he would not defer to let him know, and the rest of the officers, that came along with him, that he was extremely satisfied with his and their conduct, and of the valour of his soldiers, but most particularly of his and their declaration and resolution to come and serve where he was; assuring both him and the other officers and soldiers, that he should never forget this act of loyalty, nor fail, when in a capacity, to give them, above others, particular marks of his favour. In the mean time he charged Sheldon to inform them, that they were to serve under his Majesty's command, and by his commissions; and that his brother, the King of France, had already given orders to cloath them, and furnish them with all necessaries, and to give them quarters of refreshment.'

Thus ended the Irish war by the surrender of Limerick, to the great reputation of General

No. 12. Vol. III.

Ginckel, and with so much the more glory to the English, as the Irish were so powerfully supported by the King of France. And it is worth observation, that a fleet of men of war and store-ships, which the French King had sent to the relief of Limerick, arrived in Dingle-Bay but a day or two after the articles were signed. These articles were punctually executed; and some doubts, that arose out of some ambiguous words, were explained in favour of the Irish; so earnestly desirous was the King to have all matters composed at home, that he might direct his whole force against the enemy abroad. The English in Ireland, though none could suffer more by the continuence of the war than they did, yet were uneasy, when they saw that the Irish had obtained such good conditions; and some of the more violent among them, who were most exasperated with the wrongs, which had been done them, began to call in question the legality of some of the articles. But the Parliament of England did not think fit to enter upon that discussion; nor made they any motion towards violating the capitulation.

General Ginckel came over to England full of honour after so glorious a campaign. The Parliament was so sensible of what he had done for the interest of the nation, that the House of Commons ordered Lord Castleton, Sir Henry Godrick, and five other members, to thank him and his officers for their great services in the reduction of Ireland. To which the Baron replied, 'I acknowledge this distinguishing honour done me by the House of Commons, and value it above a triumph. The success of their Majesties arms in Ireland, was owing chiefly to the valour of the English, and I will take care to communicate the vote of the House to the officers that served in Ireland, and always endeavour the prosperity of their Majesties and their government.' He was soon after made Earl of Athlone and Baron of Aghrim, and to support his honours had a grant of lands in Ireland, of twenty-six thousand four hundred and eighty acres, which was confirmed to him by the Irish Parliament, but which however we shall see hereafter put into the report of the commissioners for the Irish forfeitures. The city of London invited the new Earl, with the Duke of Wirttemberg, the Generals Scravenmore, Lanier, Talmash, and Ruvigny, with most of the field officers then in town, to dine with the Lord Mayor Sir Thomas Stamp, and entertained them with equal respect and magnificence. After all, it must be owned, that without detracting from Ginckel, a large share of all that was done, was due to some of the general officers, in particular to Ruvigny (who was afterwards made Earl of Galloway) to Mackay and Talmash.

With regard to the affairs of Scotland, they were now brought to some temper. Many of the Lords; who had been concerned in the late plot, came up, and confessed and discovered all, and took out their pardons. They endeavoured to excuse themselves, by alledging, that they had apprehended themselves to be exposed to ruin; and that they dreaded the tyranny of Presbytery no less than they did Popery; and they promised, that if the King would so balance matters, that the Lord Melvil, and his party, should not have it in their power to ruin them and their friends, and in particular, that they should not turn out the ministers of the episcop-

They likewise undertook to quiet the Highlanders, who stood out still, and were robbing the country in parties; and engaged to the King, that if the Episcopal Clergy could be assured of his protection, they would all acknowledge and serve him. They did not desire, that the King should make any step towards the changing the government, that was settled in Scotland; but only requested, that episcopal ministers might continue to serve in those places, which liked them best; and that no man should be brought into trouble for his opinion, as to the government of the Church; and that such episcopal men, as were willing to mix with the Presbyterians in their judicatories, should be admitted, without any severe imposition in point of opinion. This looked so fair, and agreed so well with the King's own sense of things, that he very easily hearkened to it; though it afterwards appeared, that all this was an artifice of the Jacobites to engage the King to disgust the Presbyterians, by losing whom, or at least rendering them remiss in his service, they reckoned they should soon be masters of that kingdom. For that party resolved now to come in generally to take the oaths; but, in order to that, they sent one to king James, to shew the necessity of it, and the service, which they intended by it, and therefore asked his leave to take them. That King's answer was more honest; he said, that he could not consent to that, which he thought unlawful; but if any of them took the oaths on design to serve him, and continued to advance his interests, it should never be remembered against them.

The younger Dalrymple was now made Secretary of State in conjunction with the Lord Melville; and he undertook to bring in most of the Jacobites into the King's service; but they entered at the same time into a close correspondence with St Germain's. The truth was, that the Presbyterians, by their violence, and other absurd practices, were rendering themselves both odious and contemptible. They had formed a general assembly in the end of the former year, in which they very much exposed themselves by the weakness and peevishness of their conduct. Little learning or prudence appeared among them; poor preaching, and wretched haranguing partialities to one another, and violence and injustice to those, who differed from them, appeared in all their meetings. And these so much sunk their reputation, that they were weaning the nation most effectually from all fondness to their government. But the falshood of many, who, under a pretence of moderating matters, were really undermining the King's government, helped in the sequel to preserve the Presbyterians, as much as their own conduct did now alienate the King from them.

The events at sea were not very considerable. For the fleets being now of almost equal strength on both sides, the French as cautiously avoided a general engagement, as they eagerly sought it the year before. Their design was to intercept the English Turkey fleet, which was exceedingly rich; for which purpose they hovered a long time about the Irish coast; and had failed from before King'sale, but a few days when the Smyrna fleet came all safe into that harbour under a convoy of fourteen men of war, commanded by Captain Aylmer, having been held back seven weeks by contrary winds in their passage from Cadix. The English grand fleet all this while kept another course, for want of intelligence. But as soon as Admiral Russel was informed, that the Smyrna fleet was got into King'sale, he steered thither from Cape Clear, and afterwards took all imaginable care, that they might be safely conveyed into their respective ports; and then stood over to Ushant in quest of the enemy, whom he understood, to be returned that way to their own coasts. The French had orders to avoid an engagement. And though for the space of two months Russel did all he could to come up with them, yet they still kept at a distance, and failed off in the night. The season being over for action, Russel came into Plymouth in a storm, which was much censured, for that road is not safe, and the Coronation a second rate, and the Warwick a third rate, were lost upon the occasion. Great factions were among the Flag-officers, and no other service was done by this great equipment, but that our trade was maintained.

Let us now return to the King, whom we left at the Hague. His Majesty being gone to Loos, dispatched into Flanders Count Solmes and the Earl of Mariborough, to prepare all things against his arrival there. Some few days after, the King put himself at the head of the confederate army, whither he was followed by the Duke of Ormond, the Marquis of Winchester, and the Earl of Essex. The French had taken the field earlier than the confederates. Prince Waldeck had not got above eighteen thousand men together, when Luxemburg with an army of forty thousand men was marching to surprise Brussels; and at the same time the Marquis de Boufflers, with another army, came up to Leige. Prince Waldeck posted his army so well, that Luxemburg, believing it stronger than indeed it was, did not attempt to break through; in which it was thought he might have succeeded. The king hastened the rest of the troops, and came himself to the army in good time, not only to cover Brussels, but to send a detachment to the relief of Liege, which had been bombarded for two days. A body of Germans, as well as that which the King sent to them, came in time to support those of Liege, who were beginning to think of capitulating. Boufflers therefore drew off, and the French kept themselves so close in their posts all the rest of the campaign, that though the King made many motions to try, if it was possible, to bring them to a battle, yet he could not do it (1). Having therefore blown up the fortifications of

Beaumont,

(1) As the proceedings of this campaign might perhaps be censured by those, who did not consider the reason and circumstances of things, it will be proper to subjoin here a vindication of his Majesty's conduct in it, from an original letter of Mr John Pulteney, Under

Secretary to the Lord Sidney, written to Sir William Dutton Esq, Envoy extraordinary at Hanover, and dated at the camp at St Gerard the 27th of August 1691, N. S. 'It is plain, says he, that the French King finding our King intended to put himself

1691. Beaumont, a place which he had made himself master of, marched the army towards Aeth, from whence he departed the 7th of September for Loo, leaving the forces under the command of Prince Waldeck. The same day the confederate army marched from Irknovel to Leuze, and decamped again on the 9th in the morning, advancing towards Cambren; and about eleven o'clock the whole right wing, with the body of foot, and the greatest part of the horse of the left wing, had passed the little river and defile near Catoire. Luxemburg being informed of this motion, and encouraged by King William's absence, advanced at the same time with the troops of the French King's household, and a strong detachment of his cavalry, making together fifty five squadrons, his swift march not being discovered by reason of a great fog, and charged the rear-guard of the allies with great fury. Count Tilly, who commanded in the rear, drew up his men as well as the suddenness of the attack would permit, and received the shock with great bravery, but was soon over-powered and put into disorder. By this time several of those, that had already passed the river, were brought back by the Generals Overkirk and Opdam, and forming a second line, gave an opportunity to the first to rally. Two battalions were likewise posted behind the hedges adjoining to the defile, who much galled the enemy. Here the conflict was very fierce, till the second line was also forced to give way before the enemy; but the cavalry being soon rallied by Overkirk, who signalized his conduct on this occasion, the French, who were unwilling to push the action too far, for fear of the Dutch infantry, which was also marching up, retreated in some haste and confusion, contenting themselves with having killed about a thousand of the confederates, and amongst them some men of great distinction, with the loss of about half the number on their side (1). And with this action the campaign ended in Flanders; during the course of which the King had several remarkable escapes, and particularly, that having once stood under a tree for a time, the enemy observing it, levelled a cannon so exactly, that the tree was shot down two minutes after the King was gone from the place. There had likewise been an attempt to blow up the artillery by one of the conductors of it. For at the first return of the army from Beaumont, on the 11th of August, about nine at night, two of the carriages belonging to the train of artillery, each laden with twenty five bombs and a barrel of powder, took fire, by the blowing up of a bomb in each carriage; and in that, which was on the left the powder blew up, and set fire to two others, so it was amazing, that the whole train was not blown up. But Monsieur Goullon, the Colonel of it, and the rest of the officers belonging to it, encouraged their men so effectually, that they all threw themselves into the midst of the flames, and drew out the two carriages from amongst the rest, notwithstanding one barrel of powder had actually taken fire, and was almost ready to blow up; and so they put out the fire. If this attempt had succeeded, the confusion, which himself at the head of the confederate army to be in employed those parts, and knowing his natural temper to push, bent his greatest strength this way; and to give him what mortification he could, sent a powerful army, little inferior to our's even in number, and consisting of the chieft of all his troops to oppose him; but with orders at the same time not to hazard a battle, if it could possibly be avoided. Notwithstanding which our King marches forward, and passing the Sambre, breaks in upon their conquests, and tries all means possible to draw them to a battle, which they still avoid; and any body, who knows this country, and the art of war, as now practised, must needs own, that it is impossible to force them to a battle, without the greatest disadvantage and hazard imaginable. Wherefore having thus dared them to fight, and subsisted hitherto upon the spoils of their conquests, the country being near wasted and eat up, it is no wonder, if we are now obliged to draw off, and close the campaign without action. To besiege some town of theirs, that way to provoke them to a battle, was what the King very much endeavoured; but the want of magazines, and some neighbouring garrisons to supply us with provisions, Monsieur being lost, and the country round about those towns, which lay most convenient to be attacked, quite wasted, made it impracticable to be done. Nor will you wonder at the politics of our enemy in avoiding a battle, since the loss of one on their side would have lain all Champagne, and consequently their whole country up to the very walls of Paris, open to us.

In another letter, dated at the camp at Enghien, Sept. 10. 1691, N. S. he writes thus to Sir William Dutton Colt. 'Last Friday morning we marched from Méfle, and encamped that night at Bois Seigneur Isaac. The next day we continued our march, intending to have encamped that night at Hautecroix, with a design to have fallen upon the enemy the next day, in case they had lain still where we heard they then were. But in our march thither we were informed, that the French were likewise upon theirs towards Ninove; so that we shortned our march, and encamped that night at Lembek near Halle. The French marched that day above eight leagues in the greatest disorder and hurry imaginable, being under an apprehension (as some deserters and prisoners tell us) left we should attack them. And yesterday we heard they had passed the Deindre near Grammont. Whereupon the King finding they would not stand, resolved to give over the chase, and to have gone from the army as to morrow morning for Loo, several of his Majesty's train being already gone before. But at night those measures were altered, and this morning early we marched from Lembek, and encamped at this place.—We have carried two great points here against the French this campaign, tho' we have had no battle; and that is, to drive them before us, as we have most apparently done; and the other to destroy the forage so much, that they will not be able to play the same trick next spring, as they did the last, for want of magazines. For last summer, after the battle of Flerus, they had little or nothing else to do but to make them; whereas this year there is not enough left wherewithal to do it.'

(1) Bishop Burnet gives the following account of this affair. 'When the time came of going into quarters, the King left the armies in Prince Waldeck's hands, who was observed not to march off with that caution, that might have been expected from so old a Captain. Luxemburg, upon that, drew out his horse with the King's household, designing to cut off his rear; and did, upon the first surprize, put them into some disorder. But they made so good a stand, that, after a very hot action, the French marched off, and lost more men on their side than we did. Auverquerque, commanded the body, that did this service.' Mr John Pulteny, in a letter to Sir William Dutton Colt, dated at Loo, Sept. 14. 1691, O. S. writes thus: 'Yesterday the King received an express from Prince Waldeck, giving 1691. which was in all reason to be expected upon such an accident, while the enemy was not above a league from them, drawn up, and looking for the success of it, must have had terrible effects. For it cannot easily be imagined, how much mischief might have followed upon it in the destruction of so many as would have perished immediately, if the whole magazine had taken fire, as well as in the panic, with which the rest would have been struck upon so shocking an accident. By the surprize of it the French might have had an opportunity of cutting off the whole army.

Affairs of Catalonia.

The Spaniards had already lost in Flanders the important town of Mons; but they received a still more sensible mortification nearer home. For the Duke of Noailles, who commanded the French forces, advancing with part of his army to Belver, to make head against the Spanish troops, sent the rest under the command of Lieutenant General Chazeron to besiege Urgell in Cerdagne. Though the place was not altogether indefensible, and had, besides that, a garrison of fifteen hundred men, and most of them disciplined, yet they barely surrendered it in a little time, and themselves, both officers and soldiers, to be prisoners of war; only the militia were dismissed home. Upon this the Court of Madrid sent several reinforcements to the Duke of Medina Sidonia, Vice-roy of Catalonia; however he could not hinder the French from fortifying Belver, nor make any other diversion; for advancing to attack Prato Melo, most of his troops abandoned him. Nor did the Spaniards make a better figure at sea than on land, since they could not prevent Marshal d'Estrees from bombarding Barcelona for three days together; which made a terrible desolation in that city.

*Affairs of Italy.

Burnet.*

Nor were the arms of France less prosperous in Italy than Catalonia, at least in the beginning of the campaign. Monsieur Catinat having taken the field early, with a design to make himself master of Nice, invested that place on the 3d of March; but before he prosecuted the siege in form, he thought fit to detach parties to summon Villa Franca, and the forts of St Asipice and Montalban, which surrendered without any resistance. He met with almost the same good success at Nice; for on the 16th the Consuls of the city sent their deputies to him, who agreed at a certain hour, and upon a certain signal, to receive the French King's troops. The Governor, upon notice of their design, attempted to make himself master of one of the gates, in order to prevent it's being put in execution; but the citizens being resolved to secure their houses from the bombs, immediately took arms, fired upon the Governor's detachment, and delivered up the city to the French. The Governor of the castle, enraged at the perfidiousness of the Burghers, endeavoured to fire their magazine, and played the cannon upon the convents and private houses, notwithstanding the threats of the French, that if he shot against the city, the garrison should have no quarter. On the other hand, the French made three attacks upon the castle, which were carried on with great vigour; and on the 20th one of their bombs set the powder-magazine on fire, which spread itself in a moment through all the castle, and blew up not only a good part of it, but killed above five hundred of the garrison, and about fifty of the besiegers in their trenches, by the pieces of stone and timber, that were carried thither. This disaster, together with the French being masters of the covered way, and second inclosure, obliged the Governor to capitulate, which he did on the 23d, and, after all, obtained honourable terms.

Immediately after the loss of this important place, Prince Eugene of Savoy went to Vienna to solicit succours; and the Duke of Savoy repaired incognito to Milan, to confer with the Count de Fuenfaldia, the Governor, and hasten the departure of the troops of that Duchy. But besides the slowness of the Germans and Spaniards in assisting the Duke, another cause contributed very much to the ill condition of his affairs. King William and the States of Holland allowed the Duke the sum of one hundred thousand pounds a year, chiefly for the maintenance of several regiments of French refugees and Vaudois; which money was mostly diverted to other uses by those, who had the management of the Duke's affairs, and were in the French interest, and inveterate enemies to the Protestants; so that the officers not receiving their full pay, the regiments were left incomplete, and the soldiers undisciplined. To remedy these disorders, and cause the war to be effectually carried on against France, King William thought proper to send Duke Schomberg, the Marquis de Miremont, Monsieur d'Obercan, a Swiss, and some other brave and experienced officers into Piedmont; but before they could reach Turin, the French had made such a considerable progress, that few places were left in the Duke of Savoy's hands besides his capital. The summer was not far advanced, when Catinat made himself master of Villana; which encouraged him to undertake the siege of Carmagnola, a place seated in the Marquisate of Saluzzes, and not above nine miles distant from Turin. The trenches were opened on the 22d of May, and three attacks carried on with so much vigour, that the besieged, finding themselves inclosed on all sides, and without hopes of relief, consented to march out, the disciplined men with their arms, the militia without, and to be conducted to Turin. This was no sooner done, but the Marquis de Fenquieres was commanded with a men, but were, notwithstanding that, received so well by our men, that the French were at last forced to retire. 1691. strong detachment of horse and foot to invest Coni, a place defended by nine battions and some outworks, but principally strong by its situation on a steep craggy hill, and garrisoned by seven hundred Vaudois and French refugees, about five hundred of the militia of Mondovi, and some other troops commanded by the Count de la Rovere. The Duke of Savoy being informed of the enemy's design, ordered the regiment of Salusses, with some other troops, to the number of near three thousand, to throw themselves into the place; but Feuquieres having notice of their march, attacked them with great vigour, and being received with no less courage, many were killed on both sides. The issue of this encounter was, that part of the relief entered the town, which was presently invested by the French to the number of twelve thousand men, who prosecuted the siege very vigorously.

Duke Schomberg arrived at Turin the 8th of June, where he found affairs in a most desperate condition, and the minds of people under the deepest consternation. Carmagnola had been lately taken; Coni was actually besieged, and given for lost; Monsieur La Hoguette had forced the passages of the valley of Aosta, which give him entrance into the Vercellois, and the frontiers of the Milanese. And the Duke of Savoy, instead of opposing the enemy's career, encamped with his small army on the side of the hill of Montcalier, from whence he had the mortification to see his towns taken, and his palace at Rivoli destroyed. Turin was under the apprehensions of a bombardment, and the removal of the Princesses, with the Court, and all their most precious goods, to Vercell, had still increased the terror of the Inhabitants. The emissaries of France said aloud, that the Duke would be dispossessed of all his dominions this campaign: That the confederates entertained him with chimerical succours; and that the King of England, who was his last resource, sent him only Duke Schomberg, with a magnificent retinue, instead of real assistance; and that therefore the best way for him was to betake himself immediately to his most Christian Majesty's mercy. Things being reduced to this extremity, Duke Schomberg had a very difficult part to act, especially at a court, and in a country, which he had never seen but in printed relations and maps. He therefore employed some time in making himself acquainted with both, and till then was very reserved in speaking his thoughts. The first thing he judged necessary to be done was to revive the drooping spirits of the people, by giving life and motion to the army, and shewing some vigour to the French. He advised the Duke to order his infantry to descend to the foot of the hill, and to extend his horse to the right between the hill and the Po; and made the Colonels of the army sensible, that the best way to render both officers and soldiers brisk and active, was to send them often upon parties. And because the French, being used to despise the Duke of Savoy's troops, came and foraged even in sight of his Grand Guard, Schomberg was of opinion to go and insult them. Accordingly on the 12th of July the Duke of Savoy with the General officers, and about three thousand horse advanced towards the enemy's forage; but upon his approach the French retired, and Catinat did not think fit to sustain his foragers, which might have occasioned a general engagement. It happened the same day, that Schomberg having spoke high Dutch to a German officer in the Duke's presence, the Duke said, 'that he had once tried to learn that language, but was discouraged by the difficulty he found in it;' upon which Schomberg offering to teach him, 'No, my Lord, replied he; it is the trade of war I design to learn of you.'

In the mean while, though the garrison and inhabitants of Coni defended themselves with great resolution, yet it was not possible for them to hold out much longer. It was therefore high time to think of relieving a place the loss of which must be attended with the total ruin of the Duke's affairs. And how to do it with most safety and appearance of success, was variously debated in a council of war, wherein Schomberg did not content himself with speaking his advice, but gave it afterwards to the Duke. His opinion was, that Monsieur La Hoguette appeared in the valley of Aosta, with no other design than to keep the confederates in suspense, and thereby favour the siege of Coni: That as soon as the troops of the confederates should begin to move, he would return into the Tarentoise: That the Duke ought to run where the danger was most pressing, left by endeavouring to remedy all, he should remedy nothing: That after all, he could not do better than to fight Catinat, whose army was inferior, at least in number, to that of the allies, Feuquieres having carried away ten or twelve thousand men with him before Coni. That, at the worst the confederates could but be beaten, which was still to be preferred before the loss of Coni, and the reinforcement of Catal; and that the French, if they should have the advantage, would yet pay dear for their victory; and their army being considerably weakened by sickness, desertion, and their losses before Veilanne, Carmagnola, and Coni, they would not think of any other enterprize that summer. The Duke and Prince Eugene gave ear to Schomberg's opinion; but the Marquis de Legonez, lately made Governor of Milan, and Don Gaspar Henriquez de Zara, opposed it with frivolous reasons, not daring to speak the true one; which was, that the war was maintained at the Duke of Savoy's cost; and that as long as the French were kept out of the Milanese, it was policy in the Spaniards not to hazard a decisive action. However the relieving Coni being of so great importance, it was resolved, that an hundred mules laden with provisions and ammunition should be sent thither under the convoy of twenty two hundred horse commanded by Prince Eugene. Accordingly that Prince set out on the 16th of June in the night from the camp, and leaving the French army on the right, marched to the left along the hills, that terminate the plain, that he might reach Coni with less danger. The next day, the French made an assault upon the place, wherein they were repulsed with great loss; and towards the evening Prince Eugene reached Magliano, a place within seven miles of Coni, where he was reinforced by five or six thousand of the militia of Mondovi. Of this Catinat had no sooner notice, but he sent an express to Monsieur de Bulonde, who commanded at the siege, not to stir out of his lines, and to acquaint him farther, that two thousand five hundred men were on their march to reinforce him under the com-

However Bulonde thought it convenient to raise the siege (1) on the 18th of June, and that with so much haste and confusion, that he left behind him two or three pieces of cannon, three mortars, good store of bombs, powder, warlike utensils, tents, and provisions, besides many of his sick and wounded men, amongst whom were five engineers. But, for his reward, he was no sooner arrived at the camp, but Catinat had orders to put him under arrest. The French lost two thousand five hundred men before the place, the preservation of which was principally owing to the bravery of the French Protestants in garrison there, and more particularly to the courage, vigilance, and conduct of Colonel Julien, whose services the Duke of Savoy acknowledged with the present of a diamond ring of considerable value. The Court of France was struck with the utmost consternation upon the news of the raising this siege, and Louvois himself was inconsolable; and going to the King to give an account of it with tears in his eyes, his Majesty answered him with great coolness, 'you are cast down for a little matter. It is plainly seen, that you are too much used to good success. For my part, who remember to have seen the Spanish troops in Paris, I am not so easily cast down.'

Immediately after the raising the siege of Coni, the French troops under Monsieur de la Hoguette, according to Schomberg's prediction, abandoned the valley of Aosta; and Catinat, who was encamped near Carignan, retired with his army towards Villa nova d'Albi, after having sent Fexquieres with two thousand foot and one thousand horse to change the garrison of Casale. And if the Germans had come up, or the Spaniards being willing to fight, Schomberg would have prevented the reinforcement of that garrison, which was already reduced to fifteen hundred men.

June 30. Some days after, Duke Schomberg applied himself to the affairs relating to the forces in English and Dutch pay. Monsieur Vandermeer, appointed by King William to be their Commissary and Pay-master, and the several Colonels, presented their accounts to the Duke, which he examined with great exactness; and afterwards made a particular inquiry into the behaviour of the inferior officers. Upon the whole matter, he found in those regiments, not only a great remissness in the martial discipline, but likewise other irregularities; which being partly occasioned by ill pay, the Duke gave effectual orders to have that point remedied; and because a Captain of Loches's regiment had killed a sutler in a riot, and another Captain led an infamous life, he caused them to be cashiered. At the same time he ordered all the officers in Turin to repair immediately to their respective commands, and declared to them, that he expected, that his Majesty's service should be performed with the utmost strictness of discipline. It was no wonder, that these troops were so disorderly, there being no body to inspect them besides Vandermeer, a man generally hated and despised; and they would certainly have disbanded themselves this campaign, if it had not been for the Duke of Schomberg's arrival.

The inglorious retreat of the French from before Coni, gained no small reputation to the Duke of Savoy's arms throughout all Italy, and had a particular influence on the resolutions of the Conclave at that time sitting at Rome for the Election of a new Pope, in the room of Alexander VIII., who died on the 1st of February. The affairs of Piedmont had kept that assembly in suspense all that time, the Italians fearing to disoblige the Court of France, by filling the papal chair with a person in the interest of Spain. But the Duke of Savoy's late success, and the approach of the German succours, raised the courage of the Italian Cardinals, who, notwithstanding the opposition of the Cardinal D'Elvrees, a Frenchman, and his faction, concerted measures with the Spaniards and Imperialists, in order to get Cardinal Pignatelli, a Neapolitan, elected Pope (2). The Cardinals Cantelmi and Giudici managed the design with that address, that when the French spoke of it to Giudici, he seemed very cool in the matter, as if he thought it could not succeed, since Pignatelli would be very unacceptable to the Spaniards, on account of the differences, which formerly happened between him and the Viceroy of Naples. This stratagem had the desired effect, and made the French more zealous for him. The Spaniards and Imperialists seeing the French engaged, concurred with all their voices, so that at the scrutiny of sixty-one voices, that composed the Conclave, fifty-three were given for Cardinal Pignatelli, who was accordingly chosen Pope, being then seventy-six years and four months old. He possessed great dignities in the Kingdom of Naples, and had been created Cardinal in the year 1681 by Innocent XI., in memory of whom he took the name of Innocent XII., and of whose inclinations, interests, and maxims, he had been a long observer.

By this time the German succours, to the number of eighteen thousand horse and foot, having

(1) The Marquis de la Fare, in his Mémoires & Reflexions sur les principaux Evénemens du Règne de Louis XIV. l. 10. seems to censure the attempting this siege, which he imputes to the orders of Monsieur de Louvois against Monsieur Catinat's judgment. 'Monsieur Catinat, says he, carried on the war in Piedmont with great conduct, courage, and success. He won the battle of Staffardo; and it was none of his fault, that we did not afterwards attack and make ourselves masters of Turin. But the repeated orders of Monsieur Louvois, his relation and benefactor, obliged him, against his will, in the latter season, to order Monsieur Bulonde to lay siege to Coni, which he was obliged soon after to raise. Neither the capacity of Monsieur Catinat, which at last occasioned him to be Marshal of France, nor the voice of the people, were able to hinder the King from sacrificing him to Monsieur Chamillard.'

(2) Bishop Burnet tells us, that the party of the zealous stood long firm to Barbigo, who had the reputation of a saint, and seemed in all things to set Cardinal Barromeo before him as a pattern. But they at last were persuaded to consent to the choice of Pignatelli, a Neapolitan, who, while he was Archbishop of Naples, had some disputes with the Viceroy concerning the ecclesiastical immunities, which he asserted so highly, that he excommunicated some of the judges, who, as he thought, had invaded them. The Spaniards had seemed displeased at this; which recommended him so to the French, that they also concurred to his elevation.

1691. ing joined the Duke of Savoy; and the Elector of Bavaria being arrived to command them, the French, who not long before threatened no less than to besiege Turin itself, were obliged to repair the Po, and to send several expresses to Court to solicit a reinforcement. The confederates, on the other hand, having vainly endeavoured to engage Catinat to a battle, bent their thoughts upon retaking some of the other places, which they had lost in the beginning of the campaign. Accordingly Prince Eugene invested Carmagnola on the 17th of September, and carried on the siege with so much vigour, that in eleven days the garrison was forced to capitulate. And because after the first taking of this place the French did not punctually observe the articles in relation to the Vandois, these took this opportunity to be revenged; and having way-laid them, took away their arms and part of their baggage. This being observed by the Germans, they came in for a share of the booty, so that the French were entirely stripped. Catinat made great complaints of this violation of the martial law; but the confederates answered, 'That they were sorry such things should happen; but that he himself had set them the first example: However, that for the future they would prevent any such disorders, provided he would do the same.'

In the mean time the Marquis d'Hocquincourt, with a body of French troops, having laid siege to Montmélian, made himself master of the town without much resistance. But the castle still holding out, it was resolved by the confederates to send into Savoy eleven thousand Spaniards, two thousand of the refugees, and two thousand of the Duke of Savoy's troops, to the relief of that fortress. These detachments were already marching by the valley of Aosta, when they received counter-orders immediately to join the main army, the confederates having formed a design to attack Catinat in his intrenchments. But that enterprize not succeeding, the allies bent their arms against Carmagnola, which Catinat was so far from attempting to relieve, that having quitted Fossano, Savillana, and Saluzzes, he retreated towards Pignerol, where he had still the mortification to hear, that the Vandois, assisted by the French refugees, had routed three thousand men, whom he had detached to lay waste their vallies. However, this did not hinder the council of France from resolving upon the reduction of the castle of Montmélian, whither Catinat was ordered to repair with part of his army. This General arrived before the place on the 6th of November, and after a most vigorous siege, wherein they had to dispute as well with the rigours of the season, as with the desperate defence of the garrison, that fortress was at last, on the 2d of December, surrendered to the French upon honourable conditions; by which means they became entire masters of all the Dutchy of Savoy; the King of France all this while calling the Princes and States of Italy, by Monsieur Rebenac his Ambassador, lest growing jealous of his successes, they should close in with the confederates, and thereby increase the number of his enemies, who in these parts began to be too strong for him. The loss of Montmélian was chiefly imputed to Caraffa, who commanded the Imperial army, and was more intent on raising contributions, than in carrying on the war, and crossed every good motion that was made. Duke Schomberg undertook to relieve the place, and was assured, that many Protestants in Dauphiné would come and join him. But Caraffa, and even the court of Turin, seemed to be more afraid of the strength of herself, than of the power of France; and chose to let that important place fall into their hands, rather than suffer it to be relieved by those, whom they did not like. When the Duke of Savoy's army went into quarters, Caraffa obliged the neighbouring Princes, and the states of Genoa, to contribute to the subsistence of the Imperial army, threatening them otherwise with taking winter-quarters among them; so that how ill soever he managed the Duke of Savoy's concerns, he took care of his own. But upon the complaints made against him on all hands, he was recalled, and Caprara sent to command in his room.

The campaign upon the Rhine was very considerable this year, tho' on that side too the French were rather gainers. Their first design was to surprize the city of Mentz by a treacherous correspondence, which they held in the place with one of the Emperor's commissioners, Conslurg, a Westphalian; which being prevented by a timely discovery, they turned their arms against Altsheim, a town five or six leagues from that city, which they carried after some resistance, and then retired towards Creusnach. On the other hand, the Imperial army, commanded by the Elector of Saxony, with the Generals Caprara and Schoning under him, passed the Rhine not far from Manheim, where the French had intrenched themselves, in order to prevent it. But though great things were expected from the Germans, they rather lost than gained by passing that river; for the French, to divert them, crossed the Rhine also at Philipsburg, which, after a warm consultation in a council of war, obliged the Germans to follow them, though not with that diligence and success, but that the others took the town of Portzheim, situate in the Marquissate of Baden Dourlach, on a neck of land, that gives entrance into the country of Wurtemberg, which the French had all along a design to put under contribution, and had never so fair a prospect of affecting it as at this time. With the taking of this place, and another of less consequence, besides the ravaging of that part of Juliers, that belongs to the Elector Palatine, the French ended their campaign that way. And as for the Germans, the execution of their designs was partly prevented by the death of the Elector of Saxony, which happened on the 2d of September, in the 44th year of his age.

The Emperor's affairs in Hungary went on successfully this year, under the command of Prince Lewis of Baden; though he committed an error, which had like to have proved fatal to him. His stores lay near him in great boats on the Danube; but upon some design he had made a motion off from that river; and of which the Grand-Vizir took the advantage, and got into his camp between him and his stores; so that he must either starve, or break through to come at his provisions. The Turks not having had time to fortify themselves in their new camp, he attacked them with such fury, that they were quite routed, 1691. routed, and lost their camp and cannon, and a great part of their army, the Grand-Vizir himself being killed (1). If the Court of Vienna had really desired a peace, they might have had it, upon this victory, on very easy terms; but they resolved to be masters of all Transilvania; and, in order to that, undertook the siege of Great Waradin, which they were forced to turn into a blockade; so that it did not fall into their hands 'till the spring following. The Emperor was led on by the prophecies, that assured him of constant conquests, and that he should, in conclusion, arrive at Constantinople itself; so that the practices of those, whom the French had gained about him, had but too much matter to work on in himself. Besides, the news of the total reduction of Ireland, confirmed him in his resolutions of carrying on the war in Hungary. It was reckoned, that England being now disengaged at home, would, with the rest of the Protestant allies, be able to carry on the war with France. And the two chief passions in the Emperor's mind being his hatred of heresy, and his hatred of France, it was said, that those about him, who served the interests of that court, persuaded him, that he was to let the war go on between France and those he esteemed hereticks, since he would be a gainer, which side soever should lose; for either France would be humbled, or the hereticks be exhausted, while he should extend his dominions, and conquer infidels. King William, on the other hand, had a sort of regard and submission to the Emperor, which he had to no other Prince whatever; so that he did not press him, as many desired he should, to accept of a peace with the Turks, that so he might turn his whole force against France.

† The Elector of Bavaria made Governor of Flanders. Burnet. Lett. Hist. I. 86.

Flanders lay exposed to great danger, where the feebleness of the Spanish government so exhausted and weakened the whole country, that all the strength of the confederate armies was scarce able to defend it. The Spaniards had offered to deliver it up to King William, either as he was King of England, or as he was Stadtholder of the United Provinces. He knew the bigotry of the people so well, that he was convinced it was not possible to get them to submit to a Protestant government; but he proposed the Elector of Bavaria, who seemed to have much heat, and an ambition of signaling himself in that country, which was then the chief scene of the war; and he could support that government by the troops and treasure, that he might draw out of his own Electorate. Besides, if he governed that country well, and acquired a fame in arms, that might give him a prospect of succeeding to the crown of Spain, in the right of his Electors, who, if the house of Bourbon was set aside, was next in that succession. The Spaniards agreed to this proposal; but they would not make the first offer of it to that Elector, nor would he ask it; and it stuck for some time at this. But the Court of Vienna adjusted the matter, by making the proposition, which the Elector accepted; and was accordingly appointed Governor, and the choice of him declared at Madrid in the Council of State; which put new life into those oppressed and miserable provinces.

This was the general state of affairs when the King returned to Lea, where having spent almost two months in the diversion of hunting, he came to the Hague to settle the operations of the war for the ensuing year, and then to return to England. The contrary winds, that detained him there, made him large amends, by bringing over Mr Henry Furness with the agreeable news of the surrender of Limerick, for which the King bestowed the honour of Knighthood upon him; and on the 18th of October embarked in the Mary Yatch in the Maeße, being attended by a squadron of men of war, under the command of Sir Claude de Shovel, Rear-Admiral of the Blue; and the next day safely landed at Margate, whence he immediately went to Kensington.

The Parliament, which was adjourned to the 31st of March, and from thence continued by several adjournments and prorogations to the 22d of May.

(1) The Lord Pagett, the English Envoy Extraordinary to the Emperor, in a letter to Sir William Dutton Colt, Envoy Extraordinary at Hanover, dated at Vienna 3^d August 1691, gives the following account of this victory.

‘ Though I have not leisure to say so much as I would, yet I think myself obliged to tell you shortly, that though a peace with the Turk is not concluded, yet I believe it may now quickly be made. For upon the 19th instant Prince Lewis fought their army, and beat them soundly. The first relation of the engagement was brought hither by the Prince of Vaudemont upon Friday the 24th imperfectly. That Day the Emperor had the particulars of it, which are, that the Turk has lost twenty five thousand of his best soldiers upon the place, besides such as were killed in the flight and retreat. Many of their most esteemed officers, Bashaws, &c. lost their lives, amongst which the Grand Vizir, the Seraf-kier, the Aga of the Janifaries were the chief. The residue of the army is entirely broken; their standards or great boats disappear; their shattered troops have repassed the Save; and the garrison left in Belgrade, which is not strong, is in great consternation. All the baggage is taken, and one hundred and fifty four field-pieces of brass, tents, provisions, and in short all they brought into the field either for subsistence or parade, is taken by Prince Lewis of Baden, who, with his victorious army, (though very much weakened in the conflict, having lost about eight thousand good old soldiers, and many brave officers, amongst whom General Souches, the Prince of Arenberg, and the Prince of Helfstein, killed, are the chief) the general hopes are yet, that the campaign will end in a peace with the Porte.’

In another letter dated at Vienna August 23, 1691, Sept. 2.

Lord Pagett writes thus:

‘ Our Court has been so taken up with rejoicing for the late important victory in Hungary, that scarce any other business is talked of. And indeed it has mended matters very much on that side; and the Grand Vizir, Seraf-kier, and Aga of the Janifaries are said to be of the number of the slain, besides twenty five thousand other Turks. On our part are reckoned eight thousand killed, among whom a great many brave officers. But how all this may dispose them to a peace, I am not yet able to say, since it is not known, who will succeed the Grand Vizir, if slain, and manage the Turkish affairs. Deserter say, that they are in great confusion, and the small remains of their army, assembled near Belgrade; which place likewise is reported to be in no small consternation. Prince Lewis, to whose excellent conduct and personal valour much of the success of this action is due, is since declared by the Emperor, Lieutenant-General.’

1691. 22d of October, being then met, the King made the following speech to both Houses.

The King's speech at the opening.
 ' My Lords and Gentlemen,
 I Have appointed this meeting of the Parliament as soon as ever the affairs abroad would admit of my return into England, that you might have the more time to consider of the best and most effectual ways and means for the carrying on of the war against France this next year.

' I am willing to hope, that the good success with which it hath pleased God to bless my arms in Ireland this summer, will not only be a great encouragement to you to proceed the more cheerfully in this work, but will be looked upon by you as an earnest of future successes, which your timely assistance to me may, by God's blessing, procure to us all. And as I do not doubt, but you will take care to pay the arrears of that army, which hath been so deserving and so prosperous in the reduction of Ireland to a peaceable condition; so I do assure you, there shall no care be wanting on my part to keep that Kingdom, as far as it is possible, from being burthen some to England for the future.

' My Lords and Gentlemen,
 I do not doubt but you are all sensible, that it will be necessary, we should have a strong fleet next year, and as early at sea, as we had this summer. And I must tell you, that the great power of France will as necessarily require, that we should maintain a very considerable army ready upon all occasions, not only to defend ourselves from any insult, but also to annoy the common enemy, where it may be most sensible to them. And I do not see how it is possible to do this with less than sixty-five thousand men.

' I shall only add, that by the vigour and dispatch of your counsels and assistance to me in this Session of Parliament, you have now an opportunity in your hands, which, if neglected, you can never reasonably hope to see again, not only to establish the future quiet and prosperity of these Kingdoms, but the peace and security of all Europe.'

Congratulatory address.
Ibid.
 Both Houses congratulated his Majesty upon his safe and happy return, after so many hazards, to which he had exposed his person, and upon the success of his arms in the reduction of Ireland; and assured him, that they would assist him to the utmost of their power in carrying on a vigorous war against France, in order to procure an honourable and lasting peace to his own dominions, and to secure his neighbours from the injuries and invasions of the common oppressor. Addresses were also presented to the Queen, to acknowledge her prudent care in the administration of the government during the King's absence.

A party formed against the Government.
Burnet.
 Notwithstanding these professions of the Parliament, it soon appeared, that a party was avowedly formed against the Government. They durst not own it before, while the war in Ireland continued. But now, since that was at an end, they began to infuse into all people, that there was no need of keeping up a great land army; and that the English ought only to assist their allies with some auxiliary troops, and increase their force at sea. Many persons, who did not understand the state of foreign affairs, were drawn into this notion, not considering, that if Flanders was lost, Holland must submit, and take the best terms they could get; and the conjunction of those two great powers at sea must soon ruin our trade, and in a little time subdue us entirely. But it was not easy to bring all people to apprehend this aright, and those who had ill intentions, would not be beaten out of it, but covered worse designs with this pretence. And this was still kept up as a prejudice against the King and his Government, that he loved to have a great army about him, and that when they were once modelled, he would never part with them, but govern in an arbitrary way, as soon as he had prepared his soldiers to serve his ends.

Another prejudice had more colour, and as Jealousies bad effects. The King was thought to love the Dutch more than the English, to trust more to them, and to admit them to more freedom with him. He gave too much occasion to a general disgust, which was spread both among the English officers and the nobility. He took little pains to gain the affections of the nation; nor did he constrain himself enough to render his Government more acceptable. He was shut up all the day long; and his silence, when he admitted any to an audience, distasted them as much, as if they had been denied it. The Earl of Marlborough likewise thought, that the great services, which he had done, were not acknowledged nor rewarded, as they well deserved, and began to speak like a man discontented. And the strain of almost the whole nation was, that the English were overlooked, and the Dutch the only persons favoured or trusted. This was national; and the English being too apt to despise other nations, and being of more lively tempers than the Dutch, grew to express a contempt and an aversion for them, that went almost to a mutiny. It is true the Dutch behaved themselves well, and regularly in their quarters, and paid for every thing punctually; whereas the English were apt to be rude and exacting, especially those, who were all this winter coming over from Ireland, who had been so long in an enemy's country, that they were not easily brought into order; so that the common people were generally better pleased with the Dutch soldiers, than with their own countrymen. But it was not the same as to the officers. These seeds of discontent were carefully managed by the enemies of the Government; and by this means matters went on heavily in the House of Commons. The King was believed to be so tender in every point, that seemed to relate to his prerogative, that he could not well bear any thing, that was a diminution of it; and he was said to have taken a dislike and mistrust of all those, whose notions leaned to public liberty, though those were the very persons, who were firmest to him, and the most zealous for him. The men, whose notions of the prerogative were the highest, were suspected to be Jacobites; yet it was observed, that many of these were much courted, and put into employments, in which they shewed so little affection to the Government, and so close a correspondence with its professed enemies, that it was generally believed they intended to betray it. The blame of employing these men was cast upon the Earl of Notting-

1691. Nottingham, who, as the Whigs said, infused into the King jealousies of his best friends, and inclined him to court some of his bitterest enemies.

The Earls of Rochester and Ranelagh made Privy-Counsellors. The Earls of Rochester was reckoned a man of parts, and to have had a good pen, but did not speak gracefully. When he came into business, and rose to high posts, he grew violent, but was thought incorrupt. He had high notions of government, which he thought must be maintained with severity. He delivered up his own notions to his party, that he might lead them. He was one of the commissioners of the Treasury in the reign of King Charles II. and afterwards Lord President of the Council; but growing weary of a place which procured him neither confidence nor dependance, he was, by the Duke of York's interest, made 1679. Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland. At King James's accession he was made Lord-Treasurer, and was one of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. Soon after, for refusing to turn Catholic, he lost the white staff, and had a pension of four thousand pounds a year for his own and son's life, besides two valuable grants. He was one of the managers for a Regency in opposition to those who were for a King. Queen Mary was so possessed against him at first, that he in vain endeavoured to recover her favour. But at last, by means of Bishop Burnet, the Queen laid aside her resentment, and by degrees admitted him into a high measure of favour and confidence. The Bishop was quickly convinced of his error, for the Earl went into an interest very different from what he imagined he would have pursued. He was for setting up notions of persecution and violence, which he had promoted in King Charles's time, and talked against all favour to Dissenters, professing himself an enemy to the present Bishops, and their methods of endeavouring to gain them by gentle usage.

The Earl of Ranelagh was a man of great parts, and as great vices. In King Charles's time the revenue of Ireland was in his management, and he was looked upon as one of the ablest men that island had bred, capable of all affairs, even in the midst of a loose run of pleasure and much riot. He had the art of pleasing masters of very different tempers and interests so much, that he continued above thirty years in great posts. He had been pay-master of the army in King James's time, and being fit for the post, he was continued in it all this reign. He was likewise among those that had voted for a Regency.

The taking off Parliament-men who complained of grievances, by places and pensions, was believed to be now very generally practised. Sir Edward Seymour, who had in a very injurious manner, not only opposed every thing, but had reflected on the King's title and conduct, was this winter, to the great mortification of the Whigs, brought into the Treasury and the Cabinet Council. He was a man of great birth, being the elder branch of the Seymour family, and was a graceful man, bold and quick. He had a sort of pride peculiar to himself, and had with it neither shame nor decency. He was in King Charles's time the most assuming speaker that ever sat in the chair. He knew the House and every member in it so well, that by looking about he could tell the fate of any question, and accordingly managed matters.

The supplies granted for the service of the next year amounted in all to three millions, four hundred and eleven thousand, six hundred and seventy-five pounds for the fleet and army (1). But the dispatch of these supplies was retarded by several incidental affairs this session; particularly the settling the conditions on which the Charter of the East-India company was to be confirmed, which took up much time (2). The amusement also given to both Houses by one

(1) For the fleet (including the ordnance and charge of building one dry and two wet docks at Portsmouth) was granted 1,575,898 l. and for the army of sixty-four thousand nine hundred and twenty-four men, 1,935,787 l. To raise these sums, 1,651,702 l. was granted upon land; and for the remainder were passed an excise upon beer, ale, and other liquors, for one year, and a poll-tax, by which all persons (except such as received alms of the parish, poor house-keepers and their children) were to pay twelve-pence quarterly for one year; all tradesmen and artificers, having an estate of the clear yearly value of three hundred pounds, and upwards, ten shillings; all gentlemen or reputed gentlemen, having an estate of three hundred pounds or more, as also all Clergymen and teachers, who had any ecclesiastical benefice or contribution to the value of eighty pounds per annum, or upwards, twenty shillings; every Lord of Parliament, either spiritual or temporal the sum of ten pounds; and all persons, who refuse to take the oaths to their Majesties double the sums charged by the respective heads.

(2) On the 28th of October several merchants, presented a petition to the Commons against the East-India company; and at the same time the East-India company put another petition in behalf of themselves; the consideration of both which was referred to a committee of the whole House. About a fortnight after the heads of the complaints against the East-India company were delivered to their Governor; to which they having put in their answer, the same was communicated to the petitioners, and the East-India company ordered to make their defence on the 20th of November.

Not only the appointed day, but several others were spent in examining the accounts, which Sir Joseph Herne, the Governor of the East-India company, delivered in, as a state of their stock and debts at home and abroad; and in considering several other petitions relating to the East-India trade, till at last the Commons agreed to the following resolutions, on the 17th of December. 1. That a sum not less than 1,500,000 and not exceeding two millions, was a fund necessary to carry on the East-India trade in a joint stock. 2. That no one person should have any share in a joint stock for the East-India trade exceeding 5000 l. either in his own name, or any other in trust for him. 3. That no one person should have above one vote in the said company; and that each person, who had 500 l. stock therein, should have one vote. 4. That the company to trade to the East-Indies should be obliged to export every year in their trade goods, being the growth and manufacture of this nation, to the value of 200,000 l. at least. 5. That no private contracts should be made, but all goods sold at public sales by inch of candle, except salt-petre for the use of the crown. 6. That the East-India company be obliged to sell to the King yearly salt-petre refined (the refraction not exceeding four or five per cent. out of one hundred and twelve) five hundred tons, at the rate of 30 l. per tun. 7. That no lot should be put at any sales in the East-India company at one time, exceeding 500 l. 8. That no person should be Governor or Deputy-Governor of the company to trade to the East-Indies, who had less share in the stock than 2000 l.

1691. William Fuller, was another cause of delay to the supplies. The conspiracy of the Papists in Lancashire to raise a rebellion in the kingdom, in order to re-inthronize King James, was attested by several witnesses, which the Jacobites were so dextrous as to take off either by fair or violent means; but nevertheless their sinister designs being confirmed by the papers taken with the Lord Viscount Preston, and several other circumstances, which amounted to a moral demonstration, some persons of note were seized, and search made after others; which brought the business to be examined before the Commons. At this juncture Fuller, who was then a prisoner in the King's-Bench, set up for an evidence, and at his own desire was brought to the bar of the Commons, where he produced several papers, which were perused by the House; and, according to his prayer, it was resolved, 'that an application be made to his Majesty, that he would please to give to Mr Fuller a blank pass for two persons, for their safe coming from beyond sea, or any other place, hither, to give their evidence, for their protection, while they were here, and for their safe return, if desired.' About six weeks after Fuller was ordered to attend the House of Commons, with the persons mentioned by him; but he pretending to be sick and not able to come abroad, several members were ordered to repair to him, to secure his papers, and to take his information upon oath. The next day Fuller's examination was presented to the House, and read; and he mentioning Mr James Hayes and Colonel Thomas Delaval to be the two witnesses, which he had informed the House of, several members, attended by messengers, were ordered to go to the places directed by Fuller, and bring the said persons with them. They went but found no such persons as had been described to them; whereupon Fuller was order-red to produce them himself, and also one Jones; 1691. which he not being able to do, the Commons unanimously declared, 'that William Fuller is a notorious impostor, a cheat, and a false accuser, having scandalized their Majesties and their Government, abused this house, and falsely accused several persons of honour and quality.' And they further resolved, 'that an address be presented to his Majesty, to command his Attorney-General to prosecute the said impostor.' Fuller was accordingly prosecuted, and sentenced to stand in the pillory; which ignominy he underwent without the least modesty or concern.

The warm dispute between the two Houses, raised by the bill for regulating trials in cases of High-treason, was a farther interruption of the publick business. This bill having been laid aside by the Lords in the preceding session, Nov. 18. was now again brought in and passed by the Commons, and sent to the Lords for their concurrence, who added a clause to it, 'that upon the trial of any Peer or Peers for treason or misprision of treason, all the Peers who have a right to sit and vote in Parliament, should be duly summoned to attend twenty days at least before the trial, and should vote at the trial of such Peer or Peers.' As it had been the custom for the Lord Steward, for the time being, to summon by his Serjeant at Arms a competent number only of Peers, to be triers of Peers, and as the Lord Steward was appointed by the King's commission, the Commons disagreed to the clause, as thinking it an alteration in the constitution; which occasioned several conferences between the managers of both Houses (1). But the result of all was, that the Lords insisted upon their clauses, and the Commons adhered to their disagreement.

The Commons having resolved, that the miscarriages of the fleet should be inquired into, 1691-2. Enquiries into the to, or Committee-man, that had less than 1000 l. 9. That the election of Governor, Deputy-Governor, and Committee for the company to trade to the East-Indies, be made every year. 10. That all dividends be made in money. 11. That no dividends be made, without leaving a sufficient fund to pay all debts, and carry on the trade. 12. That a valuation of the stock be made every five years by the accountant of the company upon oath, to be seen by all such as are concerned therein. 13. That no ships, either with permission or without, for the future, be allowed to go to the East-Indies, except only such as should be of a company, or be established by act of Parliament. 14. That no by-laws should be binding to the company, but such as were approved by a general court of adventurers, and were not repugnant to the laws of the land. 15. And lastly, that the Joint-stock of a company to trade to the East-Indies be for twenty one years, and no longer.

The next day the three following resolutions were added to the rest, viz. 'That all persons now having above the sum of 5000 l. in the stock of the present East-India company, in their own or other persons names, be obliged to sell so much thereof, as should exceed the said sum of 5000 l. at the rate of 100 l. for every hundred. That the members of the committee of the East-India company be obliged to give security to be approved of by the house, that the stock and estate they now had, should be made good 749,000 l. all debts paid. And, lastly, that (security being first given) an humble address be presented to his Majesty, to incorporate the present East-

India company by charter, according to the regulations agreed upon by the House, that the same might pass into an act.' On the 23d of December Sir Thomas Cooke, Sir William Langborne, Sir Thomas Rawlinson, and others, the committee of the East-India company, delivered in proposals concerning the security to be given; which being disapproved, the said committee was ordered to produce the persons they proposed to be security; which being done accordingly on the 29th of December, the Commons, after a long examination of the whole matter, approved of the security proposed, and on the 8th of January appointed a committee to prepare and bring in a bill to establish an East-India company, according to the regulations agreed upon by the House; but it came to nothing. On the contrary several petitions being presented against it, to which the East-India company did not give satisfactory answers, the Commons addressed King to dissolve it, and grant a charter to a new company. The King's answer was, 'It is a motion of very great importance to the trade of this Kingdom, I will consider of it, and in a short time give the Commons a positive answer.' However he was pleased to confer the honour of Knighthood on Sir John Gildenburgh, who was going to India in quality of the company's Commissary-general.

(1) Charles Montague, afterwards Earl of Halifax, distinguished himself at the first conference as a manager for the Commons. For the Lords, were the Duke of Bolton, the Marquiss of Halifax, the Earls of Mulgrave, Rochester, Nottingham, Monmouth, and Stamford.

to, Admiral Russel presented to the House the instructions given by the Commissioners for executing the office of Lord High Admiral of England, a list of the ships, and an extract of several letters and orders touching the proceedings of the fleet during the last summer's expedition; all which were compared and examined with the copies of the several orders, that had been issued by the Commissioners of the Admiralty to the said Admiral, and a list of the ships, that had been lost or damaged since the year 1688, delivered to the House of Commons by the Lord Falkland from the Commissioners of the Admiralty. And it appearing to the House, that in the whole matter the great fault, lay upon the Admiralty, a Committee was appointed to receive their answer to the accusation. The Admiral being likewise asked, how he came to lie at the Buoy in the Nore after the fleet was ready, and the wind fair for six days together? answered, that he did not think himself strong enough to go out at first, since he could not sail with above fifty ships, the Dutch refusing to go to the blockade before Dunkirk (which was to be maintained) till their complement came up; and that after the same was arrived, he then wanted provisions. And he said, that the reason why he staid so long in Torbay after the wind served to go out, was for want of orders from the Admiralty, notwithstanding he had sent several times to their Lordships for that purpose; it being one of the articles in his instructions, that whenever he came into port, he should not stir out again but by orders from the Admiralty.

Nov. 20.

On the 12th of November the Commons were acquainted, that Mr Bridges, a member of their House, could give an account of an information given him by a Captain in their Majesties fleet, that Sir Ralph Delaval had lately taken a French boat going for Ireland, with papers of dangerous consequence to the government. Whereupon Mr Bridges was ordered to name the person; and he having named the Lord Danby, a conference was desired with the Lords upon matters relating to the safety of the Kingdom. Accordingly the Lord Danby attending in his place in the House of Lords, acquainted them, that he being on board Sir Ralph Delaval's ship, when the packet of papers was opened, which had been taken in the French prize, he saw, amongst other papers, a copy of a letter from the Earl of Nottingham to Sir Ralph. Whereupon being ordered by the House to put what he had then said into writing, and to sign it, he withdrew, and did the same accordingly. Presently after a packet from Sir Ralph being brought to the Earl of Nottingham, while he was in the House, he opened it before them, wherein were the papers taken in the said prize; and Sir Ralph in his letter to his Lordship said the inclosed were all that were taken; which containing, as he thought, nothing of consequence, he did not send them sooner. But the copy of the Earl of Nottingham's letter not being amongst them, Lord Danby said, there were not all the papers, he being confident he saw the abovementioned 1691-2. copy of the Earl's letter; and named another captain of the said Squadron, who, as he believed, saw it as well as himself. Upon this Sir Ralph Delaval, (who had been ordered to attend the House of Commons,) the other Captain, and the master of the French prize, were ordered to attend the House of Lords. But upon a full examination of the whole affair, it was found, that there was not a copy of any letter from the Earl of Nottingham to Sir Ralph Delaval in the packet taken on board the French boat, but only a letter written by his Lordship to Sir Ralph for sending up the papers intercepted by him. Upon this occasion the Commons took into their consideration the confession and examinations of the Lord Preston and Mr Crome, which, according to their desire, the King had ordered to be laid before the House.

About this time Dr James Welwood, a Scots physician, to signalize his affection to the government, employed his pen in detecting and exposing the sinister designs of their Majesties enemies in a weekly paper, intitled, Mercurius Reformatus, or The New Observer. But his zeal having carried him so far as to reflect on the proceedings of the Commons, that House, ever jealous of their privileges, ordered both the author and printer of the said paper to be sent for in custody of their Serjeant at arms; from whence they were at last discharged, after having been reprimanded for their offence. However, Dr Welwood was fully recompensed for the trouble and charge of his confinement, being soon after made one of the physicians in ordinary to his Majesty (1).

About the middle of January many of the French Protestants presented a petition to the Commons, praying the consideration of that House in order to their relief. This petition having had but little effect, by reason of the multiplicity of affairs, that were depending in that House, those distressed refugees applied themselves to the King with their case in print, and their Majesties declaration of the 25th of April 1689. in their favour; both which the King commanded to be laid before the Commons on the 17th of February. A week after, the House considered his Majesty's message, and the motion already made for a supply to be given towards the relief of the petitioners; but before they came to a resolution, the King's affairs required their rising, by a sudden adjournment, which prevented the passing several bills, that were depending. Among these was a bill for ascertaining the commissions and salaries of the Judges, and to put it out of the King's power to stop them. The Judges had their commissions, during their good behaviour; yet their salaries were not so secured to them, but that they were at the King's pleasure. But the King put a stop to this, and refused to pass the bill; for it was represented to him, by some of the Judges themselves, that it was not fit they should be out of all dependance on the Court; though it did

(1) Several other affairs amused the House of Commons to little purpose, as a bill for regulating abuses in elections and returns to Parliament, which was rejected on the 12th of December, without pleading; a bill for the better improvement of the woollen manufacture of this kingdom, which was also thrown out before a second reading; a bill for the better repair of the harbour of Dover, which was likewise rejected; a bill to regulate the hackney-coaches; another to discourage the exportation of bullion, and encourage the importation of it, and converting the same into the coin of this realm; and a third to encourage privateers, wherein no progress was made.

(1) The

1691-2. did not appear that there was any hurt in making Judges, in all respects, free and independent (1).

The Parliament is prorogued. Feb. 24. Pr. H. C. II. 407. As the King was desirous to be early in Holland, he came, on the 24th of February, to the House of Peers, and passing several Bills (2), closed the session with the following speech to both Houses.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

The King's speech. I Return my hearty thanks to you all for the great demonstrations you have given me of your affections in this session, and for your zeal for the support of the government. And I must thank you, Gentlemen of the House of Commons in particular, for the great supplies you have granted for the prosecution of the war. I assure you, I shall take care so to dispose of the money you have given me for the publick occasions, as that the whole nation may be intirely satisfied with the application of it.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

"I think it proper to acquaint you with my intentions of going beyond sea very speedily; which I am afraid have been already retarded more than is convenient for the present posture of affairs. And upon that account I think it necessary to put an end to this present meeting, the season of the year being now so very far advanced, that it may prove of the last ill consequence to continue it any longer."

Then the Parliament was adjourned to the 12th of April, and afterwards prorogued by proclamation to the 29th of May.

Acts passed this third session. The most material acts passed this session were as follow:

1. An act for explaining and supplying the defects of the former laws for the settlement of the poor. As the poor had been taken care of by the monasteries, it was necessary, after their dissolution, to make Laws about them. Accordingly, by an act of the 43d of Elizabeth, overseers of the poor were first established, who were to set to work the children of such as could not keep them, to bind them apprentices; a boy to the age of twenty-four, a girl to the age of twenty-one, and to raise money for a stock of 1691-2. hemp, flax, &c. to employ such as had no means to maintain themselves, and for the relief of the lame, old, and blind, that could not work. This act was continued by the 3d and 16th of Car. I. and by the Statute of the 13th and 14th of Car. II. Any poor man coming to settle in a teneement under ten pounds a year, may be removed to the place of his last settlement within forty days. Now by this act of the 3d and 4th of Will. and Mar. the forty days continuance in a parish, intended by the 13th and 14th of Car. II. to make a settlement, shall be accounted from the publication of a notice in writing, which the poor person shall deliver, of the house of his abode, and the number of his family, to the church-warden or overseer of the poor; which notice is to be read publicly in the Church the next Sunday, and registered in a book, under the forfeiture of forty shillings to the poor of the parish.

2. An act for the encouragement of the breeding and feeding of cattle. By this act from the 1st of March 1691, any person may export into any part of the world, all sorts of beef, pork, butter, cheese, and candles, free from any imposition whatsoever.

3. An act for the better ascertaining the tythes of Hemp and Flax. As the sowing of these is very beneficial to England, by reason of the multitude of people employed in manufacturing them, and as the manner of tything them is exceeding difficult, creating many chargeable and vexatious suits; by this act every acre sown with hemp or flax, is to pay a sum not exceeding four shillings, before the same be carried off the ground.

As to the honours and preferments during the last year, John George, Elector of Saxony, and Charles Earl of Dorset and Middlesex, were made Knights of the Garter. The Earl of Pembroke was made Privy-Seal, and his place of Commissioner of the Admiralty given to Lord Cornwallis. The Lord Viscount Sidney, one of the Secretaries of State, was made Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Sir John Sommers was made Attorney-General in the room of Sir George Treby, advanced to the place of Chief Justice of the Common-Pleas. Sir Rowland Gwin was removed from the place of Treasurer of their Majesties chamber, for words reflecting on the Lord Viscount Sidney (3). The Bishoprick of Lincoln being vacant

(1) The other Bills that were depending were as follow.

1. A bill for lessening the interest of money, which the Commons had passed, and sent up to the Lords for their concurrence. 2. For disabling minors to marry without the consent of their fathers or guardians, and for preventing clandestine marriages, which the Lords had sent down to the Commons. 3. For the paying of the army according to the musters of effective men, punishing mutineers and deserters, and preventing false musters; to which the Lords had made some amendments, that occasioned great disputes. 4. Against the buying and selling of Offices. 5. For the better apprehending of high-way men. 6. To prevent frauds by clandestine mortgages. 7. Against duelling.

(2) Acts passed this Session were,

1. An act for abrogating the oath of supremacy in Ireland, and appointing other oaths; when the bill was sent up to the Lords, the Earl of Nottingham alledged, No. 13. Vol. III.

that it was in some parts contrary to the articles of the capitulation of Limerick; upon which some amendments were made, particularly that the lawyers of Limerick should not be comprehended in the bill. This occasioned two conferences between the Houses, the result of which was, that the Lords at last concurred to the bill without their alterations. Pulteney's MS. Letter to Colt. Nov. 17, 1691.

2. An act for taking away Clergy from some offenders, and to bring others to punishment.

3. An act against deer-stealers.

4. An act for the better repairing the high-ways, and for settling the rates of carriage of goods.

5. An act for relief of creditors against fraudulent devices.

(3) We have a very particular account of this affair in the following letters of Mr Warre, &c. to Sir William Dutton Colt, Envoy extraordinary at Hanover.

To

1691-2, vacant by the death of Dr Barlow, was given to Dr Thomas Tennison, who was recommended to the King for his exemplary piety, and moderation towards the Dissenters, whom the King still endeavoured by all gentle methods, to bring over to the Church (1).

471. of Scotland.
Barnet.

Some changes were likewise made in Scotland, where affairs were put into another method. Lord Tweeddale was made Lord Chancellor of that Kingdom, Lord Melville appointed Lord Privy-Seal, and most of his creatures were laid aside. But several of those who had been in Montgomery's plot, were brought into the council and ministry. Mr Johnson, who had been Envoy Extraordinary to the Elector of Brandenburg, was called home in February, and made Joint-Secretary of State for that Kingdom with the Lord Stair. It began soon to appear there, how ill the King was advised, when he brought in some of the plotters into the chief posts of that Government. As this disgusted the Presbyterians, so it was very visible, that these pretended converts came into his service, only to have it in their power to deliver up that 1691-2. Kingdom to King James. They scarce disguised their designs; so that the trusting such men was astonishing to every body. The Presbyterians had very much offended the King; and their fury was instrumental in raising great jealousies of him in England. He well foresaw the ill Effects, which this was like to have, and therefore recommended to the general assembly to receive the episcopal Clergy, and to concur with them in the government of the Church upon their desiring to be admitted; and in case the assembly could not be brought to consent to this, he ordered it to be dissolved, without naming any other time or place of meeting. It was not very probable, that there could be any agreement, where both Parties were so much inflamed one against another; and those, who had the greatest credit with both, studied rather to exasperate than to soften them. The episcopal party carried it high; they gave out, that the King was now theirs; and that they were willing to come to a concurrence with Presbytery,

From Mr Warre.

Whitehall, April 1. 1692.

"Sir Rowland Gwin acquainted the Queen, that my Lord Sidney sold all the places in Ireland. The Queen was surpris'd at it, and having taken some notice of it to his Lordship, he earnestly prayed it might be examined; and Sir Rowland was ordered to attend the Council yesterday, that he might produce his proofs. But I do not hear of any he gave, either then or this morning at the Cabinet Council; so that he is now commanded to attend the Council on Thursday next; and it is not believed he will be able to give any tolerable reason for this accusation; at least hitherto he has not pretended to any more than some general reports, no better than coffee-house talk; and some such excuse perhaps he may make on Thursday next."

From another letter of the same date.

"I told you in my last, that Sir Rowland Gwin had made himself an affair with my Lord Sidney, of which I can give a fuller account. About ten or twelve days ago Sir Rowland went to the Queen, and pretending a mighty zeal for her service, took upon him to inform her of a great abuse and corruption in disposing of employments and offices in Ireland, for that they were all sold to those, that bid most. The Queen asked him, whether he had acquainted my Lord Lieutenant with what he told her, that he might enquire into the abuse, and give a stop to it: he answered, that his Lordship was the unfittest man in the world to apply to in this matter, for that it was done by his order, and that he received the money. The Queen was pleas'd to tell this to my Lord Sidney, who resenting it, as he had reason, sent for Sir Rowland on Wednesday was se'nnight to his house, who not imagining the occasion of it, came to him. Our friend Mr. P. [Pulteney] was ordered by his Lordship, to be present. When Sir Rowland came, my Lord let him know what the Queen had told him, and desired to know, what grounds he had for the complaints he had made. Sir Rowland was surpris'd and quite out of countenance; he said, he had no ill intention against his Lordship, but only told the Queen as a report he had heard; and that his Lordship might have an opportunity to justify himself. My Lord told him, that if this had been his aim, he would have come to himself first, and acquainted him with the scandal that was thrown upon him. In short, my Lord told him, that he would have the matter examined before the Council, and that he should produce his authors. Accordingly my Lord Nottingham wrote him a letter, to let him know, that it was the Queen's pleasure, that he should attend the Council yesterday to make good his Charge against my Lord Sidney; which method was observed by reason of his being a member of Parliament; for otherwise it is probable a messenger would have fetched him. Yesterday, when the Council were met, we were all big with Expectation to see what he had to say for himself; but we were disappointed, for the Business was not called for. The reason I cannot yet certainly learn; all I know is, that Sir Rowland came to the Council-door, and desired to speak with my Lord Nottingham, who came to him, and then Sir Rowland went away. We imagine it was to desire farther time, or to make some other excuse. Whatever it was, he gained that Council-day by it; but there is since a second and positive order sent him to attend her Majesty in Council on Thursday next. You may believe my Lord Sidney is resolv'd to push the thing, and not to let it fall till he has publick reparation."

From Mr Warre.

Whitehall, April 8. 1692.

"Yesterday, the Queen being present in Council, Sir Rowland Gwin was called in, who as he had done before at the Cabinet-Council, owned he had told the Queen, that it was reported that places were sold in Ireland, but denied to have said, that my Lord Sidney took the money for them, as the Queen herself was pleas'd to declare he had. My Lord Sidney gave the board an account likewise, that Sir Rowland had not at first disowned the thing to him, but said he had no ill intention against his Lordship, telling it as a report of the town, and that he would recollect himself, and endeavour to produce those he heard it from. Mr. Pulteney, who was then present, declared the same thing; and Mr. Murray did likewise testify, that Sir Rowland had owned to them, that he had told the Queen of the selling of places in Ireland. After which Sir Rowland was asked, if he had any thing farther to say; and his answer was, Not before your Lordships, and so went away. And after some debate of the matter it was resolv'd, that it should be entered upon the council-book, and published likewise in the next Gazette, that the Report Sir Rowland Gwin had carried to the Queen about selling places in Ireland, &c. was groundless and scandalous; and that her Majesty is fully satisfied of the falseness of it."

(1) The rest of the honours and preferments were as follow:

1691-2. tery, on design to bring all about to episcopacy in a little time. The Presbyterians, who at all times, were stiff and peevish, were more than ordinarily so at this time; they were jealous of the King; their Friends were now disgraced, and their bitterest enemies were coming into favour. They continued therefore obstinate, and would abate in no point of their government; upon which the assembly was dissolved. But they pretended, that by law they had a right to an annual meeting, from which nothing could cut them off; alledging, according to a distinction much used amongst them, that the King's power of calling synods and assemblies was cumulative and not privative; that is, he might call them, if he would, and appoint time and place; but that if he did not call them, they might meet by an inherent right, which the Church had, and which was confirmed by law. Therefore they adjourned themselves. This was represented to the King as a high strain of insolence, that invaded the rights of the crown, of which he was become very sensible; and most of those, who came now into his service, made it their business to incense him against the Presbyterians, in which he was so far engaged, that it alienated that party much for him.

The affair of Glencoe. About this time likewise, a very barbarous massacre was committed at Glencoe, which occasioned great Reflections on the King, though it 1691-2. was done without his knowledge, as will plainly appear, when in the course of the history, an account is given of the proceedings of the Scots Parliament when this affair was taken into consideration.

But the most remarkable incident which happened in England during this session; was the disgrace of the Earl of Marlborough, which had very ill effects. The Earl of Nottingham came to him some day in January, with a message from the King, telling him, that he had no more use for his service, and therefore demanded all his commissions (1). What drew so sudden and so hard a message, was not known: For he had been with the King that morning, and had parted with him in the ordinary manner. It seemed some Letter was intercepted, which gave suspicion. It is certain, that the Earl thought he was too little considered, and had upon many occasions censured the King's conduct, and reflected upon the Dutch (2). But the original cause of his disgrace, is supposed II. 90. by Bishop Burnet, to arise from another consideration, namely, the motion made in Parliament for a settlement on the Princess of Denmark, independent of the King, which as has been observed, was imputed to the Countess of Marlborough, as most in favour with the Princess.

Upon

William Harbord, Esq; was appointed Ambassador Extraordinary to the Ottoman port. He embarked the 10th of November 1691, for Holland, to proceed by the way of Vienna to Constantinople. The King had received a congratulatory letter from the Grand Seigneur, desiring his mediation for a peace with the Emperor. About the Middle of February, Sir William Phipps, Knt. was appointed Governor of the Province of Majachusetts bay, and commander in chief of all the militia of New England, and Sir Edmund Andros, Knt. Governor of Virginia, Benjamin Fletcher, Esq; Governor of New-York, and Samuel Allen, Esq; Governor of New-Hampshire in New-England; the Earl of Bedford was made Lord Lieutenant of the County of Middlesex; and Sir John Lowther, Vice-Chamberlain of his Majesty's household, and Thomas Pelham, Esq; having resigned their places, as Commissioners of the treasury, the same were disposed of, the one to Sir Edward Seymour, and the other to Charles Montague, Esq; who had lately distinguished himself to great advantage, and signalized his zeal for the Government, in the House of Commons. Two days after the King conferred the honour of Knighthood upon Godfrey Kneller, Esq; principal Painter in ordinary to their Majesties. On the 17th of March, Anthony Lord Viscount Falkland and Robert Lord Lexington were sworn of the Privy-Council; and on the 19th, Thomas Coningsby, Esq; one of the Lords Justices of Ireland, was created a Baron of that Kingdom by the title of Baron Coningsby of Clanbraxile in the county of Armagh; and about a month after Sir Henry Capel was made Baron Capel of Tewksbury, in the county of Gloucester. On the 24th of March, Vere Earl of Westmoreland, took the usual oaths as joint Lord Lieutenant of the county of Kent, with Henry Lord Viscount Sidney; and Charles Lord Lansdown was sworn likewise joint Lord Lieutenant of the county of Devon and Cornwall, with John Earl of Bath; and in May, Thomas Trevor, Esq; was made Solicitor-General.

(1) His post of Lieutenant-General of the infantry was given to Major-General Talmash, that of Colonel of the third troop of guards to the Lord Calchefer, that of Colonel of a regiment of fusiliers to the Lord George Hamilton, afterwards Earl of Orkney, and that of Gentleman of his Majesty's bed-chamber to the Lord Lansdown. MS. Letter of Mr. Pulteney to Sir

William Dutton Colt, from Whitehall, January 22. 1691-2.

(2) It was said that all the resentment was for the liberty he had taken to tell the King, "That though himself had no reason to complain, yet many of his good subjects were sorry to see his royal munificence confined to one or two foreign Lords." The Earls of Portland and Rochford both Dutchmen, are supposed to be meant. Whereupon the King is said to turn his back without making any answer, and soon after dismissed him from all his employments; nor was he employed again, or called to Council, till after the peace of Ryswick. Life of the D. of Marl. I. 71.

Monsieur Bernard (in his historical letters for Feb. 1692. p. 209.) says, "It is very difficult to penetrate into the true reason of the Earl of Marlborough's disgrace, and you cannot imagine how many different conjectures there are upon this head. You know, that the Earl was the favourite of King James, who from a very moderate fortune raised him to a condition capable of satisfying the most ambitious person. He was one of the first that went over to the present King, which gained him the esteem of all the English, who loved the Protestant religion, and the liberties of their nation. His first engagements have made some persons suspect, that he might have renewed some correspondence with his old master. But it is thought by others, that if this were the case, it would have cost him more than the loss of his employments. Others are of opinion, that he has had a dispute with some Lords of the Court, who are in an higher favour than himself; and that the King seeing him in the wrong, and being apprehensive, that the consequences of such disputes might be very inconvenient, has thought proper to remove him. Some are persuaded, that his Lady has been in the fault by talking a little too much. Others suppose, that he has shewn some discontent, because he had not the command of the English troops conferred on him, and intimated, that he thought himself not sufficiently confided in. Others trace the matter higher, and alledge, that after the taking of Cork and Kingsale, where the Earl commanded the army, he expected to be made a Duke, and master of the ordinance, which not being granted him, he has ever since shewn great dissatisfaction."

It

1691-2. Upon the Earl's disgrace, his Countess was forbid the Court, and the Princess was desired to dismiss her from her family (1). But to this she would not submit. She thought she ought to be allowed to keep what persons she pleased about herself. And when the Queen insisted on the thing, she retired from the Court. There were no doubt ill Offices done on all hands, as there were some that pressed the Princess to submit to the Queen, as well as others who pressed the Queen to pass it over, but without effect. Both had engaged themselves, before they had well reflected on the consequences of such a breach, which continued to the end of the Queen's life, and was by her carried so far, that besides other lesser matters, she ordered that no publick honours should be showed the Princess. The enemies of the government tried what could be made of this, to create distractions, but the Princess gave no encouragement to them. So this misunderstanding had no other effect, but to give her enemies much ill-natured joy, and a secret spiteful diversion.

The King goes to Holland. March 5. The King having settled affairs at home, embarked for Holland the 5th of March, and arriving the next morning in the Maese, landed at Orange Polder, went the same day to the Hague, and not long after to Loo.

The Jacobite plot for the restoration of King James. Boyer. Kennet. The King had scarce reached Holland before the Jacobites began to be elevated with the hopes of their master's restoration. One Lunt, who was employed to bring over and disperse King James's commissions, having had the good fortune to be discharged from imprisonment, was again entertained in 1691 by the Lancashire Papists to enlist men, and buy arms, that if the King should be taken off in Flanders, (for which 1691-2 a project was laid, as will hereafter be seen) they might be ready for an insurrection in England, as soon as the blow was given. These preparations having spent the summer of the year 1691, and the campaigns in Flanders being ended, without any news, either of the assassination or invasion, Lunt was sent in November into France, to acquaint the abdicated King, that they were in a condition to receive him, and therefore desired him to inform them, when his affairs would permit him to make a descent into this Kingdom. Lunt returned in December following with advice, that King James would be in England the next spring; and that in the mean time Colonel Parker, and others, should be sent over with full instructions how to put themselves into a posture fit for his Majesty's reception; for now the descent from la Hague was resolved upon.

Parker and Johnson the Priest, who in conjunction with some few others, had projected the intended murder of the King, and with many the invasion, landed in England about the latter end of January 1691-2. And thinking the assassination to be the only means to make the invasion practicable, and the conquest of England easy, they communicated this design to as many as they could trust, in hopes, (as Mr Goodman deposed before the Secretary of State) to have done it before the King went to Holland. But they were so long in contriving how, by whom, when, and where it was to be done, that the time elapsed before their consultations came to maturity. However, Parker assured them that the assassination-plot would be reassumed in Flanders

It is also said, that the King having formed a design upon Dunkirk, and communicated it to the Earl of Marlborough and two others, found he was betrayed. Upon which, sending for each of the three persons separately, he taxed them with breach of trust. Two denied it, and took their oaths of it, the King himself swearing them; but the Earl of Marlborough refusing to swear, owned at last, that he had told it to his wife, who is supposed to have acquainted her sister the Lady Trycannel with the secret, by whom it was revealed to the King's enemies. The two others intrusted with the secret are said to be the Marquis of Carmarthen and the Earl of Shrewsbury.

(1) This event (says the Dutchess of Marlborough, in the Account of her conduct, p. 41) might perhaps be well enough accounted for, by saying that Lord Portland had ever a great prejudice to my Lord Marlborough, and that my Lady Orkney (then Mrs Villiers) though I had never done her any injury, except not making court to her, was my implacable enemy. But I think, it is not doubted, that the principal cause of the King's message, was the Court's dislike that any body should have so much interest with the Princess as I had; who would not implicitly obey every command of the King and Queen. The disgrace of my Lord Marlborough therefore, was designed as a step towards removing me from about her. The following letter from the Queen to her sister, affords ground for this opinion.

Kensington, Friday, the 5th of Feb.

"Having something to say to you, which I know will not be very pleasing, I chuse rather to write it first, being unwilling to surprize you; though, I think, what I am going to tell you, should not, if you give yourself the time to think, that never any body was suffered to live at court in my Lord Marlborough's circumstances. I need not repeat the "cause he has given the King to do what he has done, nor his unwillingness at all times to come to such extremities, though people do deserve it.

"I hope, you do me the justice to believe, it is as much against my will, that I now tell you, that, after this, it is very unfit Lady Marlborough should stay with you, since that gives her husband so just a pretence of being where he ought not.

"I think, I might have expected you should have spoke to me of it. And the King and I, both believing it, made us stay thus long. But seeing you was so far from it, that you brought Lady Marlborough hither last night, makes us resolve to put it off no longer, but tell you, she must not stay; and that I have all the reason imaginable to look upon your bringing her, as the strangest thing that ever was done. Nor could all my kindness for you (which is ever ready to turn all you do the best way, at any other time) have hindered me shewing you that moment, but I considered your condition, and that made me master myself so far, as not to take notice of it then.

"But now I must tell you, it was very unkind in a sister, would have been very uncivil in an equal, and I need not say I have more to claim. Which, though my kindness would make me never exact, yet when I see the use you would make of it, I must tell you, I know what is due to me, and expect to have it from you. 'Tis upon that account, I tell you plainly, Lady Marlborough must not continue with you in the circumstances her Lord is.

"I know this will be uneasy to you, and am sorry for it: and it is very much so to me to say all this to you, for I have all the real kindness imaginable for you, and as I ever have, so will always do my part to live with you as sisters ought. That is, not only like so near relations, but like friends. And, as such, I did think to write to you. For I would have made myself believe your kindness for her

A descent in England prepared by King
James.

The scheme of this descent was laid in France, and Parker and others were sent over to communicate it to the Jacobite party here. This Parker did (according to the depositions of Captain Blaire before the Privy-council) by calling their general officers and confederates together, and acquainting them, 'That their old Master had now obtained of the most Christian King thirty-thousand effective men; and that, when the spring was a little more advanced, King James, who was already marching into Normandy, would be wafted over with them into England; with assurance, that if that number was not great enough to reduce his rebellious subjects, France would spare him thirty-thousand more.' Therefore he desired all to be in readiness with the utmost speed and secrecy imaginable; and addressing himself particularly to Captain Blaire (at the instance of Johnson the Priest) told him, That he was going to command in Lancashire, but intended to move southward at his Majesty's landing; and therefore desired the Captain to join him, in regard his own men were raw, and the Captain's, for the most part, were all old officers and soldiers.

King
James's letter to his late Privy-Council.
April 2.
St. Tr.
II. 234.

In this interval King James's Queen being big with child, and drawing near her time, he sent a letter to several Lords and others of his late Privy council, requiring such of them as could possibly come, to attend him at St Germain's, to be witnesses of his Queen's labour. The letter was also directed to several Ladies, as well as to the wives of some Commoners, but the invitation was not accepted by any of them (1).

Not long after King James sent over his declaration, dated at St Germain's, April 20, 1692. to this effect, 'That whereas the King of France, according to his promise, had put him into a way of endeavouring his restoration, St. Tr. II. 253. and to that end had lent him as many troops, as were abundantly sufficient to untie the hands of his subjects, and to make it safe for them to return to their duty, and repair to his standard; and yet purposely declined sending over such numerous forces, as might raise any jealousies in the minds of any of his good subjects, as if he intended to take the work out of their hands, and deprive them of so glorious an action, as the restoration of their lawful King (all which troops he promised to send away, as soon as he was put into peaceable possession). Though the thing spoke for itself and he did not think himself obliged to say any more upon the occasion, than that he came to assert his own just rights, and to deliver his people from the oppressions they lay under; yet considering how strangely they were deluded by the Prince of Orange's declaration, and to prevent as much as in him lay the same for the future, he was willing to look

"her made you at first forget that you should have for the King and me; and resolved to put you in mind of it myself, neither of us being willing to come to harsher ways.

"But the sight of Lady Marlborough, having changed my thoughts, does naturally alter my stile. And since by that I see how little you seem to consider what even in common civility, you owe us, I have told it you plainly; but withal assure you, that let me have never so much reason to take any thing ill of you, my kindness is so great, that I can pass over most things, and live with you, as becomes me. And I desire to do so merely from that motive. For I do love you, as my sister, and nothing but yourself can make me do otherwise. And that is the reason I chuse to write this, rather than tell it you, that you may overcome your first thoughts; and when you have well considered, you will find, that though the thing be hard (which I again assure you, I am sorry for) yet it is not unreasonable, but what has ever been practised, and what you yourself would do, were you in my place.

"I will end this with once more desiring you to consider the matter impartially, and take time for it. I do not desire an answer presently, because I would not have you give a rash one. I shall come to your drawing-room to-morrow before you play, because you know why I cannot make one: At some other time we shall reason the business calmly; which I will willingly do, or any thing else that may shew, it shall never be my fault if we do not live kindly together: Nor will I ever be other by choice, but your truly loving and affectionate sister,

M. R.

To this letter the Princess sent the following answer.

"Your Majesty was in the right to think your letter would be very surprising to me. For you must needs be sensible enough of the kindness I have for my Lady Marlborough, to know, that a command from you to part with her must be the greatest mortification in the world to me; and indeed of such a nature, as I might well have hoped your kindness

No. 13. Vol. III.

"to me would have always prevented. I am satisfied she cannot have been guilty of any fault to you. And it would be extremely to her advantage, if I could here repeat every word that ever she had said to me of you in her whole life. I confess, it is no small addition to my trouble to find the want of your Majesty's kindness to me upon this occasion; since I am sure I have always endeavoured to deserve it by all the actions of my life.

"Your care of my present condition is extremely obliging. And if you would be pleased to add to it so far, as upon my account to re-call your severe command (as I must beg leave to call it in a matter so tender to me, and so little reasonable, as I think, to be imposed upon me, that you would scarce require it from the meanest of your subjects) I should ever acknowledge it as a very agreeable mark of your kindness to me. And I must as freely own, that as I think this proceeding can be for no other intent than to give me a very sensible mortification, so there is no misery that I cannot readily resolve to suffer rather than the thoughts of parting with her. If, after all this that I have said, I must still find myself so unhappy as to be farther pressed in this matter, yet your Majesty may be assured that, as my past actions have given the greatest testimony of my respect both for the King and you, so it shall always be my endeavour, wherever I am, to preserve it carefully for the time to come, as becomes

From the Cockpit,
Feb. 6th, 1692.

Your Majesty's
very affectionate sister and servant,
ANNE.

To this the Princess received no answer, but a message by the Lord Chamberlain to forbid the Countess of Marlborough's continuing any longer at the Cockpit. Upon this the Princess left the Cockpit, and removed to Lion house, which she borrowed of the Duke of Somerset.

(1) The letter was directed not only to Privy-councillors but to the Duchesses of Somerset and Beaufort, the 1692. * look back and take the matter from the beginning. And it could not be forgotten, that as soon as he had notice of the Prince's intentions to invade him, he put himself both by sea and land into the best posture of defence he was able, and seemed to have done the same so effectually, that though the French King offered him considerable succours, he refused them, and threw himself wholly upon the fidelity of the English army; and at the same time applied himself to give reasonable satisfaction to the minds of his good subjects, and undeceive them in respect to the danger of the intended invasion. But they perceived it not 'till it was too late, and the defection grown so general, that he was at length necessitated to retire into France, in order to avoid the present danger, which threatened him, and to preserve himself for better times, and a more happy opportunity, which was then put into his hands. Upon what foundation of justice or common sense, the Prince's faction in England were pleased to treat his escape out of the hands of his enemies in the stile of an Abdication, which was never before used to signify any thing but a voluntary resignation; but upon which they

* built such a superstructure, as to make an ancient hereditary monarchy become elective. * He then proceeds to shew the miseries and inconveniencies, which he supposes had already, and would still attend such unwarrantable proceedings; insists upon the indisputable title of his only son, hoping his Queen was then with child of another; sets forth the calamitous condition of Europe, by reason of that war, an end of which there could be no reasonable prospect of 'till his restoration; prohibits his subjects to pay any taxes to support the present usurpation; and to gain them all over to his service, he declares he would pardon all of them who should return to their duty (except the persons hereafter named) provided all magistrates, upon notice of his landing, made some publick manifestation of their allegiance to him, and submission to his authority. And he further declared, that if any of the soldiery, who were in the Prince's service, should come in to him, they should be pardoned, and have their pay and arrears. He likewise promised to maintain the Church of England, and earnestly recommended to his Parliament the settling of liberty of conscience; and, in a word, to do the Marchioness of Hollifax, the Countesses of Derby, Mulgrave, Rutland, Brooks, Nottingham, Lumley, and Danby; the Ladies Fitz-harding, and Fretchville, and to the wives of Sir John Trevor, Speaker, Sir Edward Seymour, Sir Christopher Mulgrave, Sir Thomas Stamp, Mayor; Sir William Aylmer and Sir Richard Levett, the two Sheriffs, and lastly to Doctor Chamberlain, the famous Man-midwife. The letter was as follows:

JAMES R.

* Right trusty and well beloved cousin and counsellor, we greet you well. Whereas our royal predecessors used to call such of their Privy-council, as could conveniently be had, to be present at the labour of their Queens, and witnesses of the births of their children; and that we have followed their example at the birth of our dearest son James Prince of Wales; however that precaution was not enough to hinder us from the malicious aspersions of such as were resolved to deprive us of our Royal right; that we may not be wanting to ourself, now it hath pleased Almighty God, the supporter of truth, to give us hopes of further issue, our dear comfort the Queen being big, and drawing near her time; we have thought fit to require such of our Privy-council, as can come, to attend us here at St Germain's, to be witnesses to our said Consort the Queen's labour: We do therefore hereby signify this our Royal pleasure to you, that you may use all possible means to come with what convenient haste you can, the Queen looking about the middle of May next. And that you may have no scruple on our side, our dear brother the most Christian King has given his Royal word and promise to you, as we hereby do, that you shall have leave to come, and, the Queen's labour being over, to return with all safety. The iniquity of the times, the tyranny of strangers, and misled party of our own subjects, brought us under the necessity of using this unusual way; yet we hope it will convince the world of the truth and candour of our proceedings, to the confusion of our enemies. We, not doubting of your compliance herewith, bid you heartily farewell. Given at our Court at the Castle of St Germain's, the 2d of April, N.S. 1692, and in the eighth year of our reign.

This letter was animadverted upon in a pamphlet, printed the same year, and intitled, The late King

James's letter to his Privy-counsellors; with just reflections upon it, and upon the pretended Prince of Wales; and a short account of the judgment of the Parliament 1 Edw. IV. in consultation of the author of The case of allegiance to a King in possession; with the reasons why the sham birth hath not been publicly exposed. The author of this piece observes, 'That the birth of the pretended Prince of Wales would have been less suspected, if all the witnesses, who swore materially, were not to be thought parties; if the Bishops had not been sent to the Tower, as it were on purpose to remove the necessity of sending for the then Archbishop of Canterbury, who had not at that time resigned himself up to the French interest; if there had been credible proof of the late Queen's having been with child, before she was brought to bed; and she had not passed the years, at which it was usual for Italian women to bear children.'

He takes notice afterwards, 'That some men whose crimes in former reigns, and professed enmity to the liberties of England, had engaged them in a party, which opposed the accession of their Majesties to the imperial throne of this realm, after they had invited his Majesty's arms, and importuned him to take upon him the administration, raised a great clamour upon the silence of Parliaments in relation of the putative Prince of Wales, as if it were a tacit admission, that he was real. But certainly in this the Parliaments chose to shew, that the government is settled upon such a bottom, as makes it not the least material, whether Prince or no Prince; well knowing, that the Convention, which afterwards became a Parliament, upon acting under a legal head, (as did the Parliament, which afterwards turned into a Convention by the depol of Richard II. acted with Henry IV.) exercised a power, which was vested in them by the constitution of this monarchy, and followed the wise examples of Henry VIII. and Queen Elizabeth of glorious memory, Henry VIII. though he had bastardized both his daughters, Mary and Elizabeth, yet settled the crown upon them both successively, in remainder after his son Edward, without taking off the illegitimation of either daughter: Whereby he certainly placed the right of their successions upon a surer foundation, from the authority of the King and States to dispose of the crown, than if he had declared either of the sisters to be legitimate. Nor indeed would he have done this

1692. 'do every thing, that might tend to the honour and welfare of the nation (1).'

When Parker went into Lancashire he took with him several good officers, some of whom stayed with him in that county, and others he disposed of in Yorkshire and the Bishoprick of Durham. His head-quarters were at Mr Walmesley's at Dungan-Hall, from whence he issued out his orders. And because their arms were, for fear of a discovery, hid in woods and grounds, or buried between walls and in cellars and out-houses, he ordered them all to be taken out, and immediately distributed among the officers and enlisted men; while Mr James Fountaine, as Lieutenant-Colonel to the Lord Monigomery, and Colonel Holman, were completing each a regiment of horse in London, to join King James at his landing. For by this time that King, with his army of English, Scots, Irish, and French, was at la Hogue, ready to embark for England. And at the same time the Jacobites here sent Captain Lloyd express to the Lord Melfort, to acquaint him that they had corrupted several of the English sea-commanders, particularly

'without shewing at the same time that one was illegitimate, the question being, Whether the mother of Mary, or the mother of Elizabeth, was the true and lawful wife. And tho' Queen Elizabeth had full opportunity and power to cause the act, which bastardized her to be repealed, especially after the Protestant religion was thoroughly settled, and that party crushed, who held the Pope's authority to make good the marriage of Henry VIII with his brother's wife carnally known by him; yet she wisely contented herself with a title derived from that constitution of the Monarchy, by virtue of which the crown had been settled, rather than to fetch one from heaven by a divine right of birth.' State Tracts II. p. 234.

(1) The exceptions were, the Duke of Ormond the Marquis of Winchester, the Earls of Sunderland, Bath, Danby, and Nottingham, and the Lords Newport, Delamere, Wiltshire, Colchester, Cornbury, Dunblain, and Churchill; the Bishops of London and St Asaph; Sir Robert Howard, Sir John Worden, Sir Samuel Grimstone, Sir Stephen Fox, Sir George Treby, Sir Bazil Dixwell, Sir James Osendon, Dr John Tillotson, Dean of Canterbury, Dr Gilbert Burnet, Francis Russell, Richard Levison, and John Trenchard, Esquires; Charles Duncomb Citizen of London, — Edwards, — Stapleton, — Hunt, Fishermen, and all others, who had offered personal indignities to him at Feverham, or 'had an hand in the barbarous murder of Mr John Aston, and of Mr Cressy, or of any others who had been illegally condemned and executed for their loyalty; and all spies, and such as had betrayed his counsels during his late absence from England.' This Declaration was answered by Dr W. Lloyd, Bishop of St Asaph, in a pamphlet printed in 1692, under the title of A second letter to a friend concerning a French invasion, in which the declaration lately dispersed under the title of His Majesty's most gracious declaration to all his loving subjects, commanding their assistance against the Prince of Orange and his adherents, is intirely and exactly published, according to the dispersed copies; with some short observations upon it. He observes, 'That there is nothing in the declaration, which a reasonable man, who remembered King James's reign, especially the conclusion of it, would have expected in it. If the design, says he, of such a declaration be to give satisfaction to the minds of the subjects, it ought at least to have contained as good words and fair promises, as a Prince could give. He knew very well what it was, that had alienated his subjects from him; that they apprehended their laws, their religion, and their liberties, to be in great danger; and could not but know, that he had given them too just occasion for such jealousies and fears. And it is wonderful, that he should think of publishing a declaration, and not think fit to give the least satisfaction about these matters; not to say one word about popery and arbitrary power, nor to give any express promises, that he would remove these fears. The only thing he appeals to is the justice of his cause; and does not think himself obliged to say any thing more upon this occasion, than that he comes to assert his own just rights, &c. But this was not the controversy between him and his people; they did not dispute then his right to the crown (though they have some reason to do it now) and yet were willing to part with him, when he thought fit to leave them; and if he knew what made them so, and hoped to return again by their assistance, and with their good liking, any one but those of his own Council would have thought him obliged to say something of it.' He then vindicates the Prince of Orange, from the reflections cast upon him in the declaration, and denies that he afterwards appeared to be any other than his own declaration had represented him. 'He came not for the crown, but to reform abuses, and to secure the succession, which the right of his Princess, and his own right and interest, the preservation of the Protestant religion, and of the liberties of Europe, gave him a right and authority to meddle with. But besides his expectation, and original intention, he has the crown, which he came not for. He has deceived no body in it; but if any one be deceived, King James and the people of England have deceived him; the one in leaving the crown, and the other in placing it on his head, where indeed it ought to be, both in right of his Princess, and for his own merits; for he, who saves a nation, had he no other claim or title, may very well deserve to wear the crown, especially when it was with the free consent of the Princess, our most gracious Queen, and upon the desires of the estates of the realm, and still necessary to save the nation.' He afterwards endeavours to shew, that the French King was author of all the present wars in Europe. 'Who, says he, has been the great disturber of the peace of Europe, but his most Christian Majesty? With whom are all the Princes of Europe at war but with him? Who else has hindered the success against the common enemy, and the enlarging the bounds of the Christian Empire? Who invited the Turk into Europe? Who encourages him to continue the war after so many fatal defeats, which may probably prove the ruin of his whole Empire? In a word, what other Christian Prince is the great Turk's ally and confederate in this war? And is not this war continued and encouraged by all the power and interest of the French King, on purpose to disturb the peace of Europe, that, while the Imperial forces are otherwise employed, he may make a prey of his weaker neighbours? Who but the late King could hope to persuade the world, that to restore him to his Kingdom is absolutely necessary to the Peace of Europe; that before his restoration no rational projects of a treaty can be formed in order to a peace? He may be mistaken in this, for the French King may quickly be glad to make a peace, and leave him and his restoration out of the treaty. For things are come to that extremity now, that it is in vain to think of peace, 'till Lewis the Great be reduced to such a state as to accept it, and unable to break it. And this Argument returns upon him; for the peace of Europe is a necessary reason why he should not be restored.'

With regard to King James's promises to protect and defend the Church of England, the writer observes, that this would be a great favour indeed from him, if he should return with a French power. 'But the Church of England, says he, is protected already by Princes, who think it their duty to do it; and we think

Upon the receipt of this message, the Lord Melfort applied himself to the King of France, who immediately gave his positive commands to Tourville to engage the English fleet, without waiting for the Toulon squadron under Monsieur d'Estrees.

The Queen's vigilance and care at this juncture.

The Queen being informed of these preparations, gave orders for hastening out the fleet, and putting the militia in readiness. She sent over for three regiments of foot, Selwin's, Beveridge's, and Lloyd's, from Holland, under the command of Lieutenant-General Talbot, which, together with some other troops remaining then in the kingdom, formed afterwards a camp near Portsmouth. And to be better secured from the dangers of an insurrection, she published a proclamation on the 4th of May, commanding 'all Papists and reputed Papists forthwith to depart from the cities of London and Westminster, and from within ten miles of the same;' and to provide for the advice and assistance of a sitting Parliament, she published another proclamation on the 5th of May, requiring the attendance of the members of both Houses on the 24th of May, a day, to which the Parliament had been prorogued, declaring, 'That they should on that day meet and sit for the dispatch of such weighty and important affairs, as may be requisite for the safety of the kingdom, in a time when it was threatened with a powerful invasion from abroad.' In the next place she caused a diligent search to be made after several of the most disaffected persons, and ordered warrants to be issued out against them, upon which they withdrawing themselves from their usual places of abode, and being fled from justice, she published a proclamation on the 9th of May, to discover, take, and apprehend the Earls of Scarisdale, Litchfield, Newburgh, Middleton, and Dunmore, the Lord Griffin, the Lord Forbes, eldest son of the Earl of Granard, James Griffin, Sir John Fenwick, Sir Theophilus Oglethorpe, Sir Andrew Forester, Colonel Henry Slingby, James Graham, Mr Orby, second son of Sir Thomas Orby, deceased, Colonel Edward Sackville, Oliver St George, son of Sir Oliver St George, Major Thomas Soaper, Charles Adderly, David Lloyd, George Porter, son of Thomas Porter, deceased, and Edward Stafford (2). And to be the better guarded, she ordered the militia of Westminster, being two regiments of foot of about fifteen hundred men each, and a troop of horse to appear in Hyde-Park on Monday May the 9th, under the Earl of Bedford Lord Lieutenant of Middlesex; and the next day the trained bands of the City of London, in six regiments, under the command of the Lord Mayor and other their respective Colonels, consisting together of about ten thousand men, were drawn out in the same place. Her Majesty was pleased to go in person among them on both days, and was extremely satisfied with the good order they appeared in, and the great zeal and readiness which they shewed for her service. And because a malicious and dangerous report was spread abroad, as if some of the officers of the fleet were disaffected to the service, and that the Queen had thereupon ordered the discharge of many of them from their employments, she commanded the Earl of Nottingham to acquaint Admiral Russel, that she was satisfied, that this report was industriously raised by the enemies of the government; and that she repos'd so intire a confidence in their fidelity and zeal for their Majesties service, and the defence of their country, that she had resolv'd not to displace any of them. Whether any of the sea-officers were staggering in their duty, is from the uncertain; but however, it was good policy in the Queen to send this message; which was no sooner communicated to them by Admiral Russel, but Sir John Ashby, Admiral of the Blue; Sir Ralph Delaval, Vice-Admiral of the Red; Mr Rooke,

'think ourselves much safer in the inclinations of a Protestant King and Queen, than we can be in all the promises of a zealous Papist. And therefore this can be no argument in our case, because it offers us a worse security for our protection, than what we already have; for it is always great odds on nature's side. And yet this promise to the church of England seems fainter and cooler than some he has formerly made; which is all the reason we have to expect it will be better kept, especially there not being the least intimation of the breach of his former promises, nor any excuse made for it.' State Tracts, II. 253.

(1) Carter it seems had been applied to by them, and having given the Government intimation of it, he was ordered to humour the thing; which he did so effectually, that they credulously gave into it, to the destruction of their plot and their confederate's fleet.

(2) Mr Warre, in a letter from Whitehall, May 6, 1692, to Sir William Dutton Cole, Envoy Extraordinary at Hanover, writes thus: 'On Tuesday night last warrants were issued by the Privy-council for apprehending several persons: Upon which my Lords Huntingdon and Marlborough, Mr Edward Ridley, Mr Knevet Hastings, and Mr Robert Ferguson, were seized; and yesterday the two Lords were committed to the Tower, and the three gentle-

'men to Newgate, by warrant of the Council, for high-treason, in abetting and adhering to their Majesties enemies. And my Lord Brudenell and my Lord Fanshawe having been seized this morning, they are in like manner to be committed to the Tower. And a proclamation is ordered for apprehending the rest, who are fled from justice.'

In another Letter of May the 10th he writes thus: 'The Bishop of Rochester was taken into custody on Saturday last upon suspicion, and is confined to his own house. The same day Colonel Langstone, Colonel Hale, Lieutenant-Colonel Williams, Major Langstone, and three officers more of the army were seized, and are committed to Newgate for high-treason.' On the 13th of that month he writes: 'Yesterday morning Colonel Sackville, messenger in the proclamation, was taken; and the day before one Wilson, a known Jesuit, was taken in the Park. He has been heard preaching in a Presbyterian meeting in the country, and was sent to Newgate. That morning Mr Bernard Howard was committed to the Tower by order of the Council.' On the 17th he writes thus: 'Yesterday morning the Lords Dunmore and Middleton, and Sir Andrew Forester, were taken in Goodmans Fields at a Quaker's house, and in the afternoon were sent to the Tower.'

1692. Rooke, Vice-Admiral of the Blue; Sir Cloudesly Shovel, Rear-Admiral of the Red; Mr Carter, Rear-Admiral of the Blue; and the other commanders of the fleet, unanimously subscribed an Address, wherein they assured her Majesty,

'That they would with all imaginable alacrity and resolution venture their lives in the defence of their Majesties undoubted rights, and the liberty and religion of their country, against all foreign and popish invaders whatsoever.' This address being presented to the Queen by the commissioners of the admiralty, her Majesty said, 'That she always had this opinion of the commanders; but was very glad this was come to satisfy others.' And indeed it was not long before they performed their promise; and in the mean time the Queen, trusting to their fidelity and resolution, published a proclamation the same day, declaring, that the Parliament should be prorogued from the 24th of May to the 14th of June next, giving this for the chief reason; our navy being now at sea, and joined with that of our allies, and in a readiness, by the blessing of God, to resist and repel the designs and attempts of our enemies.

Danger of England for want of intelligence.
Burnet.

Notwithstanding these precautions, England was at this time in greater danger than, for want of intelligence, was apprehended by the ministry. King James with fourteen thousand English and Irish, and Marshal Belfonds with three thousand French, were to sail in April from Cherbourg and La Hogue, and some other places in Normandy, and to land in Sussex, and from thence to march directly to London. They were to bring over only a small number of horses; for the Jacobites undertook to supply them with horses at their landing. The French King, who was at the same time to march a great army into Flanders, seemed to think the project so well laid, that it could not miscarry; for he publicly said, before he set out, that he was going to make an end of the war. And indeed, so little care had been taken to procure intelligence, that, if the winds had favoured the French, they themselves would have brought the first news of their design. They sent over some persons, to give their friends notice but a very few days before they reckoned they should be on the English coast. But there happened, for a whole month together, such a stormy and contrary wind, that it was not possible for them to come out of their ports; nor could Marshal d'Esprees come about with his Squadron from Toulon so soon as was expected. In the beginning of May about forty of our ships were on the coast of Normandy, and were endeavouring to destroy their transport ships. Upon which, orders were sent to Marshal Tourville to sail to the Channel, and fight the English fleet. They had a westerly wind to bring them into the Channel; but then the wind turned to the east, and stood so long there, that it brought over the Dutch fleet, and also brought about our great ships. By this means, our whole fleet was joined; so that Tourville's design of getting between the several squadrons that composed it was lost. The King of France, then in Flanders, upon this change of wind, sent orders to Tourville not to fight. But the vessel that carried these orders was taken, and a duplicate, sent by another conveyance, came not to him till the day after the engagement (1).

Admiral Ruffel, on the 18th of May, failed the with the whole fleet, English and Dutch, towards the coast of France; and the day after, about three in the morning, Cape Barfleur bearing S. W. by S. distant about seven leagues, the scouts westward of the fleet, which were the Chester and Charles galleys, fired several guns; which ships, in a short time after, coming within sight, made the signal of discovering the enemy, and lay with their heads northward. Whereupon the fleet was drawn up into a line of battle, and notice given for the rear to tack, that so, if the French stood northward, we might the sooner come up and engage; but, the sun having dispersed the fog soon after four (2), they were seen standing southward, forming their line with the same tack, which our ships had on board; upon which the Admiral caused the signal for the rear to tack to be taken in, and bore away with his own ship so far to the leeward, as that every one in the fleet might fetch his wake or grain, and then bringing to, he lay by with his fore-top-sail to the mast, that so others might have the best opportunity of placing themselves, according as they had been before directed. About eight, our line was indifferently well formed, which stretched from south, south-west, to north, north-east; the Dutch in the van, the Admiral in the center, and the Blue in the rear; and by nine the enemy's van had almost stretched as far southward as ours, their Admiral and Rear-Admiral of the Blue (who were in the rear) closing the line, and their Vice-Admiral of the same division standing towards the rear of our fleet. About ten they bore

(1) Whilst the Jacobites were pleasing themselves with hopes of approaching success, the first discouragement they met with, was the report of the junction of the English and Dutch fleets: But this being contradicted the next day, lest that report should have influence upon the French, they sent over Sir Adam Blair, to assure them, that the Dutch were not yet come up. However it so happened, that, before that gentleman could reach Dover, they had certain news, that the fleets were joined indeed; and therefore one Mr Clark was dispatched into France to acquaint them with this fatal junction. But Clark was so far from gaining credit to his report (Sir Adam Blair averring the contrary) that he was imprisoned as a spreader of false news, till several other expresses confirmed his account. Upon this the King of France sent to Tourville to decline fighting; but these counter-orders came too late.

No. 13. VOL. II.

(2) Monsieur Du L  rrey, in his Histoire sous Louis XIV. says, that when the fog was dissipated, Monsieur Tourville was surprized to find it was the whole English and Dutch united fleet, which he was going to engage, whereas before he imagined it was only part of it. But however considering, that an hasty retreat would bring his fleet into such a confusion, as might prove more hazardous than a battle, he continued his orders for the engagement. He himself commanded the white squadron, consisting of sixteen ships in the center; the Marquis d'Amfreville commanded the Blue and White of fourteen ships in the van; and the rear or blue squadron likewise of fourteen ships was under the command of Monsieur Gabaret; all the fleet consisting of ships of the first and second, according to their way of reckoning in France.

(1) The

1692. bore down upon us with little wind ; and the Admiral, who still lay by with his fore-top-fail to the mast, observing, that Monsieur Tourville had put out his signal for battle, commanded, that his should not be spread till the French, who had the weather-gage, were come as near as they thought convenient.

At this time Admiral Allemonde, who commanded the Dutch squadron, was sent to tack, and get westward of the French as soon as any of his ships could weather them ; and those in the Blue (then at some distance a-stern) were ordered to close the line. But the fleets had not been long engaged before it became quite calm, so that these directions could not possibly be complied with.

About half an hour after eleven Monsieur Tourville, in the Royal Sun, a ship of one hundred and ten guns, brought to, and began the fight with Admiral Ruffel at the distance of about three quarters musket-shot ; in which posture he lay about an hour and a half, plying his guns very warmly, but then began to tow off in great disorder, his rigging, sails, and top-sail-yards being very much damaged ; nor could it be discerned, that any great endeavours were used to repair the same.

About two o'clock the wind shifted to the N. W. by W. and in a little time five ships of the enemy posted themselves three a-head and two a-stern of their Admiral, and fired very smartly, till past three ; so that Mr Ruffel, and his two seconds Mr Churchill and Mr Aylmer, had six or seven ships to deal with. About four o'clock there was a thick fog ; whereupon all firing ceased ; but, it clearing up in a little time, the French Admiral was discovered towing away northward ; and our Admiral, that he might the better come up with him, ordered all the ships of his division to do the like ; and there happening a small breeze of wind easterly about half an hour after five, the signal was made for chasing, and notice sent to every ship within reach, that the enemy were standing away. At this time many guns were heard to the westward ; and though the ships, which fired, could not be seen by reason of the fog, it was concluded they were our blue squadron, which had, by a shift of the wind, weathered the French ; but it proved to be the Rear-admiral of the Red Sir 160. Cloudsly Shovel, who was got to windward of Monsieur Tourville's own squadron, and between him and their Admiral of the Blue. After they had fired some time, the ships of both sides came to anchor, but could not discover each other by reason of the thickness of the weather ; and in this scuffle Captain Hestings, who commanded the Sandwich, a second rate, was killed, not being able to avoid driving amidst these ships of the enemy, by reason his anchors were not clear. Things being now in great confusion, the Admiral thought it most advisable to order the ships, which were nearest him, to chase westward all night, and let them know he intended to follow the French to Brest, believing it more proper so to do than to anchor ; and so indeed it proved ; for next morning he found himself nearer the enemy than those ships, which had dropped their anchors (1). About eight at night there was firing heard westward, which lasted about half an hour, part of our blue squadron having fallen in with some of the enemy's ships in the fog ; and in that dispute Rear-Admiral Carter was killed, whose last words to his Captain William Wright sufficiently shewed, that there was no reason to suspect his zeal to the service, for he recommended it to him to fight as long as the ship could swim.

It continued foggy with very little wind all night, and it was so hazy in the morning, that not any of the enemy's ships, and but very few of ours, could be seen ; but, the weather clearing up about eight, the Dutch, who were to the southward, made the signal of seeing the French fleet, and soon after about thirty-four sail were discovered between two and three leagues off, the wind being then at east north-east ; and they bearing west south-west, our ships chased them with all the sail they could make, but not in the line of battle, as they did after the fight at Beachy Head ; for the signal for a line was taken in, that so every ship might make the best of her way. Between eleven and twelve the wind veered to the south-west, when the French crowded away westward, and our fleet after them ; but near four in the afternoon the tide of ebb being over, both fleets anchored, Cape Barfleur then bearing south by west (2) ; but they weighed about

(1) The account, which Father Daniel gives of this engagement, is in substance, ' That Monsieur Tourville attacked the English corps de bataille with so much vigour, that all fled before him : That he maintained the fight the whole day from morning to night, without the loss of a single ship, though he did considerable damage to several of the English ships ; and that he made a fine retreat, which would have been as happy as glorious, had not the tide failed him. That his conduct however was so much approved, that the King his Master honoured him with a Marshal's staff on that account.' Monsieur Fourbin in his Memoirs begins his relation with somewhat more modesty, and must be supposed to know more of it than Father Daniel : He tells us ; ' That the English expected them in very good order, and suffered them to come as near to them, as they thought fit. The battle was begun, continues he, with a great deal of vigour, and even with some advantage, on the side of the French ; but the wind, which in the beginning of the fight was in their favour, changed in an instant, and was favourable to the English.

' they took the advantage of it. and with their van wheeled round the French fleet, and by that means made them be exposed to two fires at once. As their fleet was far superior to the French (who had but four and forty ships) beyond all dispute the whole French fleet would have been lost, if they had managed as they might have done. But their slowness in attacking let the opportunity slip out of their hands.'

(2) This day the Admiral gave an account of the action hitherto, in the following letter, which confirms most of the particulars abovementioned.

Cape Barfleur, S. W. distance seven leagues, May 20, 1692.

' Yesterday about three in the morning, Cape Barfleur bearing S. W. and S. distance seven leagues, my scouts made the signal for seeing the enemy. The wind westerly, the French bore down upon me, and at eleven engaged me, but at some distance. We continued fighting till half an hour past five in the evening ; at which time the enemy towed away with all their boats, and we after them. It was,

1692. about ten at night, and both plying westward, our Admiral's fore-top-mast came by the board near twelve, it having been shot in several places. He continued chasing until four next morning, and then, the tide of ebb being over, anchored in forty-six fathom water, Cape de la Hogue bearing south by west, and the island of Alderney south-south-west; but, by reason of his wanting a top-mast, the Dutch squadron, and the Admiral of the blue, with several of his ships, got considerably to the windward of him.

About seven in the morning part of the French ships, which had advanced far towards the Race of Alderney, were perceived driving eastward with the tide of flood, without ground-tackle to ride by, for they had in the engagement, and the morning after, cut away all their heavy anchors. When they were driven so far, as that our Admiral judged he could reach them, he made the signal for the ships nearest to him to cut and chase, which accordingly himself and they did. But Sir John Ashby, with his division of the blue squadron, and several Dutch ships, which were weathermost, rid fast (as Mr Russell had made the sign for them to do) to observe 1692. the motion of the rest of the French ships, which continued at anchor in the Race.

Three of their great ships, being under the shore, tacked about eleven o'clock, and flood westward; but, after making two or three short boards, the biggest of them, being the Royal Sun, ran on ground, and presently her masts were cut away; and in the mean while the other two to leeward, which were the French Admiral's seconds, plied up to her. This, it was judged, they did because they could not get to windward of the weathermost ships, nor stretch out a-head eastward. The Admiral observing, that many ships of our fleet hovered about him, sent orders to Sir Ralph Delaval, Vice-Admiral of the red, who was in the rear, to keep a strength with him sufficient to destroy them, and to order the rest to follow the body of the fleet; which service was effectually performed (1).

About four in the afternoon eighteen of the French ships, which were got eastward of Cape Barfleur, haled in for La Hogue, where our ships anchored was calm all day. About six there was an engagement to the westward of me, which I supposed to be the Blue. It continued calm all night. I can give no particular account of things, but that the French were beaten; and I am now steering away for Conquet-road, having a fresh gale easterly, but extremely foggy. I suppose that is the place they design for. If it please God to send us a little clear weather, I doubt not we shall beat their whole fleet. I saw in the night three or four ships blow up, but I know not what they were. So soon as I am able to give a more particular relation, I will not be wanting.

(1) Mr Boyer tells us, that Sir Ralph Delaval burnt off Cherbourg the Royal Sun, a ship of an hundred and four guns, commanded by Admiral Tourville; the Admirable, a ship of an hundred and two guns, and the Conquerant that carried eighty guns, with three more of lesser note. But to be more particular, it will be proper to subjoin Sir Ralph's own letter to the Earl of Nottingham, dated from on board the Royal Sovereign, May the 22d, 1692.

I believe it my duty to acquaint you, that, on the 21st instant, Admiral Russell having made the signal for the fleet to cut their cables, I observed the French to be forced from the Race of Alderney, (where they anchored) to the Eastward; and finding, that some of them endeavoured for the bay of Cherbourg, I stood in for that place, where I found there three-decked ships of the enemy's, but so close to the shore, and within some rocks, that it was not safe for me to attempt them till I had informed myself of the road, they being hawled into shoal water. I immediately took my boats, and founded within gun-shot of them, which they endeavoured to prevent by firing at us. And, that no time might be lost, I went immediately on board the St Alban's where, for the encouragement of the seamen, I hoisted my flag; and having ordered the Ruby, with two fire-ships, to attend me, I stood in with them, leaving the great ships without, as drawing too much water. But coming very near, they galled us so extremely, and finding the fire-ships could not get in, I judged it best to retreat without shot, and there anchored; and immediately called all the Captains, where it was resolved to attempt them in the morning, with all the third and fourth rates and fire-ships. But, after having drawn them into four fathom and half water, I found we could not do our business, the water being shoal. Upon which I ordered three fire-ships to prepare themselves to attempt burning them, going myself with all the barges and tenders to take them up, if by the enemy's shot they should miscarry. Indeed I may say, and I hope without vanity, the service was warm; yet, God be praised, so effectually performed, that notwithstanding all their shot, both from their ships and forts, two of our fire-ships had good success by burning two of them. The other by an unfortunate shot was set on fire, being just going on board the enemy. Indeed so brave was the attempt that I think they can hardly be sufficiently rewarded, and doubt not but their Majesties will do them right. The third French ship being run ashore, and observing the people on board to go on shore by boats full, I ordered the St Alban's, the Reserve, and others, to fire upon her, judging it might cause them to quit her, and after having battered her for some time, I observed she made no resistance. I took all the boats armed, and went on board her. I found abundance of men on board, and several wounded, but no officers; and having caused all the people, as well those that were wounded, as others, to be taken out, I set her on fire; and, had I not had notice by my scouts, that thirty ships were standing with us, had sent all the French on shore, who are now very troublesome to me. The ships we saw proved to be Sir John Ashby and the Dutch coming from the westward. We are proceeding together to the eastward to La Hogue, where I am informed three or four of the enemy's ships are; and, if so, I hope God will give us good success. I expect to find the Admiral to-morrow, where I hope to hear he has destroyed some of the enemy's ships, having left him in chase of them last night, standing to the eastward, and pretty near them, as I judged. My Lord, I hope you will excuse me, if I presume to pray, you will use your interest with the Queen, that a reward may be given to the three Captains of the fire-ships, and several of the others; for greater zeal and greater bravery I never saw. I pray your excuse for being thus tedious and particular. Pray God preserve their Majesties, and that their arms may be ever crowned with success both by sea and land, shall be the prayers and endeavours of, &c.

P. S. Captain Heath burnt Tourville's ship, the Royal Sun, which was the most difficult. Captain Greenway burnt the other, called the Conquerant. The Admirable was burnt by our boats; Captain Fowles attempted the Royal Sun, but was set on fire by the enemy's shot, yet deserves as well as the others.

(1) Monsieur

1692. anchored about ten at night, and lay until near four next morning; at which time the Admiral weighed and stood in near the land. The flood coming on, he anchored again; but at two in the afternoon got under sail, and plied close in with La Hogue, where he found thirteen of the enemy's ships very near the shore (1).

On Monday the 23d of May he sent in Mr Rooke, then Vice-Admiral of the blue, with a squadron, fire-ships, and the boats of the fleet, to destroy those ships; but they were got in so far, that not any but the small frigates could advance near enough for service. However, the boats burnt six of them that night, and about eight the next morning the other seven were set on fire, together with several transport ships, and some small vessels with ammunition; wherein not only all the officers, but likewise the men behaved themselves with great resolution and gallantry. Thus at La Hogue and Cherbourg were burnt two ships of one hundred and four guns each, one of ninety, two of eighty, four of seventy-six, four of sixty, and two of fifty-six guns; from which time to the peace concluded in the year 1697, the French did not attempt to engage the English at sea, but contented themselves to prejudice their trade by their smaller ships of war and privateers (2).

This service being over, the Admiral failed out of La Hogue bay on the 25th, and ordered Sir John Ashby, who was returned without doing any execution on the other part of the enemy's fleet, to run with a squadron of English and Dutch along the French coast, as far as Havre de Grace, and to look out for those five ships, which he said he had seen standing eastward. But even in this he had no better success than before (3).

The resolution, with which the French bore down upon our fleet, was not a little surprizing; for they were not above fifty ships (4), from one hundred and four to fifty-six guns; and it was thought by some to have occasioned at first some jealousy amongst the English; but, if that was really the case, it was soon blown over, for every one endeavoured to do what he was able. And Remark.

(1) Monsieur Fourbin, contrary to the opinion of Father Daniel, blames the conduct of his Admiral, in this latter part of the action. 'The General, says he, neglecting to improve the advantage, which he had, of escaping, resolved, for what reason I could not imagine, to come to anchor, at the entrance of the Race, instead of steering off quite, as he should have done, not being in any condition to continue the fight. At last an unexpected accident completed our ruin. The Ship, in which the Admiral was, with several others slipped their anchors, and were thereupon driven by the tide upon the enemy. Monsieur de Tourville, who saw himself in danger, being unwilling to expose the whole fleet, which was about to follow him, and which would infallibly have been either taken or sunk, took down his General's flag. Upon this Monsieur de Pannetier, Commander of a squadron, put up a flag as a signal to rally, and thereby saved the remainder of the fleet. Those, which followed the General's fate, ran themselves ashore at La Hogue, where fourteen of our finest men of war were unfortunately burnt. I saved mine, though bored through and through, and following the remainder of the fleet, which were in no better condition than myself, we made for the road of St Malo's.'

(2) According to a relation, which we find in Kennet, the French lost five great ships in the fight, (which Father Daniel however contradicts) one of which was Monsieur Gabaret's, Admiral of the blue squadron, of ninety odd guns; so that in the whole one and twenty of their biggest ships were destroyed, besides the two frigates, and other small vessels. And, had it not been for the foggy weather, few of the rest would have escaped. On our side not one ship was lost, but the fire-ships, which were spent upon action; and besides Rear-admiral Carter and Colonel Hastings, not one Commissioned officer.

The Dutch Admiral Allemonde gave an account of this action to the States-General in the following letter.

From on board the Prince near Cape Barfleur, June 3, 1692. N. S.

'High and Mighty Lords,

'Since my two last of the 31st past, and 1st instant N. S. which gave your High Mightinesses an account of what had passed in the defeat of the French fleet, I came to anchor under this cape, where I have been since yesterday in the afternoon with your Highnesses squadron, and that of Sir John Ashby, Admiral of the English blue squadron, and some other British ships. At my arrival here I was informed by the Captain of a French fire-ship,

'who was taken prisoner, that about twelve of the ships, which had engaged your Highnesses squadron, and to which he had given chase, were got in among the rocks; upon which I prepared to go and destroy or burn them. But as I was ready to put my design in execution, I found that Admiral Ruffel was giving orders to the same purpose. I immediately offered him your light frigates and fire-ships to assist his ships, and immediately gave the necessary orders, in case he should make use of them. But as yet I know not whether those frigates and fire-ships were employed or not. All that I can assure your High Mightinesses, is, that the same day they took a resolution to destroy these ships; they burnt six of the largest, being ships of three decks; and this day the rest, which remained, the least of which carried sixty pieces of cannon, incurred the same fate, being burnt, with all their ammunition and provision, together with six other small vessels, which they had lightened of their guns, to try whether it were possible to save them, by towing them any higher; so that this expedition has completed the irreparable ruin of the enemy's fleet. I understand this day from on board of Admiral Ruffel, that orders are given out to burn the transport-vessels, which are in the bay of La Hogue, to the number of three hundred, if it may be done with safety. But, I fear, it will be very difficult, because the water is very shallow, where those vessels lie; and great resistance may be made from the land-side. I therefore leave the success of the design to Providence. On the other hand it has been resolved in a grand Council of war to reduce our fleet to fifty or sixty great ships, sail away to the isle of Uphant, and endeavour to take all the enemy's ships, that shall come off, or design to go into Brest, and to send the rest of the men of war, with some fire-ships to scour the coasts of France, as far as Dunkirk; to seek and destroy, if possible, the scattered remnants of the French fleet, that have steered their course to the East. I am,

'Most High and Mighty Lords,

'Yours &c.

'O. ALLEMONDE.'

(3) Bishop Burnet tells us, that Sir John pursued them some leagues; but then the pilots pretending danger, he came back; so that twenty-six of the French ships, which if he had pursued, by all appearance he had destroyed, got into St Malo's. Burnet II. 93.

(4) Father Daniel and Monsieur Fourbin say, but forty-four.

(1) Father

1692. as for Monsieur Tourville's running this hazard, it is attributed to the positive orders, which he had from his Master to fight the English fleet; which, had he thought fit, he might have avoided, even after they saw each other, for he was several leagues to the windward. And it is said, that, when he called his flag-officers together, they unanimously gave their opinions not to engage; but that he at last produced an order under the French King's own hand, which shewed them the necessity there was for their so doing (1). These orders were undoubtedly given him upon a presumption, that our great ships and the Dutch could not possibly join Sir Ralph Delaval's and Rear-Admiral Carter's squadrons, then cruising on their coast, before he might have had an opportunity of coming up with them. And indeed, had not Admiral Ruffel failed from the river at the very time he did, contrary to the opinion of the pilots, the winds, which afterwards happened, would have prevented his coming timely to their assistance; so that the enemy might, in all probability, have had equal, if not greater success, than we had over them. And here it may be observed, that although the confederate fleet was considerably stronger than the French, yet were the latter beaten by an inferior number; for by reason of the calm, and the thickness of the weather, it was not possible for many of the Dutch ships, or of the blue squadron, to engage; whereas had they been favoured with clear weather, and a gale of wind, it is very probable, that not so much as one of the French ships would have escaped (2).

The victory not pursued as it might have been. Burnet.

It was believed, that if this success had been pursued with vigour, considering the consternation, with which the French were struck, upon such an unusual and surprizing blow, the victory might have been carried much farther than it was. But Admiral Ruffel was provoked by some letters and orders, which the Earl of Nottingham sent him from the Queen, which he thought were the effects of ignorance; upon which he fell into a crossness of disposition, and found fault with every order, that was sent him, but would offer no advices on his part. And he came soon after to St Helen's, which was much censured; for though the disabled ships must have been sent in, yet there was no such reason for bringing in the rest, that were not touched. Cross winds kept them long in port; so that a great part of the summer was spent before he went out again, and the French had recovered out of the first disorder that had quite dispirited them.

The loss of the French fleet was sensibly felt 1692. by King James, who thereupon wrote to the King of France, "That he had hitherto, with some constancy and resolution, supported the weight of all his misfortunes, so long as he himself was the only sufferer; but he acknowledged, that this last disaster overwhelmed him, and that he was altogether comfortless, in relation to what concerned his most Christian Majesty, through the great loss, that had befallen his fleet. That he knew too well, that it was his own unlucky star, which had drawn this misfortune upon his forces, always victorious, but when they fought for his interests; which plainly let him see, that he no longer merited the support of so great a Monarch. He therefore intreated his most Christian Majesty, no longer to concern himself for a Prince so unfortunate as himself, but permit him to retire with his family to some corner of the world, where he might cease to obstruct the usual course of his most Christian Majesty's prosperities and conquests, and where nothing could more contribute to his consolation, than to hear of the quick return of all his wonted triumphs both by sea and land, over both your enemies, says he, and mine, when my interest shall no longer be intermixed with your's." The King of France endeavoured to alleviate his affliction by a kind answer, wherein he promised never to forsake him in the worst of his extremities.

The Queen was no sooner informed of the victory, but she sent thirty thousand pounds to Portsmouth, to be distributed among the sailors; ordered medals to be struck for tokens of honour to the officers, and caused the bodies of Admiral Carter and Colonel Hastings to be honourably interred. At the same time a descent into France was projected, and about seven thousand men, that were encamped near Portsmouth, were shipped there, under the command of the Duke of Leinster, who embarked on the Breda. It was intended they should land at St Malo's, July 25. Brest, or Rochefort. Great matters were expected from this expedition; but, to the general surprize, in a few days intelligence came that all the transports were returned to St Helen's with part of the fleet. It seems, the next day, after the fleets were joined, Admiral Ruffel and the rest of the commanders went on board the Breda, where the Duke of Leinster's commission was opened; and on the 28th of July a council of war was held on board the General, where it was agreed, that an attempt upon the enemy's ships at St Malo's, or at Brest, or at Rochefort, was not

A descent into France. Burnet. Barchet.

(1) Father Daniel takes no notice of all this; but on the other hand says, that several disappointments, occasioned by contrary winds, obliged Count de Tourville to come to an engagement. What Monsieur de Fourbin says of this matter may in some measure clear it up. "The views of France, says he, and the project of a descent into England, were now no more a secret. King James was already gone to La Hague, where he was ready to embark at the head of twenty thousand men, and waited only the success of a battle with the English, which Monsieur de Tourville had orders to give even at a hazard, if occasion required it. It was indeed necessary to run this risk, in order to make the descent secure, for there was nothing could be an impediment to it but the English fleet. It is not to be doubted, but if the English fleet. Numb. XIV. Vol. III.

English had been worsted, which probably would have happened, if we had hindered their fleets from joining, this project of a descent, which fell to the ground, by the blow our fleet received, would have caused the English a great deal of uneasiness and pains. But the contrary winds, which lasted for three whole weeks, and hindered our proceeding, gave the enemy time to join their fleets; so that instead of five and forty ships, which they were supposed to be, the number, after they were joined, amounted to ninety-six."

(2) This is Burchet's account, the greatest part of which is taken from Admiral Ruffel's letter to the Earl of Nottingham, dated from Portsmouth, June 2, 1692. See Lettres Historiques. II. 108.

1692, not then practicable, the season of the year being so far advanced. The flag-officers likewise by themselves came to a determination, 'That, since the land-forces were come to the fleet, something might have been attempted at one of those places with probability of success, were not the season of the year so far spent, as not to admit of the fleet's going thither with safety.' It was complained, That the Earl of Nottingham being ignorant of sea-affairs, and not consulting seamen, sent orders which could not be obeyed without endangering the whole fleet. The Queen sent to Portsmouth a committee of Privy-counsellors, the Lord Steward, Lord Chamberlain, the Earls of Nottingham and Rochester, and the Lords Sidney and Cornwallis, who having given fresh orders to the fleet, and conferred with the Generals, returned to London. The soldiers, after having lain on board almost a month, were, to save the shame of landing them again in England, sent over to serve in Flanders, where they arrived the 22d of August. Thus the campaign at sea, which began so gloriously, ended but poorly.

The common reflection that was made on our conduct, was, that Providence and the valour of our men had given us a victory, of which we knew not what use to make. What was worse, our merchants complained of great losses this summer; for the French, having laid up their fleet, let the seamen go and serve in privateers, with which they watched the motions of our trade: And so, by an odd reverse of things, as we made no considerable losses, while the French were masters of our sea two years before; so now, when we triumphed on that element, our merchants suffered most. The conclusion of all was, Ruffel complained of the Ministry, and they complained no less of him. The merchants complained of the Admiralty; but they, in their defence, said, that there were not ships and seamen enough both to furnish out a great fleet, and at the same time to send out convoys for securing the trade.

As to foreign affairs this campaign, though the Elector of Bavaria, who, through the influence of King William, had been made Governor of the Spanish Netherlands, had put those Provinces in a far better state than formerly, yet that did not hinder the King of France from attempting the siege of Namur, one of the strongest places in all those parts, both by it's advantageous situation on the confluence of the Sambre and the Meuse, and it's good fortifications, but principally a castle built upon a hill in an angle formed by those two rivers. The French King invested the town in person and pursued the siege with such vigour and diligence, that, in four days, he made himself master of all the out-works near St. Nicholas's gate. The garrison, seeing it was in vain to withstand an army encouraged by the presence of their Sovereign, surrendered the town upon articles, May 26. and retired into the citadel.

Upon the news of this siege, King William with the confederate army under his command, decamped from Anderlecht, marched to Diegom, the next day towards Loivain, and pitched his camp near Betlem Abbey, from whence he continued his March towards Namur. But, before the King removed, he gave the enemy notice of his late victory at sea by a triple discharge of an hundred and forty pieces of cannon, which were answered by as many volleys of small shot from the two lines of the army. It is reported, that the French King heard this noise with a great deal of unconcern, saying, Here's a mighty stir indeed about burning two or three ships! But in fact the consequence shewed, that it was the unhappiest blow he received during the whole course of the war; for thereby his sea-coasts remained exposed to the insults of the English, the French not being able after this to set out a fleet fit to engage with that of the confederates.

The Duke of Luxemburg, who covered the siege of Namur with an army of seventy thousand men, upon information, that the King of England moved towards the Mebaigne, marched that way likewise, and the two armies, which were almost equal as to number (the confederates not exceeding seventy-five thousand men) advanced in fight of one another, the river only remaining between them. King William possessed himself of all the posts upon the Mebaigne on his side, as Luxemburg did of two villages surrounded with strong hedges and thickets on the opposite bank. But the confederates had such an intire command of the river by their batteries, that the same evening the King ordered the pontoons to be laid over it, in order to attack the enemy the next day. All things were in readiness for an engagement, but the same night, and the succeeding days, the weather proved so rainy, that a stop was put to his enterprise (1). He tried, by another motion to raise the siege; but, the town having capitulated.

(1) This circumstance is confirmed by the following extracts of original letters from James Vernon, Esq; afterwards Secretary of State, and then in the King's army, to Sir William Dutton Colt, Envoy extraordinary at Hanover; which extracts will shew likewise the motions of the confederate army.

From the Camp at Ville on the Mebaigne, the first of June, 1692.

'Our army lies still encamped in the same place, the low grounds on each side of the river lying so full of water from the incessant rains we have had ever since our coming hither, that it is not practicable at present to pass over to attack the enemy.'

'The French army lies still in our fight, though they have removed their camp something backward. There were above five hundred soldiers, that deserted from the French on Sunday and Monday last; and several have come away since, but not in so great numbers since the removal of their camp.'

'The shooting continues still at Namur. The castle, we hear, has not yet been attacked, the French playing their batteries hitherto against the new fort, where they have made but small advances, since we have given them so great a diversion by our being so near to them.'

From the camp on the Mebaigne, 5th June, 1692.

'We have nothing at present very material, the armies lying still in the same places. We have had very beastly weather almost ever since our being here; and the rains still continue; which has made a bog of the land on both sides the river, and destroyed most of the bridges we had made, so that I scarce see what we have to do here. I am almost afraid we shall not be able to succour Namur, though the castle holds out still with great bravery; and we hear they have repulsed the enemy with loss, at some assaults they have given to their outworks;'

Fort William taken by the French.

June 11.

The most remarkable action, before the citadel of Namur, was the taking of Fort William, which was raised by that great engineer Coebern, and defended by himself. The French King, being resolved to carry this work at all adventures, caused it to be assaulted; and, though all the efforts of his men proved unsuccessful, yet they returned to the storm the next day. The besieged, animated by their Commander, made an incredible resistance, repulsing twice the assailants with great slaughter; but at length the latter, with redoubled numbers, made themselves masters of the covered way, and cut off the besieged from their communication with the castle. Coebern being dangerously wounded, the garrison, who thought themselves no longer in a condition to hold out, desired to capitulate; reserving only so much time to themselves, as to send to the Prince of Barbançon, Governor of the Old Castle, to give him notice of their resolution, which he readily allowed; and thereupon Fort William, which from this time was called Fort Coebern, was delivered up to the French.

The consequence of this loss was the surrender of the citadel of Namur, which, considering the strength of the place, and the shortness of the siege, occasioned some reflections on the Prince of Barbançon, whom King William is reported to have suspected, and therefore to have desired the Elector of Bavaria to remove from his government of Namur; but, the French investing the place before the Elector could comply with the King's desire, without shewing any distrust of the Prince, his Electoral Highness contented himself with ordering the Count de Trian to accompany him in this siege, with particular instructions to observe his conduct. But the Prince of Barbançon is justified by others, who maintain, that he did all that could be expected from a man of honour and courage.

The taking of Namur was reckoned the greatest action of the French King's life; that, notwithstanding the depression of such a defeat at sea, he yet supported his measures, so as to make himself master of that important place in the view of a great army. On the other hand, King William's conduct, on this occasion, was much censured; for it was said, that he ought to have put much to hazard, rather than suffer such a place to be taken in his fight.

When

' but they may very well be lost at last, whilst we are kept at this distance from them. They, that know the inconveniences of passing a river, and through defiles, to an enemy, who stand ready to receive them, think this a hazardous piece of work, if the difficulties had not been increased by so much ill weather. I don't find but the French are reckoned superior to us in horse by at least fifty squadrons; and that they have not fewer foot. If nothing else be to be done, and that we can subsist here longer than they do, we may inconvenience them as they march off. About two days ago we sent out a detachment of forty squadrons, which, I hear, are gone towards Huy; but I don't yet know on what design. One would think it were now time for the confederates to be doing something on the Rhine and in Savoy; for it is hard to have the whole burthen lie so long upon his Majesty.'

From the camp on the Mehaigne, 6 June, 1692.

' His Majesty's army and the French continue still in the same camps. The late rains, which we are not yet freed from, have spoiled most of the bridges we had made over the river, so that we must be obliged to make them over again. We hear almost continual shooting from the castle of Namur; and we are advised by persons lately come from thence, that the besieged have behaved themselves with very great bravery; and that the place holds out still, having hitherto kept the enemy from making any considerable advance upon them.'

From the camp at Ramillies, on the Mehaigne, 8 June, 1692.

' On Monday night last, orders were given for the army to march next morning. As soon as the French observed our intentions to march, they put themselves into a posture to do the like; and the armies were both moving about the same time and the same way, each on their own side of the river, and in sight one of the other all the way. His Majesty brought up the rear of the army that day, which had no disturbance in its march. The French and we lie again incamped opposite one to the other; but they are now nearer to the river than they were before; and we lie with our right stretched towards Peruys. — Our army lies still this day; and it is yet uncertain, what we are to do to-morrow, for the orders given hitherto importing only, that the troops should not go out to forage to-morrow, by that is understood, that every one is to be in a readiness to receive what orders shall be given.

' Part of the French army were this morning in motion, but it proves only in order to extend themselves further towards their left wing, that is near to Mazy and Gembours; so that their right wing is now about opposite to the middle of their line.

' This morning his Majesty was out with ten squadrons of horse to view the ground as far as the great woods on this side Peruys.

' This afternoon the Earl of Athlone and Monsieur d' Auverquerque passed the river towards our right with seven or eight squadrons of horse, and were near some squadrons of the enemy, which brought up the rear of those, that marched. But his Majesty did not think it fit they should charge them, there being some reason to suspect, that more French horse with some of their foot might be lying in ambush behind a rising ground there adjoining; so that nothing passed, only one of their carabineers, firing his piece at some distance, shot a young gentleman son to Colonel Bencourt, who was Aid de camp to Major-General the Marquis de Forst. The bullet came in by his nose, and passed into his mouth without going further, so that it is not doubted but he will recover.'

From the camp at Sombref, 13 June, 1692.

' On the 10th instant, about four in the afternoon Monsieur Luxemburg's army began to decamp, in order to draw near to Namur, and yesterday our army marched about four leagues to this place, passing by that, which was the enemy's camp, while they lay by Gembours. We saw the enemy's camp about a league and a half distant, who lie with their left towards Mazy, but our right is extended beyond them towards Flerus.

' Before we left our last camp, we had an account, that a party of three hundred horse and fifty dragoons, passing the Sambre at Charleroy, had fallen upon a convoy of the French between Phillipeville and Walcourt, going to Namur; and, after routing the enemy, consisting of four squadrons of horse, they seized one hundred and thirty waggons laden with wine, meal, and oats, which they destroyed, and brought away two hundred horse, and one hundred head of cattle, with some prisoners.'

(1) And

1692. When the citadel of Namur was surrendered, the King lay encamped at Melle, where he formed a design to surprize Mons, which the French took care to disappoint. From Melle he marched his army to Genap, thence to Nostredame de Hall, and on the 22d of July over the Seine, when he was joined by eight thousand Hanoverians. But the King of France, contenting himself with the glory of having taken Namur, left the command of his forces to Luxemburg (1), who pitched his camp in an advantageous post, covered by a wood and thick hedges, between Engben, and Steenkirk, where King William resolved to attack him, upon the information of some persons who were thought to understand the nature of the ground, though it was found to be narrower and less practicable than the King had been made to believe it was.

Battle of Steenkirk
July 24.
Boyer.
Kennet.

Accordingly on Sunday, July the 24th, the army marched early in the morning, the heavy baggage being ordered to repass the Seine at Hall. There were several defiles to pass, and the ways to be made, which rendered it a tedious march. However about ten o'clock the Prince of Wurtemberg with the van-guard, which consisted of four battalions of English foot, two of Danes, and a detachment of Churchill's brigade, advanced towards the enemy, and fell upon them with so much vigour, that he drove them from hedge to hedge; posted himself in the wood, that fronted the right wing of their army, and erected two batteries of cannon on little eminences, one on the right, and the other on the left of the wood. Whilst these batteries were playing upon the enemy, the confederate army marched up to the head of the defile (about half an English mile from the wood, where it opened in a little plain not above half a league over, which terminated upon the right of the wood, and upon several rows of high trees planted in great order. Upon the right of this plain there was a farm, which soon after the engagement, was set on fire by the enemy, to cover by the smoke several of their batteries, that were ordered this way. From the head of the defile, upon the left of the plain, there was a deep hollow way, with high trees and hedges upon the banks of it, which reached as far as the wood, where the van-guard was posted, and where it branched itself into two other deep ways, and going through the wood upon the left to the Danes attack, and to that of the guards; and the other upon the right going along the outside of the wood. Between these two last were posted the regiments of Sir Robert Douglas, Colonel Fitz-Patrick, and Colonel O Farrol.

When the confederate army was come up to the head of these defiles, and just entering into the small plain, they were ordered to halt, except the English life-guards, and horse and dragoons, and the Lord Cutts's, Lieutenant-General Mackay's, Sir Charles Graham's, and the Earl of Angus's regiments; which being interlined with the horse, were commanded at the same time to the right skirts of the wood, whilst the Prince of Hesse's, Colonel Lewther's, and the Earl of Leven's regiments, were also intermixed with the left wing of horse, and posted upon the outside of the wood. Things being thus disposed, and the army continuing in their halt, the Prince of Wurtemberg, after he had cannonaded for above two hours, began the attack with the Danes upon the right, which was immediately followed by the other four English regiments, that composed the van-guard, and seconded by Cutts's, Mackay's, Angus's, Graham's, Lewther's, the Prince of Hesse's, and Leven's regiments. Never was a more terrible, and at the same time more regular, firing heard; for during the space of two hours it seemed to be continued claps of thunder. The van-guard behaved themselves with so much bravery and resolution, that tho' they received the charge of several battalions of the enemy, one after another, yet they drove them beyond one of their batteries of seven pieces of cannon, of which the Danes and the second battalion of the regiment of English guards possessed themselves, and which Colonel Whitcap, who commanded the English, would have sent away, had not the French cut off the traces, and carried away the horses. Sir Robert Douglas with his first battalion, charged several of the enemies, and beat them off from three several hedges, and made himself master of the fourth, when going through a gap to get on the other side, he was unfortunately killed upon the spot. All the other regiments behaved themselves with equal bravery, firing muzzle to muzzle through the hedges, they on the one side, and the enemy on the other.

The King being made sensible of the difficulties, which the van-guard had to encounter, by one of the Prince of Wurtemberg's Aids de Camp, who had already sent two messengers to Count Solms, to no purpose, his Majesty dispatched away Count Paulin, one of his Aids de Camp, with positive orders to Count Solms, who commanded the main body, to send more foot to the Prince's assistance. But Count Solms (who is said to have been always envious of the English (2) and who besides had a particular jealousy for the Prince of Wurtemberg's commanding the attacks, an honour which he would have had himself) instead of obeying the King's commands, ordered the horse to march, and the foot to halt, which proved the loss of the day. For the ground was so strait, and the enemy had such hedges, copses, and ditches to cover them, that there was nothing to do for the horse; so that, when the van-guard began to engage, they had none but part of the infantry interlined with the left wing of the horse to second them, the body of foot being almost a mile in the rear. However, the King made all possible diligence to get the infantry up, ordering a brigade to march

(1) And returned to Paris after his usual method. For, according to the old Persian luxury, he used to bring the ladies with him, with the musick, poems and scenes, for an opera and a ball; on which he and his actions were to be set out, with the pomp of much flattery.

(2) Bishop Burnet observes, 'That this Count bore

'the blame of the errors committed on this occasion. 'The English had been sometimes checked by him, 'as he was much disgusted with their heat and pride. 'so they charged all on him, who had some good 'qualities, but did not manage them in an obliging 'manner.' II. 97.

(1) The

1692. march to the wood, and forming a line of battle in the plain, with such foot as could come up. The eagerness of the soldiers to follow their Royal Leader, and to engage the enemy, was such, that they put themselves in some disorder, and took more time to form their battalions, than could now be conveniently spared; so that, before they could reach the wood, the vanguard and infantry of the left wing being overpowered by thirty battalions of the enemy, that charged them continually one after another, and by a fresh body of dragoons brought up by Boufflers, they were forced to retreat in great confusion, and to leave the wood to the enemy's possession. The English life-guards owed their preservation to the Danish foot-guards; and the Baron of Piblack's regiment of Lunenburghers being in disorder upon the skirt of the wood, and the Colonel himself lying dangerously wounded upon the place, Sir Bevil Grenville, who commanded the Earl of Bath's regiment, marched up to his relief, receiving the enemies fire, before he suffered any peloton of his battalion to discharge once. By this method he lodged himself in the hollow way near the wood, ordered his Serjeants to carry off the Baron of Piblack, and maintained his post, till he was commanded to leave it by the Prince of Nassau.

The King, enraged at the disappointment of the vanguard for want of a timely relief, expressed his concern by often repeating these words, O! my poor English! how they are abandoned! Nor would he admit Count Solms to his presence for many months after. And now considering, that the fight was not to be renewed without endangering the loss of the whole army, Luxemburg being considerably reinforced by Boufflers; and besides the night drawing on, the King commanded a retreat, which was performed with admirable order, and without any great disturbance from the enemy, who never durst engage the English in the rear.

In this battle the confederates lost the brave Lieutenant-General Mackay (1), Sir John Lanier, Sir Robert Douglas, the Earl of Angus, and divers other gallant officers, above two thousand men killed, three thousand wounded or made prisoners, and several pieces of cannon. As for the French, excepting the honour of remaining masters of the field, they had not much reason to boast of any advantage, having had the Prince de Turenne, the Marquis de Bellefonds, the Marquis de Tilladet, the Brigadier Slouppe, the Marquis of Firmacon, and several other officers of distinction, and two thousand private soldiers killed, and near as many wounded. Neither had they escaped so well, had it not been for the Chevalier de Millevoix, one of the Elector of Bavaria's domesticks, who had already given, and still endeavoured to give further intelligence to Marshal Luxemburg of the King's motions and designs, for which he was hanged on a tree, in the right wing of his Majesty's army.

The author of the memoirs of the reign of Louis XIV., who is mistaken in styling Millevoix a Secretary of King *William, says, that, * Ch. 10 his correspondence being discovered, he was made to give Luxemburg false intelligence, that the confederates would come that day towards the French army to forage: so that when the French parties assured him, that the whole army of the confederates was advancing, he could not be persuaded of it, till the brigade of Bourbonnois, which possessed the hill on the right, was attacked.

About the same time, a more infamous criminal than Millevoix was discovered, and deservedly punished. This was the Chevalier Grandval. The occasion was thus: The King's enemies, being unwilling to wait any longer the uncertain fate of war, laid a design to assassinate him in Flanders, the last year 1691. The Chevalier Grandval, Captain of dragoons in the French service, and Anthony du Mont, upon the promise of great rewards, undertook to put this horrid design in execution, while the King was Loo; but, missing their opportunity, they followed him to his camp in Flanders. From hence, Grandval returned to the French army, and Du Mont, according to the orders given him, entered himself into the confederate army, that he might take his opportunity, when the King went to visit the grand guard on the lines, to shoot him behind his back, and then make the best of his way to a body of horse, that Grandval and Parker should have in readiness, upon a previous intimation, to rescue and carry him off. But Du Mont, whatever might be the cause, after some weeks attendance went to the Court of Hanover, as one that had forsaken the French service, and the project was laid aside for that year. The King of France had lost two Ministers, one after another; Seignelay died first, who had no extraordinary genius, but he knew all his father's methods, and pursued them so, that he governed himself both by his father's maxims, and with his tools. Louvois did not long survive him. He had more fire, and therefore grew uneasy at the authority Madam de Maintenon took in things she could not understand. By this means, he at length was so unacceptable to the King, that once, when he flung down his papers upon the floor before him, upon some provocation, the King lifted up his cane; but the Lady held him from doing more. This affront, as was given out, sunk so deep into Louvois's spirits, that he died suddenly a few days after. Some said of an apoplexy. Others suspected poison; for a man, that knew so many secrets, would have been dangerous, if he had out-lived his favour. His death happened just after the project was laid for killing the King, a memorandum of which

(1) Mackay, being ordered to a post that he saw could not be maintained, sent his opinion about it, but the former orders were confirmed: So he went on, saying only, The will of the Lord be done. He was a man of such strict principles, that he would not have served in a war which he did not think lawful. He took great care of his soldiers' morals, and formed them to be both sober and just in their quarters. He had one singular quality: In councils of war, he delivered his opinion freely, and maintained it with due zeal; but how positive soever he was in it, if the Council of war over-ruled it, even though he was not convinced by it, yet to all others he justified it, and executed his part with the same zeal as if his own opinion had prevailed.

vance of his place, and continued in it some years; but, as he was young, so he had not a capacity equal to the post. He resolved to pursue the project of the assassination, in which Madam de Maintenon concurred, and Luxemburg was trusted with the direction of it. Du Mont having, in the winter, at Hanover, from some discourses and practices of his raised a suspicion, Sir William Coli, the King's Envoy there, gave notice of it. Upon which one Leefdale, a Dutch Papist, was secretly sent to Paris as a person that would enter into the design; but in reality went on purpose to discover it (1). Grand-val and he came back to Flanders in the spring, to set about it, whilst King James was preparing to invade England. In case this invasion failed, the French King did not question but all his designs would be accomplished by the King's as-sination, to which he chiefly trusted. But Leefdale, as he was going with Grandval from Antwerp to Eyndoven, brought him into a party that seized him, and carried him to Boisleduc.
He was afterwards tried by a Court-martial, and sentenced to be hanged, drawn, and quartered.
When he found that Du Mont as well as Leefdale had made a discovery of the affair, and that there was full proof against him, he confessed the whole series of the management without staying to be put to the torture. The King gave orders that none belonging to him should go near Grandval, that there might be no con-solour for saying, that the hopes of life had drawn his confession from him, nor was he strictly interrogated about the circumstances; but was left to tell his story as he pleased, which he did in the following manner, as it is related in the sentence passed upon him by the Court-Martial, of which the Earl of Athlone was President (2).

Sentence
against Grandval.
St. Tr.
II. 281.

Whereas Bartholomew de Linere, Knt. Sieur de Grandval, born at Linere in Picardy, aged about forty-three years, and now a prisoner, hath confessed before the grand Court-Martial, without any constraint by pain, or being in irons; and it farther appearing to the said Court-Martial, that the late Marquis de Louvois, in his life-time Secretary of State to the French King, in the year 1691, entered into an agreement with one Anthony du Mont about the murder of his Majesty, William III. King of Great-Britain, &c. and that the said Du Mont had framed a project, setting forth in what manner that design might be executed; that he delivered the said project to the said Marquis de Lou-

vois: That the prisoner, some time before the 1692 Marquis de Louvois's death asking his leave to go somewhere else, was ordered by the said Marquis not to go away, for that he had some business of consequence to employ him in, which the prisoner supposes to have relation to the said design; but, the Marquis de Louvois dying some time after, there was no further progress then made in the said design.

That the Marquis de Barbseux, son of the said Marquis de Louvois, as also Secretary of State to the French King, having five days after his father's death found the said project, together with a warrant for thirty pistoles to be paid to the said Du Mont, among his father's papers, the said design was revived again, and the thirty pistoles were paid accordingly. That the prisoner contracted acquaintance with Du Mont at Monsieur Rabenac's house, where Monsieur Paparel, Pay-master General to the French King's armies, saying one day to Monsieur Ra-benac (the prisoner being present) that, if they had a mind to seize the King of England, Du Mont would be a fit person for it, Du Mont replied with execrations, that he would carry off his Majesty alive or dead, as he had promised to Monsieur de Louvois.

That, Du Mont having delivered the same or the like project to Monsieur de Barbseux, the prisoner, to promote the said design, had several conferences with Monsieur Barbseux and Monsieur Paparel; in one of which Monsieur Barbseux told the prisoner, that he suspected his father was poisoned by order of the Prince of Orange (meaning his present Majesty of Great Britain) and therefore he would be revenged on him. That Monsieur Barbseux told the prisoner in another conference, that he should give Du Mont notice, that his Majesty of Great Britain wore a coat of mail; which the prisoner acquainting Du Mont with, he answered thereupon, It is no matter, I'll kill him for all that. That Barbseux had said further, he would not speak himself with Du Mont, fearing he might be taken prisoner; and, if he should happen then to name him, it might make a great breach in his fortune.

That the prisoner was engaged with one Parker, a Colonel belonging to the late King James, to put the said design in execution; and that Parker told him, he had formed the said design with the late Marquis de Louvois.

That at last the prisoner, with the said Bar-bseux, Paparel, Parker, and Du Mont, agreed upon the manner of executing the said design;
viz.

(1) Bishop Burnet informs us, that Monsieur Movel of Berne, the famous Medalist (who had for some years the charge of the French King's cabinet of medals, but being a Protestant, and refusing to change his religion, was kept a close prisoner in the Bastille for seven years) was set at liberty in April this year. And, before he left Paris, his curiosity led him to St Germain, to see King James. He happened both to go and come back in the coach with Grandval; and while he was there, he saw him in private discourse with King James.
Grandval was full of his project, and, according to the French way, talked very loosely to Monsieur Movel, not knowing who he was, but fancied he was well affected to that court. He said there was a design in hand, that would confound all Europe; for the Prince of Orange (as he called King William) would not live

a month. This Movel wrote over to Bishop Burnet in too careless a manner, for he directed the letter with his own hand, which was well known at the French court; however his Letter came safe. II. 96.

1692. viz. That the prisoner and Parker should meet at the grand guard of the Duke of Luxemburg's army, where they were to have fifteen hundred horse: That Du Mont should go to the King of England's army, and watch the time, when his Majesty went to visit the grand guard; and at the same time he was to shoot his Majesty: That the prisoner and Parker with fifteen hundred horse were to rescue and bring him off, the said Du Mont giving timely notice to the prisoner of the intended execution. That, Barbeseux giving the prisoner orders to accompany Du Mont to Menin, he gave him at the same time an order to the Duke of Luxemburg for furnishing the prisoner with such a detachment of horse, as he should require, and think necessary for the design.

That the prisoner, by Monsieur Barbeseux's order, received of Monsieur Paparel eighty Louis d'Ors; and, pursuant to Monsieur Barbeseux's directions he gave to Du Mont fifty-five Louis d'Ors out of that sum; viz. fifteen pistoles in specie, and a bill of Exchange for four hundred and sixty livres French money to be paid at Ghent. That the prisoner accordingly left Paris the 11th of September 1691, and went post with Du Mont to Menin: That he de-frayed the whole charge of the journey: That Du Mont acquainted him on the way, that Monsieur Barbeseux had promised him an annual revenue of twenty thousand livres, and to make him a Knight of the order of St Lazarus, in case the design took effect: That the prisoner, coming to Menin, went to the Governor Monsieur Portuis, as he had been directed by Monsieur Barbeseux, and obtained of him a passport for Du Mont, who parted immediately for Ghent, promising the prisoner, that according to their agreement he would send to him at the grand guard: That the prisoner thereupon went to the Duke of Luxemburg's army, and he and Parker continued at the head of the grand guard till the day before the rencounter at Leuze, without hearing from Du Mont.

That, Du Mont going to Hanover, the prisoner had kept a constant correspondence with him about executing the same design at some other opportunity. That the prisoner communicated what letters he received from Du Mont to Monsieur Barbeseux, who gave him directions what answers he should return. That the prisoner resolved with Monsieur Barbeseux, that the design should be executed this campaign, Anno 1692, which had failed the last. That the prisoner had taken some measures concerning the same with Monsieur Chanlais, Quarter-master General to the French King.

In the mean time one Frederic Aelbreyt Leefdale, heretofore Captain Lieutenant of a troop of dragoons, in the service of the High and Mighty States-General of the United-Provinces, coming to Paris, was brought acquainted with the prisoner by the means of one Sierck. That the prisoner, having contracted an intimate familiarity with the said Leefdale, discovered the said design to him towards the latter end of March last 1692, telling him, that an officer, who would ingratiate himself in the King's favour, must venture at something of consequence: That he, the prisoner, had concerted the execution of a design, upon which his fortune depended: That it was indeed a matter not without hazard, but, the greater the difficulties were, the more would be the honour; encouraging Leefdale to be concerned in it. And, the said 1692. Leefdale shewing a readiness to comply with him, the prisoner opened himself with greater freedom, and told him, that he was engaged last campaign with one Du Mont to assassinate the King of Great Britain, but it had no effect, by reason of his Majesty's leaving the army so soon; but it was resolved again to put the same in execution this year. That Du Mont by many repeated oaths had sworn he would do it; yet he, the prisoner, feared, that, if he were not present, Du Mont would not so exactly observe his orders, and therefore he was resolved to go along with Dumont, asking Leefdale, if he would be of the party; who answering, that he would, the prisoner discoursed to him at large of all the particulars concerning the design, and afterwards brought him to Monsieur Barbeseux and Chanlais.

That Chanlais, in one of the conferences held upon that subject, told Leefdale, the prisoner being by, that a great reward should be given him, the business succeeding: That Barbeseux and Paparel had both of them knowledge of the promised rewards.

That he, the prisoner, with the said Leefdale and Colonel Parker, went to St Germain's on the 16th of April, 1692, to speak with the late King James about the said design, who had knowledge of it; and to take leave of him before they began their journey. That the prisoner had audience at the same time of the said King James, the late Queen being present; King James telling him, Parker has given me an account of the business: If you and the other officers do me this service, you shall never want. And Parker, the prisoner, and Leefdale entered into a discourse about this design.

That Du Mont's wife delivered to Monsieur Barbeseux several letters, which she received from her husband, whilst he was at Hanover; and, the prisoner continuing his correspondence with him all that time, he engaged Du Mont by letters, especially those dated the 20th, and 25th of April, and the 12th of May last, to come from Hanover to a rendezvous at Aden in the country of Ravestein, in order to take a final resolution with the said prisoner and Leefdale concerning the manner of executing their design; the prisoner pressing Du Mont to hasten his journey, for fear the King of England should have occasion to repass the sea; the prisoner adding withal that he should be mad, if he failed in his business.

That the prisoner, with Chanlais and Leefdale, were agreed in what manner the assassination should be committed on the person of his Majesty, viz. That when the King should ride along the lines, or should go out to take any view; or when the army should decamp, Du Mont should lie in ambuscade, and, when his Majesty should pass within an hundred paces of him, he should then fire upon the King. That Chanlais, to whom notice was to be given before of the time, should be with three thousand horse at the Duke of Luxemburg's grand guard. That the prisoner had told Leefdale, that there would be no danger for him, since Du Mont had a secret to charm people's eyes; and at all adventures they two would keep with those, who followed the King; and when every body was pursuing Du Mont, they should have time to escape and save themselves, and carry the account to Monsieur Chanlais; and it little concerned 1692. concerned them, whether Du Mont should be taken or not, provided they could escape themselves. That the prisoner and Leefdale received their last orders from Chanlais, who told them he was going to Mons, and that they should stay for him there.

That the prisoner and Leefdale went from Paris the 17th of April last, and arrived a few days after at Mons, having waited some time for Monsieur Chanlais's arrival; and, finding he did not come, they resolved to go forward to the rendezvous by the way of Brussels. That the prisoner, as they were travelling on the way told Leefdale, that, their design taking place, the alliance among the confederate Princes would be broken; that the Princes concerned would each of them re-call their troops; and, the country being thereby left without soldiers, the King of France would easily make himself master of it, and King James would be restored again.

That the prisoner with Leefdale went to the Mayor of Boisleduc, and was apprehended at Eyndehoven (1).

Sentence
against Grandval
St Tr.
II. 281.

Grandval was executed in the camp, on the 13th of August 1692. He suffered with some flight remorse, for going into a design to kill a King. But, how black soever his confession represented the Court of France, no notice was taken of it: Nor did any of that Court offer to disown or disprove it, but let it pass and be forgotten. Yet so blind and violent was their party in England, that they resolved they would believe nothing, that either blemished King James, or the French Court.

After the action at Stenkirk, there was little done this campaign. The English forces that landed at Ostend, in August under the command of the Duke of Leinster, being joined by a detachment from the army, possessed themselves of Furnes and Dixmuyde, which they began to fortify, and, putting the country about them under contribution, became very uneasy neighbours to Dunkirk. The command of these places was given to Count Horn, who understood well the way of making all possible advantages by contributions, but was a man of no great merit, and of as little courage. This disgusted the English still more, who said, that the Dutch were always trusted and preferred, while themselves were neglected. They had some colour to censure this choice the following winter, for, upon the motion of some French troops, the Count (without studying to amuse the enemy, or to gain time, upon which much may depend in winter) immediately abandoned Dixmuyde. All he had to justify himself was a letter from the Elector of Bavaria, telling him, that he could send him no relief; and therefore ordering him to take care of the garrison, which was of more importance than the place itself. King William greatly revented this conduct of Count Horn, who till then had enjoyed a considerable share in his esteem; and it is probable, that the

(1) It will be proper to subjoin here some extracts of original letters from James Vernon, Esq; then attending the King in Flanders, to Sir William Dutton Colt, Envoy extraordinary at Hanover, relating to Grandval and his designs.

From the camp at Genap, July 21, 1692.

'The three prisoners, who were secured at Boisleduc, being engaged in a design against the King's person, were brought to the army on Friday last, and are in the Provost's hands, in order to the trial of some of them. Their names are the Chevalier Grandval a Frenchman, Du Mont a Walloon, and the Baron de Leefdale a Dutchman.
'Because you have had some part in the late discovery, I will be a little more particular about these three persons. Grandval is kept in irons, and is the person, that will be immediately tried. Du Mont, that came from your parts, is in the same house with him in the custody of the Provost, but not in the same room. He is not chained but is only guarded by three or four soldiers. I have not seen him, but I hear he spends the day in smoking and drinking, and seems very desirous to speak with my Lord Portland. I know not whether he will be gratified in it; but, by what I can hear, I am apt to believe, he may have something more to say than what he owned at Hanover; and I like him never the better, for being so long before he brings it out, especially since he had those opportunities of doing it both to the Duke of Zell and yourself. It is well for him he was so early in the discovery (though he might have been quicker in it too) for, God be thanked, the treason would have come out by hands, that were not so deeply engaged, as his seem to be, which I think I may guess by the Baron de Leefdale's being as it were at liberty.'

From the camp at Genap, July 24, 1692.

'The general officers appointed to constitute a Court-martial (whereof the Earl of Athlone is President) for the trial of the Chevalier Grandval, met yesterday for the first time, in order to settle all things relating to that trial.'

From the camp at Genap, July 28, 1692.

'The general Court-martial is still sitting upon the trial of the Chevalier Grandval. On Friday and Saturday last his examination was taken, and it remains now only, that the witnesses be confronted with him.'

From the camp at Lembeck, July 28, 1692.

'I have the favour of your's of the 18th instant; in answer to which I must acquaint you, that these greater matters [the battle of Stenkirk] intervening, have put a stop to the process of Grandval, which otherwise would have been finished; and now three of the judges are disabled from attending, viz. Lieutenant-General Mackay, who is killed; and Lieutenant-General Lanier and Tetteau are both wounded; so that I know not whether it will not be requisite to fill up their number. As for Du Mont, I cannot but repeat it again, that he is very fortunate to be favoured with the patronage of so great a Prince, the consideration of whom will certainly outweigh the ingenuity of his discovery and confession, which I wonder should not be more sincere, since nothing could have better become one in his circumstances. I am afraid, it is too partially said in his favour, that Leefdale concealed the treason for a year, for there is no manner of footsteps by any thing, that has appeared, that Leefdale was let into the business till last spring, and he discovered it as soon as ever he got Grandval out of France, if not before; and both their discoveries seem to be so near the same time, that I think it hard to say, which made it first. But I am confident the difference in time was so little, that neither of them could have notice what the other intended, if there had been any body, that would have meddled to give the advice.'

1692. loss of it was impressed deeply upon the Count's mind, for he did not live long after. Thus ended the campaign in Flanders; Namur was lost; the reputation of the King's conducting armies was much sunk; and the English were generally discontented, and alienated from the Dutch.

Affairs in Germany. Nothing of consequence was done on the Rhine. There were two small armies which acted separately, under the command of the Landgrave of Hesse-Cassel, and the Markgrave of Baireith. The French army there was commanded by the Duke de Lorge, who advancing in September towards the Rhine, with a great train of artillery, the Landgrave and Markgrave held a council of war with the rest of the Generals, wherein it was resolved, that the two armies, which were separated, should now join. This was accordingly done, and the whole German force encamped near Neustadt; but in some days they separated again, the Landgrave marching to besiege Eberemburg. He had not been gone long, before the Markgrave sent him an express, that the French were moving towards him, which made the Landgrave send away four thousand dragoons to the other's assistance. But, before they and the body of artillery could come up, the Duke of Wurtemberg, who was gone before with a body of about four thousand horse, and posted himself near Edelheim, with a design to stop the march of the French, was by them surprized in his camp by the means of a great fog, and charged so briskly, that his men had not time to put themselves in a posture of defence. About a thousand Germans were killed upon the spot, and several made prisoners, and amongst the latter the Duke of Wurtemberg himself, who was carried to Paris; whilst the French lived at discretion in his country, and obliged the Landgrave, now weakened by the detachment, which he had sent away to the Markgrave of Baireith, and afterwards by another to secure Heidelberg, to raise the siege of Eberemburg. However the Landgrave was soon after revenged of the French, for they under the command of Count Tallard, having besieged Rheinfeld, a place, which would have been of greater importance to them, if they had carried it, the Governor made so brave a defence, and the Landgrave such extraordinary expedition to relieve it, that the French were obliged to abandon the enterprise with considerable loss (both from the enemies fire, and the rigour of the season) and not without some confusion to the Court of France, who had sent orders to Count Tallard, not to besiege, but take possession of the place. The Elector of Saxony had likewise promised to bring an army upon the Rhine; but Schoening, his General, who had great power over him, was gained by the French to break this design. The Elector complained, that the Emperor favoured the circles of Franconia and Swabia so much, that he could have no good quarters assigned him for his army. And upon this occasion it was said, that the Emperor drew much money from those circles, that they might be covered from winter quarters; and that he applied all of it to the carrying on of the war in Hungary, and so left the weight of the war with France to lie heavy on the princes of the Empire. This contest ran so high, that Schoening who was thought the ill instrument in it, going for his health to the hot-baths at Dahlitz in Bohemia, was seized by the

Some men are naturally mysterious; some are so through ignorance, and some through guilt, and are loth to appear in their own colours, as long as any cover is to be found. Which of these belongs to this Gentleman, I am not well enough acquainted with him to determine.'

'Grandvaux's trial lay silent all last week, three of the Court-Martial being killed or wounded, viz. the Lieutenant-General Mackay, Lanier, and Tetart; but, their places having been supplied since by Major-General Serauvenere, and Brigadiers Clunhill and Ramsay, this day the trial was made an end of, Grandvaux in a manner confessing all the articles of his accusation. I believe it will not be long before he is executed. If you have any concern for Du Mont, I can satisfy you, that he is not tried at present, and I do not know there are any intentions to do it.'

tered. A relation of the proceedings is ordered to be forthwith printed.

'As to what you would be informed in, you will have it so soon in print from Holland, that it will not be worth while to tell it you beforehand, since it would fall so far short of the relation you have to expect. However, for your present satisfaction, I must tell you, that Barbasteux, Chamlais, and Parcel will be noted with infamy, for the part they have had so villanous a design; and when you see the printed account, pray compare it with what you remember of Du Mont's discovery, whilst he was at Hanover; and by that judge of the sincerity and ingenuity of his confession.

'Grandvaux died with what may be called great courage or stubbornness. He said nothing at the gallows, but he left Monsieur Barbasteux a legacy, that he will stick by him, having the same morning, before he went to execution, writ a letter to a friend of his at Paris, desiring, that Monsieur Barbasteux should be acquainted by the Archbishop of Rheims, that he lost his life for having obeyed his orders; which you will see published at large, with many more particulars, that I have not time to mention.'

From the camp at Nimove, Aug. $\frac{11}{25}$, 1692.

'I have received this day the favour of yours of the 5th. By the account you give of the manner, in which Du Mont made his first discovery, it is plain, how little ingenuity there is in the man, who, in his first confession taken at Boisselenc, mentions none but the Duke of Lell, to whom, he says, he discovered the business, as soon as ever he had received Grandvaux's letter of the 20th of April, and had the Duke's leave to write an answer, that he might draw more letters from G. and sul. But whatever

Affairs in Hungary.
Burnet.

But though the Emperor did, as it were, abandon the Empire to the French, he made no great progress in Hungary. The Turks lay upon the defensive, and the season was spent in motion, without either battle or siege. There was still some discourse, but no great probability of peace. Two English Ambassadors dying, the one, Sir William Russell, soon after his arrival at Constantinople, and the other, Mr Harbord, on his way thither, the Lord Paget, his Majesty's Ambassador at the Emperor's Court, was ordered to go thither to mediate a peace. He found the mediation was in a great measure spoiled by the Dutch Ambassador before his arrival; for he had been prevailed on by the Court of Vienna to offer the mediation of the Dutch upon a very high scheme. Comeniek, and the Ukrain, and Podolia, with Moldavia and Wallachia, were demanded for Poland; Transylvania, with the person of Count Tekeli, for the Emperor: And Acbaia and Livadia, as an Antemurale to cover the Morcia, for the Venetians. The Court of Vienna, by offering such a project, reckoned the war must go on, which they desired. The Ministers of the Porte, who were gained by the French to carry on the war, were glad to see so high a project. They were afraid of tumults; so they spread this project over the whole Empire, to shew, on what ignominious terms the mediation was proposed; and by that they justified their going on with the war. But the Lord Paget offered the King's mediation upon another project; which was, that every Prince was to keep what he was then possessed of; and Comeniek was only demanded to be razed. If this had been offered at first, the Ottoman Court durst not have refused it; the people were become so weary under a long and unprosperous war. But the Vizir suppressed this, and made it still pass among them, that the English pressed the same project, that the Dutch had proposed; which was the more easily believed there, because, how ignorant soever they were at that Court, they knew well what an interest the King of England had in the States. So the war was still carried on there; and Sir William Trumbull, who came over to England at this time, told the King, that if, instead of sending Embassies, he would send a powerful fleet into the Mediterranean, to destroy the French trade, and stop the commerce with Turkey, he would quickly bring that court to other measures, or raise such tumults among them, as would set that Empire, and even Constantinople itself, all in a flame.

' he wants of honesty, he has cunning enough to know what will be of most use to his purpose. I believe he would have secured his life either way; and it would have been yet less in hazard by a more open and frank confession. I suppose it will be thought fit he should undergo a trial, for the justification of his Majesty's proceedings throughout this whole business.'

From the camp at Grammon, Aug. 31, 1692.

' As to the business of Du Mont, I think that is now over, upon his sending a petition to his Majesty, in which he owns his guilt, and implores his Majesty's mercy as to life, upon the account of his being one of the first discoverers, submitting himself to be disposed of as his Majesty shall think fit, in any place of safety, and begging, that care may be taken of his subsisting there. Which petition being referred to the Council of war, that sat upon Grandval, for their opinion, they have recommended him as an object of mercy, on account of his discovery, and coming hither to testify what he knew of this business; advising withal his being kept safely in some secure place with a maintenance, that others may be encouraged by this example rather to rely on the King's clemency, than persist in their damnable designs. So you see by this proceeding, regard has been had to any promises, that might have been made him in Germany upon his first discovering the business; which yet I think he might then, and since, have made more fully than he did.'

The letter, which Grandval writ the morning before his execution, was as follows:

Du camp de Halle ce 13, Aout 1692.

Mademoiselle,

' Je vous prie d'aller trouver Monsieur L'archevêque de Rhems, avec Monsieur Jourdaul, & faire connoître au dit Seigneur Archevêque qu'il m'en coûte la vie pour avoir eue aux ordres de Monsieur de Barbesieux, c'est la grace, que vous demande,

A Mademoiselle Juré, Rife Trevelle, vis a vis de la Rue des deux Escus, pres de l'Hotel de Soissons, a Paris.

From the camp at Hall, Aug. 13, 1692.

Madam,

' I pray you to go to the Archbishop of Rheims, with Monsieur Jourdaul, and to let the said Archbishop know, that it costs me my life for having obeyed the orders of Monsieur de Barbesieux: Which is the favour desired of you, by,

Your Servant,

DE GRANDVAL.

' Speak to Monsieur d'Arisy, that he take care I be prayed for.

' To Madam Juré in Treville-Street, over-against the Street of the Two Crowns, near the Hotel of Soissons at Paris.'

Upon occasion of this letter, it will not be improper to take notice of a passage, that happened some days before Grandval's condemnation. A person discoursing with him in prison, and observing he endeavoured to justify himself upon the orders, which he had received from the Marquis of Barbesieux, he told him, that, though this was in itself a very weak excuse for being engaged in a base action, yet still it might prove so much the worse, as that it was like enough that Monsieur Barbesieux would disown his having given any such orders, or that he was any way concerned with him in a business of this nature. To which Grandval replied, ' Let him deny what he pleases; yet, if I were put upon it, I would make it appear very plainly; for I have an original paper under Monsieur Barbesieux's own hand, which I have lodged with a friend of mine, who will not part with it to any one but myself, and nobody else knows with whom I have intrusted it.' State Tr. II. 284.

Soon after the discovery of this shocking attempt, there was published a piece, intitled, Reflections upon the late horrid conspiracy contrived by some of the French Court

1692. accommodation, endeavoured through his means to divide the Duke of Savoy from the confederacy, and dispatched Monsieur Chanlais to Turin, to make advantageous proposals to him, but whether in the form, that was afterwards made public, is a mystery. However there was a writing printed at Paris, wherein the author mentioned all the offers made the Duke; though that paper seemed chiefly designed to render the Italian Princes jealous of the Germans, by magnifying the disorders committed by them in their quarters, and insinuating, that Protestants reaped all the advantage of the present war; which argument was not long after effectually improved by the Partisans of France in the Court of Savoy. But the German troops now in Italy were too numerous to give any of those petty Princes an opportunity to disturb them, supposing they had an intention to do it; and as for the Duke of Savoy, whatever his true sentiments were, he appeared firm, and resolute to carry on this campaign with great vigour. On the other hand, the French, who bent the power of their arms against Flanders and Germany, left Monsieur Catinat very much inferior to the allies in Piedmont, as desiring only to defend what they had gained the years before on that side. But this they could not do; for, the Duke of Savoy having got his army into the field, and disposed of several parties into the vallies and other places for the better security of the country, he marched in the month of July at the head of twenty-thousand men into the Province of Dauphiné; where, after they had pillaged La Roche, Chantelouwe, and some other villages, they made themselves masters of the castle and Highlands of Guillestre, and some other passes. In August all the army crossed the Durance at Guillestre, and moved towards the city of Ambrun, which was surrendered upon articles, after a siege of about nine days. Here the Duke of Savoy found twenty pieces of cannon, and a considerable quantity of provisions; and the city presently granted him forty thousand livres contribution, which they borrowed at Grenoble for that purpose: Besides which, he seized upon sixty thousand livres in gold, which was the French King's money, in the hands of the Pay-master of the troops. And not only the city of Ambrun, but all the neighbouring towns and villages were at the same time put under contribution. Here likewise Duke Schomberg, who commanded the English forces to the assistance of Savoy, published a declaration in the name of King William, inviting people to join him, and assuring them, that his Majesty 'had no other aim in causing his forces to enter into France, than to restore the nobility and gentry to their antient splendor, the Parliaments to their former authority, and the people to their just privileges; and even to grant his protection to the Clergy;

Court to murder his Majesty in Flanders, and for which Monsieur Grandval, one of the assassins, was executed: The author of which observes, that, besides the French King himself, some of the greatest persons in France were privy to the design, viz. Monsieur Louvois, and his son Barbezieux, Ministers of State; the Duke of Luxembourg, Marshal and Peer of France, and General of the French army; Monsieur Rabenac and Monsieur Bedal, Embassadors; Monsieur Paparel and Monsieur Chanlais, employed in some of the greatest posts of the army; Madam Maintenon, the French King's mistress. He remarks likewise, 'that the carriage of the French court in this affair towards the late King James is a master-piece of craft and treachery. Here it is, adds he, that it were almost to be wished, that there were a curtain drawn over that part of the stage, where this unfortunate Prince comes to act so unnatural and so frightful a part. That any one, that ever filled the English throne, should be capable of so unprincipally a revenge as murder, is a very mortifying reflection, and leads us naturally to look back to some shrewdly suspected events that have fallen out in England of late years, which for some reasons are not now to be insisted on. As, in most of the transactions of this Prince's reign, he was imposed upon by the French King's designs, and gave himself up to the measures given him from France, which proved his ruin; so now, when under their protection, they bring him in to cover and own a transaction so base and horrid, that the French King had not the face to appear in it himself. They so ordered the matter, that Grandval, Parker, and Leefdale should wait upon King James, and receive his approbation of the thing, with promises of encouragement; and this is not done till the whole design had been fully concerted beforehand. It was fit the murder of the King should pass in the world as a personal revenge of King James, and that the French Court should lay it upon the quarrel between those two Princes; tho' at the same time they had the chief hand in the contrivance of it, were to reward the instruments employed in it, and were to reap the greatest advantages by it. Whether that unfortunate Prince was sensible of this trick put upon him, or whether his eager desire to see the King taken off, gave him no leisure for reflections, it is hard to determine. This is clear, that he thought himself no ways obliged to use the precautions, that even Barbezieux had done, since that after his speaking to Grandval, according to the words in the printed account, he was pleased to entertain Parker, Leefdale, and him, all together, on the same subject; for in the French copy it is said, Qu' alors il a aussi parlé avec le dit Parker & Leefdale de cette affaire: At the same time he (meaning King James, and not the prisoner Grandval, as in the English translation) spoke likewise to Parker and Leefdale about that affair. The treachery of the French Court towards King James in this business is deep and black.

All the world lays his ruin at the French King's door; and it is to the measures he gave him, that he owes the loss of three crowns. The least amends could be made him for all this, was an honourable retreat in France; yet that this is granted him only on the account of their own interest, appears in a great many instances, and particularly in the part they bring him in to act in this conspiracy. If there had been true friendship and kindness meant him, they would never have put him upon a necessity of making himself known in so foul a design to three persons all at once, but would have at least allowed him the precautions, that Barbezieux, if not the very same, that one of his own rank, thought himself obliged to observe. But this is not all; in bringing King James to own this business, the French Court did him the last offices of an enemy. Instead of promoting his re-accession to the throne, they did more at one dash to shut it for ever against him, than all that his enemies could have thought of. With what horror must the English nation have been struck, to see a Prince, that had recovered them from the brink of destruction, and exposed his person so often for their sake; to see him, I say, murdered by the bloody hand of a Russian! And with what execrations and cries for vengeance against both actors and contrivers of such a villany! Could the French ever imagine, that the way

1692. 'gy; and in short to cause the Edict of Nantz to be revived, of which the Kings of England had been made guarantees.'

Encouraged by this declaration, several of the French Protestants, who had been forced to abjure their religion, took this opportunity to make their voluntary recantation before Monsieur Dubourdeau, Duke Schoenberg's chaplain. From Ambrun the Army marched directly to Gap, a city upon the frontiers of Provence, whose inhabitants opened their gates to Prince Eugene of Savoy upon his first appearing before it, and readily consented to pay contribution, to preserve their houses from being pillaged and burnt; a treatment, which near eighty castles and villages received from the Germans, in retaliation of the barbarities committed by the French in the Palatinate. Not only Grenoble, the capital of Dauphiné, but the neighbouring Provinces, and the rich city of Lyons began already to tremble. And indeed never had the allies a fairer opportunity of shaking the power of France (1). But the Duke of Savoy's falling sick of the small-pox, and, what was of more fatal consequence, the spirit of division, which broke out among the generals, not only hindered the design, that had been formed of taking Briançon and Quieras, but likewise incapacitated them to keep what they had already conquered. Thus having plundered the country, destroyed all the provisions they could not consume or carry away, and burnt all that refused to contribute, they blew up the fortifications of Ambrun, took money to save the houses, and so put an end to the campaign. As for the Duke of Savoy, he was scarce recovered of the small-pox, when he fell into an ague, which reduced him so low, that his physicians began to despair of his life; but at length his youthful constitution got the better of his distemper.

Besides

' way for King James to regain the hearts of the three kingdoms, which he had lost by his endeavouring the subversion of their laws and liberties, ' was to hire three parricides to murder the only person, that had secured these to them? ' The author afterwards informs us, that the Jacobites in England were at that time in great expectation of a revolution in their favour. ' At the same time, says he, that Grandval and Leffdale take their journey from Paris to Flanders, Parker comes over to England. ' We have all the reason to remember the great hopes our malecontents expressed here at that time, and how sure they seemed to be of some new revolution. It is true, these people are easily buoyed up on the least appearances; and every small accident, that seems to favour their cause, raises their hopes beyond all bounds. But about that time so much joy and assurance was visible in their very countenances, as seemed to proceed from a fixed certainty they had of some mighty success, which they hoped for in their affairs, that we could not possibly dive into. It is true, the French King was in Flanders, and King James was waiting the first opportunity of wind and tide to waft over his army into England. But even all this could scarce make up more than a probability, much less a certainty of success. His Majesty was already on the other side, and his army was drawing together from all quarters to oppose the French. Our fleet was at sea, and a far braver one it was than the French could possibly send out against us. Whence then could all this confidence proceed? There must certainly be some other thing in it, than we were then aware of. Parker's coming over at this time, and his corresponding with his friends here, carries with it a shrewd suspicion of what we may reasonably judge was the ground of all this insolence of the party. It were folly to imagine he should make public among them the design then in agitation to murder the King: It was too great a secret to be communicated to many. But on the other hand, it is scarce to be thought, but that Parker assured his friends in general, that there was some great and certain event ready then to break forth, that would decide the controversy; and he might even venture to open the secret to some of the first form amongst them.' The author also mentions two remarkable passages never before made public, which shew King William's generosity to the French King, and his abhorrence of all assassinating designs. About ten years ago, says he, that is, about the year 1682, he received a letter from an unknown hand, who yet gave himself a name, in which he offered to deliver Europe from all her fears, by destroying the French King. He desired only a safe refuge in Holland, and a small subsistence, much less than he should leave behind him in France. He desired an answer might be writ to him, and left with the post-

master's wife at Paris; and about a week after he writ a second letter to the same purpose. The first letter came to the then Prince of Orange at night at Lee, and Monsieur Dyckvelt happened to be with him; so he shewed him the letter, and desired him to go to the Hague immediately, and deliver that letter to Monsieur D'Avaux, who was then the French Ambassador to the States. Monsieur Dyckvelt made such haste, that he was with Monsieur D'Avaux next morning, and gave him the letter (and the second was likewise sent to him). He received it with great acknowledgments of the Prince's generosity, and sent the letter to Paris. The Post-master's wife, being examined, said, that one had come several times to call for a letter, but, he not coming again, she was ordered to go about Paris, and see if he could know him again. One was taken up who she believed was the person, and was put in the Bastille. He happened to be a Protestant, which no doubt made the Court of France to like the discovery the better. But when some of the Parliament came to examine him, and to confront him with the woman, she, when she viewed him nearly, and heard him speak, owned she was mistaken, and that he was not the man; so after a little while he was dismissed, and came into Holland upon the general persecution of the Protestants. By these circumstances it appears, that the Court of France believed that this was a real design, and no contrivance thrown out to try the Prince of Orange's temper. But another instance shewed, that King William looked on propositions of this kind with so much horror, that he thought that, which on all other occasions was the most sacred with him, his word, did not bind in this. A few days after he came to the crown, an unknown person wrote to Dr Burnet, that he had a proposition of great consequence to make to the King, if he should have his promise, that he might do it safely. This the King allowed the Doctor to do: So he wrote to the person by the name and method, that he had given. When he came to the Doctor, he told how long he had lived and served in Versailles, and how he knew all the methods of that Court; and at last he came to offer to kill the French King. At this the Doctor started up immediately, and said, he thought the King was too well known for any to dare to come to him with such a proposition. He hoped he himself had been also so well known, that none should have made it by him. He was sorry, that a promise was given of safety, but he bid the rogue be gone immediately. When he gave an account of this the next day, the King thought he had carried the matter of the promise too far; since the promise was to be understood to relate not to such crimes; and therefore he wished, that the Doctor had seized on him, and ordered him to be sure to do it, if ever he could get eye on him a gain.

(1) Bishop Burnet tells us, that ' if the Duke of Savoy had carried on the attempt on Dauphiné with the spirit, with which he began it, ' affairs

1692. Besides the annoying France in her most sensible part, his Britannic Majesty improved the Duke of Savoy's alliance towards the restoration of the Vaudois, a people, who justly boasted a purity of faith derived from the primitive ages of the Church, and untainted by later superstitions. But they having lost all Ecclesiastical discipline through the violence of their late persecution, and being unable to maintain even a Minister or School-master, Monsieur Dubourdieu acquainted Dr William Lloyd Bishop of St Asaph, who about this time was removed to the See of Lichfield and Coventry, with their miserable condition, who representing the case to the Queen, a fund was established out of her Majesty's privy-purse for the maintaining of ten Preachers and as many School-masters in the valleys of Piedmont.

Affairs of Catalonia. In Catalonia things continued in their former state, the French having attempted nothing on that side, by reason their forces were sufficiently diverted another way, and the Spaniards having done as little, from their usual inactivity and weakness.

Hanover made an Electorate. This year the Protestant interest in Germany was strengthened by the creation of a ninth Electorate in favour of the Duke of Hanover. That Duke, who had been long under the influence of France, had now broken off all commerce with that Court, and entered into a treaty, both with the Emperor and King William. He promised great supplies against France and the Turk, if he might be made an Elector of the Empire; in which the King concurred to press the matter so earnestly at the Court of Vienna, that the Emperor agreed to it, in case he could gain the consent of the other Electors; which the Emperor's Ministers resolved secretly to oppose as much as possible. The Duke quickly gained the consent of the greater number of Electors; yet new objections were still made. It was said, that, if this was granted, another Electorate in a Popish family ought also to be created, to balance the advantage, which this would give to the Lutherans; and it was moved, that Austria should be made an Electorate. But this was so much opposed, since it would give the Emperor two votes in the Electoral College; that it was let fall. In conclusion, after a year's negotiation, and a great opposition both by Papists and Protestant Princes (some of the latter considering more their jealousies of the House of Hanover, than the interest of their religion) the investiture was given on the 19th of December 1692, with the title of Elector of Brunswick, and Great Marshal of the Empire. The French opposed this with all the artifices they could employ; and the matter lay long in an unsettled state; nor was he now admitted into the College, it being said, that the unanimous consent of all the Electors must be had.

The greatest prejudice the French suffered this year was from the season; they had a very bad harvest, and no vintage in the northern parts. England had likewise great apprehensions from a very cold and wet summer, deluges of rain continuing till the very time of harvest. But, when the nation was threatened with a famine, the season changed in so extraordinary a manner, as to produce a very plentiful harvest, sufficient both to serve ourselves, and to supply our neighbours abroad, which brought great sums of money into the Kingdom.

In the beginning of September, there was an A great earthquake felt in most places in England, particularly in London; and in many parts of France, Germany, and the Netherlands. The King was then in his camp at dinner, in an old decayed house, which shaking very much, and every one apprehending it was ready to fall, he was prevailed with to rise from table, and go out of the house; but the surprise was soon over, and he returned to dinner. About two months before, most terrible earthquakes happened in Sicily and Malta, which were represented as the most dreadful, of any mentioned in history. It was estimated, that about one hundred thousand persons perished by them in Sicily. About the same time, an earthquake also shook the Island of Jamaica, and almost totally ruined the town of Port-Royal: So that, besides the damages, no less than fifteen-hundred persons perished in it. These were very extraordinary things, which made those that studied apocalyptic * affairs of France on that side into great disorder. But he was either ill served or betrayed in it. He sat down before Ambun, and besieged it in form; so that a place which he might have carried in three days, cost him some weeks. And in every step he made it appear, there was either a great feebleness, or much treachery in his counsels. He made no great progress; yet the disorder, it threw that and the neighbouring provinces into, was very great. He was stopped by the small-pox, which saved his honour as much as it endangered his person. The retreat of his army, when his life was in danger, looked like a due caution. He recovered of the small-pox, but a ferment remained still in his blood, and broke out so often into feverish relapses, that it was generally thought he was poisoned. Many months passed before he was out of danger. So the campaign ended there with considerable losses to the French, but with no great advantage to the Duke. II. 100. Monsieur Bernard assigns the following reasons, why the Duke did not make a further progress in Dauphiné: 1. Because the Spanish fleet, which had been promised to come and alarm the coasts of Provence, did not appear there. 2. Because the Spanish troops in the Duke's army, would not obey him, nor penetrate so far as he would have had them, either from a fear of being engaged too far, or a desire of having a greater share of the booty, than they had received. This misunderstanding occasioned a great deal of time to be lost, and gave the enemy an opportunity of strengthening themselves, and stopping the progress of the confederate arms. 3. The sickness of the Duke himself. 4. and lastly, The extraordinary vigilance of Monsieur Catinat, and the good disposition, which he had every where made. This General having learned, that the Duke had some design upon Briançon and Gap, took such measures with the considerable body of troops under his command, that it was thought impossible to penetrate as far as these two places through a great many defiles, in which the French were strongly intrenched, and which could not be forced without the loss of part of the army. The Duke therefore and his Generals being informed of these difficulties, and finding the winter advancing, and the country so ruined, that it was impossible to support the troops there during that season, and considering, that they had no place to secure themselves in, if they should be attacked by the enemy, when the mountains should be shut up by the snow; they thought proper to retire, after they had plundered the country. Lett. Hist. II. 405.

1692. tical matters, imagine the end of the world drew near. But however, these dismal accidents had but little influence on people to reform their manners. The great examples, set the nation by the King and Queen, were not much followed. The King had published a proclamation, declaring his resolution, to discountenance all manner of vice and immorality, in all persons from the highest, to the lowest degree; and the Queen, in the King's absence, gave orders to execute the laws against drunkenness, swearing, and debauchery; and sent directions over England, to all Magistrates to do their duty in executing them: To which, the King joined his authority, upon his return to England. Yet the reformation of manners, which some zealous men studied to promote, went on but slowly. Many of the inferior magistrates were not only remiss, but very faulty themselves, and even discouraged those, who endeavoured to have vice suppressed and punished. It must be confessed, that the behaviour of many Clergymen gave great offence. They had taken the oaths, and read the prayers for the present establishment: They observed the orders for public Fasts and Thankgivings, and yet they shewed, in many places, their aversion to the Government but too visibly. In some places it broke out in very indecent instances, that were brought into Courts of law and censured. This made many conclude, that the Clergy were a sort of men, that would swear and pray even against their consciences, rather than lose their benefices, and consequently were governed by interest, and not by principle. The Jacobites grew still to be more outrageous, while the Clergy seemed to be neutrals in the dispute. And what was, yet, most extraordinary, the Government itself acted with such remissness, and so few were inquired after or punished, that those, who were employed by the King, behaved themselves in many places, as if they had secret instructions to be heavy upon his best friends, and to be gentle to his enemies. Upon the whole matter, the nation was falling under a general corruption, which was much spread among all sorts of people.

Proclamations against highwaymen and libellers.

Young's plot against several persons discovered. B. of Rochester.

On the 13th of September the Queen issued out two proclamations; the one for the better discovery of seditious libellers (1), and the other for the discovery and apprehending of highwaymen, and for a reward of forty pounds for every such offender, to the discoverers; which encouragement occasioned the taking of many of these robbers, who about this time very much infested the roads of this Kingdom.

In May this year was detected a sham plot invented by one Robert Young, who was committed to Newgate till he discharged a fine imposed upon him. One Henry Pearson, a prisoner in the same place for debt, perceiving Young to be very expert in counterfeiting hands, told him, that, if he could contrive a plot, and father it upon the Earls of Marlborough and Salisbury, Dr Thomas Sprat Bishop of Rochester, and some others, he might soon have money enough to pay his fine. Young gladly accepted the proposal; but told Pearson, that nothing could be done in that matter, till he was released, which in a short time was effected. As soon as Pearson was at liberty, he employed one Stephen Blackhead to carry letters between himself and Young. By a certain stratagem Young happened to procure the Earl of Marlborough's hand, which he counterfeited so exactly, that it was very difficult to distinguish the true from the false. Afterward he drew up an Association, and affixed to it the hands of the Earls of Marlborough and Salisbury, as also Sir Basil Firebrace's, the Bishop of Rochester's, and the Lord Cornbury's, which two last were writ by another hand. And, that the more credit might be given to this pretended plot, Young forged several letters in the Earl of Marlborough's name, supposed to be directed to himself, which Blackhead used to bring to him again. Blackhead went three times to the Bishop of Rochester's house at Bromley in Kent, upon a fictitious errand from a supposed Doctor of Divinity, but with no other intent than to convey the forged association into a secret place, where it was afterwards found by the King's messengers, who, upon information given by Young against that Prelate, came first to secure his person, and then to search his house. His Lordship was some days under confinement; but, upon a strict examination of the whole matter before the Council, and the confronting of Blackhead with Young, the forgery was evidently discovered, and his Lordship's innocence made manifest.

The Earl of Marlborough was likewise committed to the Tower upon the accusation of this Young on the 5th of May, where he continued till the 15th of the next month, being the last day of the term, when he was admitted to bail at the King's Bench bar, the Duke of Shrewsbury, the Marquis of Halifax, the Earl of Carbury, and Mr Boyle being bail for him. On the 24th of October following, being the first day of Michaelmas Term, his Lordship appeared again in that court, and insisted to be discharged, alledging, that he had been committed upon the charge of Young, against whom an information of perjury and forgery had been since found by the Grand-Jury, and declaring, that he would otherwise make his complaint in the House of Lords. But his bail was still continued by order of that Court.

Scotland enjoying now a perfect tranquillity, Affairs the Parliament of that Kingdom was very zealous and forward to contribute new levies for the support of their Majesties government. And as for Ireland, the Lord Sidney, Lord Lieutenant of that Kingdom, so managed affairs, that the Parliament there, which began on the 5th of October, made an act, not only of recognition of their Majesties undoubted title to that crown, and another for encouragement of Protestant strangers to settle in that Kingdom, but also one for granting to their Majesties the sum of seventy-thousand pounds,

(1) Now it was that the Glencoe business was industriously noised about town and country, and represented as bad as the massacres at Paris and in Ireland, and as the King's act and deed; but, how justly, will hereafter be seen. Lefley published a pretended relation of the fact, in a letter which was greedily swallowed by the Jacobites, and other enemies of the Revolution.

1692. pounds, by an additional duty of excise upon beer, ale, and other liquors. After which, on the 3d of November, they were prorogued (1).

The King departed from the camp at Gravement on Friday, September the 7th, having left the command in chief of the army with the Elector of Bavaria; and the next day arrived at Breda, and went thence to his House at Loo, to divert himself a few days with hunting. He then came back to Brussels, and held a council of war, wherein he gave orders for the march of the forces into winter-quarters, and went thence to the Hague, where having settled his affairs, he embarked on the 15th of October on board the Mary yacht, attended by Sir Cloudeſley Shovel, with several men of war, and on the 18th landed safe at Tarmouth. The next night he lay at Sir John Duke's at Saxmundham, and, on Thursday the 20th, was met by the Queen at Newhall, and about eight the same evening their Majesties came to Kensington, having passed through the city of London amidst the acclamations of the people, and continued illuminations of the houses, and other demonstrations of joy for his safe return. Two days after the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Recorder of London attended his Majesty at Kensington, with a congratulatory address. The King received them very graciously, conferred the honour of Knighthood upon Salathiel Lovel, Esq; Serjeant at Law, their Recorder; and accepted their invitation to dine at Guildhall on the Lord-Mayor's day, Sir John Fleet being then Mayor. The entertainment was very magnificent; and the King was pleased to confer the honour of Knighthood upon John Wildman, William Gore, James Houb- lon, Aldermen; Leonard Robinson, Chamberlain; 1692. Rowland Aynsworth, William Scawen, Johab Child, and John Touch, citizens. And the same honour was conferred some days before on Thomas Trevor, Esq; their Majesties Solicitor General.

On the 10th of October, it had been ordered by the Queen in Council, that the monthly fasts, appointed by proclamation of the 24th of March 1691, should be discontinued till further order; and a public thanksgiving was ordered for the preservation of their Majesties and their Government against the designs and attempts of their open and secret enemies, particularly for the late signal victory at sea against the French fleet; and for the disappointment of the barbarous and horrid conspiracy for taking away his Majesty's life by assassination.

About this time several French refugees, studious to promote the interest of England, and to weaken France by impairing her manufactures, in conjunction with some English Merchants, termed the Royal Lustring Company; and being supported by the protection of the Earl of Pembroke, whom they chose their Governor, obtained the King's patent whereby they were reputed a body politic, having the full and sole privilege for the making of lustrings and alambodes in England. On the 26th of October, this patent was read in full committee at their house in Austin Fryers; at which time the company was farther assured by their Governor of their Majesties satisfaction in this undertaking to such a degree, that all other encouragements might be expected for the promoting of it.

On Friday the 4th of November, the Parliament

(1) The proceedings of that Parliament will appear from the following extracts of original letters from Mr Richard James, one of the Under-Secretaries of State, to Sir William Dutton Colt, Envoy-Extraordinary at Hanover.

Whitehall, Octob. 7, 1692.

'This week arrived an express from Ireland with several bills, that have been prepared by the Council there to be presented to the Parliament, which sat down on the 5th instant. They were put into the hands of Mr Attorney-General to consider of them, who made this afternoon his report to the Queen and Council here, where the said bills were read; and such amendments being made, as were thought fit, they are ordered to be engrossed and passed under the Great Seal of England, in order to be dispatched back to Ireland. These bills are eleven in number; the chief of them are for granting the aid to their Majesties; for settling the militia; and for an indemnity.'

Whitehall, Octob. 11, 1692.

'The Council has met several times to consider of the bills transmitted hither from Ireland, and have, with some amendments, approved of these, that follow: An act for granting certain duties to their Majesties: An act for an additional excise upon beer, ale, and other liquors: An act for settling the militia. An act for punishing deserters and mutineers in the army: An act to encourage Protestant strangers to come and settle in Ireland: An act to prevent vexatious suits; and an act about taking affidavits in the country. The act of indemnity, which was sent over with the rest, is still under debate; and the Papists, who are concerned therein, since it cuts off all remainders to the forfeited estates, have petitioned the Queen, that they may be heard, before the bill be sent back; and their petition is referred to Mr Attorney-General.'

Whitehall, Octob. 21, 1692.
'The letters from Dublin of the 12th tell us, that the Parliament had yet done little besides appointing the committees. That of grievances had fallen upon Mr Cullisford, lately one of the Commissioners of the revenue there, who, it was believed, would not come off there as he did the last winter in England. They had likewise questioned one Croft, a Gentleman of the county of Cork, for several things done by him in the late King James's time, and had confined him, and expelled him the House, of which he was a member. They have likewise ordered their votes to be printed.'

Whitehall, Octob. 28, 1692.

'The King came hither yesterday, being the day appointed for a public thanksgiving; and in the afternoon was present at the General Council, where two Irish bills more were read and approved, viz. one to prevent frauds and perjuries; and another to settle intestates estates. There were two other bills under consideration, to wit, that for a general indemnity; and that for easing Protestant Dissenters; but they are both laid aside for the present. By the first a great many persons are attained, and the remainders are cut off from all forfeited estates; and by the latter a greater liberty is given the Dissenters than what they now enjoy here.'

Whitehall, Novemb. 4, 1692.

'Yesterday came in several mails from Ireland; the last are of the 20th and 24th of last month. They bring little news, telling us only, that the two Houses of Parliament had passed an act for recognition of their Majesties undoubted title to the crown of Ireland, and had under consideration several other bills, as also the state of the revenue, and some grievances, which they complained of; but

The fourth sitting of the second Parliament.

1692. ment met at Westminster, which the King opened with the following speech to both houses.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

I AM very glad to meet you again in Parliament, where I have an opportunity of thanking you for the great supplies you have given me for the prosecution of this war. And I hope by your advice and assistance, which have never failed me, to take such measures, as may be most proper for supporting our common interest against the excessive power of France.

We have great reason to rejoice in the happy victory, which by the blessing of God we obtained at sea. And I wish I could tell you, that the success at land had been answerable to it. I am sure my own subjects had so remarkable a part in both, that their bravery and courage must ever be remembered to their honour.

The French are repairing their losses at sea with great diligence, and do design to augment their land forces considerably against the next campaign; which makes it absolutely necessary for our safety, that at least as great a force be maintained at sea and land, as we had the last year. And therefore I must ask of you, Gentlemen of the House of Commons, a supply suitable to so great an occasion.

I am very sensible how heavy this charge is upon my people; and it extremely afflicts me, that it is not possible to be avoided, without exposing ourselves to inevitable ruin and destruction. The inconvenience of sending out of the Kingdom great sums of money, for the payment of the troops abroad, is indeed very considerable; and I so much wish it could be remedied, that, if you can suggest to me any methods for the support of them, which may lessen this inconvenience, I shall be ready to receive them with all the satisfaction imaginable.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

None can desire more than I do, that a descent should be made into France; and therefore, notwithstanding the disappointment of that design last summer, I intend to attempt it the next year with a much more considerable force; and, so soon as I shall be enabled, all possible care and application shall be used towards it.

And upon this occasion I cannot omit taking notice of that signal deliverance, which by the good providence of God we received the last spring, to the disappointment and confusion of our enemies designs and expectations.

This has sufficiently shewn us how much we are exposed to the attempts of France, while that King is in a condition to make them. Let us therefore improve the advantage we have at this time of being joined with most of the Princes and States of Europe but the letters do not say what they were. They had expelled Mr Farrel the House for having adhered to and favoured the Irish during the late rebellion, as they had done before to Mr Crofts of the county of Cork. And my Lord Lieutenant had sent a message to them, letting them know, that they should sit but a fortnight longer, and be then prorogued till the spring.

Whitehall, Novemb. 8. 1692.

By the letters from Dublin of the 27th and 30th past, we have an account, that the two Houses of Parliament there had passed an act for granting to their Majesties an additional excise upon beer, ale, and other liquors, which may raise about twenty-five thousand pounds. But at the same time the Commons declared, That it was their undoubted right to prepare and resolve the ways and means of raising money; and that their receiving the said bill of excise, which was transmitted to them under the Great Seal of England, should not be drawn into precedent for the future. And withal they rejected another bill sent out of England, for granting certain duties to their Majesties for one year, and ordered it to be entered in their journals, that the reason why the said bill is rejected, is, that the same had not its rise in their House. And after this they themselves took into consideration, how they should raise the rest of the supply of seventy-thousand pounds, which they had voted to be given for one year towards paying the army. They had likewise rejected two other bills transmitted out of England; one intitled, An act to confirm the acts of settlement, and explanation and resolution of the doubts of the Lord Lieutenant and Council upon the said acts; and the other, An act for reversing the act of attainders, and all other acts made in the late pretended Parliament of Ireland. They had appointed a Committee to inquire what laws were going to expire in Ireland, and were fit to be continued; and what laws, that have been made in England, were fit to be made of force in that Kingdom; and the said Committee had reported several laws accordingly; among which one was the Habeas Corpus act. They had also represented several grievances to the Lord Lieutenant, to wit, the employing of Papists in the army; the suffering them to go armed; and misapplying of the forfeitures, &c. Lastly, they had given his Excellency thanks for his care to suppress the Rapparees and Tories, whose numbers began to increase in the north of Connaught, and in the county of Cork. And the House of Lords had resolved to write letters to the Houses of the Parliament in England, to thank them and this whole Kingdom for their kindness and assistance to the English, when they lately fled into this Kingdom from the Popish persecution in Ireland. The same letters add, that it was believed the Parliament would end their sessions the last week, and be prorogued till the spring.

Whitehall, Novemb. 11. 1692.

This day came in an express from Ireland, with an account that his Excellency the Lord Lieutenant had on the 3d instant prorogued the Parliament to the 6th of April next, after having given the Royal assent to the Act of recognition of their Majesties undoubted title to the crown of England; an act for granting an additional excise to their Majesties; an act for encouraging Protestant strangers to settle in Ireland; and an act for taking affidavits in the country. The Commons had rejected several other acts besides those mentioned in my last, to wit, that, for settling the militia; another for punishing mutineers and deserters, &c. Which, together with some other of their votes, gave his Excellency such dislike of their proceedings, that he took notice of it in his speech at their rising, and caused a protestation to be entered against them in the Lords House, for asserting the King's prerogative; and his Excellency had likewise removed Mr Serjeant Osborne and Mr Serjeant Broderick, two leading men in the House, from being of the King's Council.

1692. 'rope against so dangerous an enemy. In this surely all men will agree, who have any love for their country, or any zeal for our religion. I cannot therefore doubt but you will continue to support me in this war against the declared enemy of this nation; and that you will give as speedy dispatch to the affairs before you, as the nature and importance of them will admit; that our preparations may be timely and effectual for the preservation of all that is dear and valuable to us.

'I am sure I can have no interest but what is yours. We have the same religion to defend; and you cannot be more concerned for the preservation of your liberties and properties than I am, that you should always remain in the full possession and enjoyment of them; for I have no aim but to make you a happy people.

'Hitherto I have never spared to expose my own person for the good and welfare of this nation; and I am sensible of your good affections to me, that I shall continue to do so with great cheerfulness upon all occasions, wherein I may contribute to the honour and advantage of England.'

and he acquainting them, that it could not be done, that debate fell. The day following, their Lordships called before them Mr Aaron Smith, who was the Solicitor for law-affairs; and he was asked upon oath what witnesses there were in the first place against the Earl of Huntington; to which he answered, that he knew of but one. It was then debated, whether one witness was sufficient to keep a Peer under bail, after he had entered his prayer at the King's-Bench to be tried, as the Habeas Corpus act directs; but they came then to no resolution upon it.

The House of Commons met on the 11th according to their adjournment, when a motion was made by Sir Thomas Clarges for an address to his Majesty, that the foreign alliances might be laid before that House; which was carried; and the design of it was evidently to enter into the consideration of the part, which the several confederate Princes bore in the war; and whether it was proportionable to that of England.

The next day the Peers resumed the debate concerning the Lords who had been committed; and the Committee, which had been appointed for that purpose, reported an order, declaring, That no Peer should be continued upon bail, unless there were two witnesses against him. Upon this some debate arose, but concluded without any determination; and then their Lordships entered upon the consideration of the legality of the commitments, but adjourned without coming to any conclusion.

The same day there was brought into the House of Commons a bill for regulating trials in cases of high-treason; and they voted thanks to Admiral Russell, and the commanders and seamen of the fleet, for the late victory at sea; and ordered, that the Lords of the Admiralty lay before the House copies of the orders by them sent to the Admiral; who was likewise ordered to bring copies of those, which he had received; the House resolving to inquire how it came to pass, that the victory was not pursued.

The next day, November 12, the House of Lords received a report from their Committee, of an order, declaring, that no Peer shall be remanded to prison by the King's-Bench upon his appearing before them by virtue of the Habeas Corpus act, after having entered his prayer to be tried as the said act directs, or kept under bail, unless there be against him two witnesses upon oath. Hereupon the Judges were consulted and they were of opinion, that it was not necessary in this case to have two witnesses upon oath against the prisoner, but that there ought to be two witnesses in a capacity to be sworn, since it might happen, that one of them was absent, and had not yet had an opportunity to be sworn. The Committee therefore altered their order agreeably to this opinion of the Judges; and then it was moved on the 14th of November, and debated several hours, whether that order should be entered as a standing rule in the journals of the House, and at last it was resolved in the affirmative by thirty-five voices against twenty-eight. The day following their Lordships entered again upon the matter of the Lords Proceedings of the House of Commons.

MS. Lett.

Complaints of the Lords that had been committed.

This speech was received with the universal approbation which it deserved. The Commons after reading the King's speech, by reason of the thinness of the House adjourned to the 11th of November*, in order to give their Members time to come up; the Lords likewise adjourned to November the 7th, when a complaint was made by the Earls of Huntington, Scarishead, and Marlborough, that they had been lately committed to the Tower by warrants, wherein it was not said, that any information was given against them upon oath, which they alleged to be required by the law. They complained likewise, that the beginning of this Michaelmas Term they were continued upon bail, by the Court of King's-Bench, though the Parliament was then going to meet; which they looked upon as a breach of the privilege of the Peerage of England; wherein they were seconded by some other Lords. These two points were debated some time, and the opinion of the Judges was asked upon the last; and the Lord Chief Justice Holt justified the proceeding of the King's-Bench. At last it was resolved, that a Committee should be appointed to inquire into precedents about this matter, and to make their report on the Wednesday following; till which time the House adjourned; and the Committee met on Tuesday accordingly.

The House of Peers meeting on Wednesday, November 9th, resumed the affair of the commitment of the Lords to the Tower, and their being continued under bail by the King's-Bench. The debate ran chiefly upon the second head; and it was moved, that the recognizances of the said Lords, which were taken in the King's-Bench, should be removed to the House of Peers, as being the supreme Court. But the Lord Chief Justice Holt's opinion being asked, written by Mr Warre, under Secretary of State, to Sir W. D. Colt, Envoy Extraordinary at Hanover.

1692. Lords continued under bail, and considered in what manner to discharge them from their recognizances; and after some debate it was intimated as an expedient, that his Majesty would give order for their discharge the next day; which put an end to the debate, and they accordingly adjourned to Thursday, November 17, when they were informed, that these Lords had been discharged the day before by the King's particular command. Upon this a debate arose, what entry should be made thereof in their journals for asserting the rights and privileges of the Peers, wherein they came to no determination, but adjourned the debate to the next day, when they ordered it to be entered upon their journal, that being informed, that his Majesty had given directions for the discharge of the Lords under bail in the King's Bench, the debate about that matter ceased. This debate went off in a bill, that indemnified the Ministry for those commitments, but limited them, for the future, by several rules; all which rules were rejected by the Commons. They thought those limitations gave a legal power to commit, in cases where they were observed; whereas they thought the safer way was to indemnify the Ministry, when it was visible they did not commit any but upon real danger, and not to fet them any rules: Since, as to the committing of suspected persons, where the danger is real and visible, the public safety must be looked to, and supersede all particular laws.

The Commons, on the 12th of November, entered upon an inquiry, 1. Why the late victory at sea had not been pursued? 2. Why the descent had not been made? 3. Why care had not been taken to cover the trade, by having convoys and cruisers in proper stations? In answer to the first, Admiral Ruffel alledged, That nothing had been omitted on his part; and that he gave orders in writing to Sir John Ashby, presently after the fight, to pursue the French ships, that fled through the Race of Alderney (1). Secondly, as to the descent, he said, That it was so late in the year, when the land-forces joined the fleet, that it was the opinion of all the seamen, that the great ships could not stand over to St Malo's, or the other places proposed, without an extreme hazard. So that the inquiry remaining was, why the land-forces embarked no sooner; of which the Commissioners of transports, victuallers, and officers of the ordnance, were required to give an account as far as related to their several parts. Lastly, the Commissioners of the Admiralty were directed to give an account about the convoys.

On the 14th, the Commons made an address to the King, in which they acknowledged 'The great affection his Majesty shewed to his subjects, by taking notice of their bravery and courage, by that sensible concern he expressed for the charges on his people, and by that tender regard for the preservation of their religion, liberties, and properties, which must ever be remembered with gratitude by all his faithful subjects. They likewise acknowledged the favour of God, in restoring his Majesty in safety to his people, after so many hazards and dangers, to which he had exposed his sacred person; that there might be nothing wanting on his part to oppose the ambitious designs of his enemies, and to maintain the honour of England, and the liberties of Europe. They also congratulated his deliverance from the secret and open designs, which the malice of his enemies had formed against him; and assured him, that they would always advise and assist him in the supporting of his government against his enemies.' They presented at the same time their thankful acknowledgments to the Queen, for her gracious and prudent administration of the government, whilst his Majesty was hazarding his Royal person abroad; and for the blessings of peace, which they enjoyed at home under her auspicious reign, at a time when the greatest part of Europe was suffering the miserable effects of war. They also congratulated, not only the signal deliverance, which they received from a bold and cruel design, formed and prosecuted for their destruction, when it was just ready to be executed, but likewise the return of her Majesty's fleet with so compleat and glorious a victory, as was not to be equalled in any former age; assuring her Majesty, that the grateful sense they had of their happiness under her government, should be always manifested in constant returns of duty and obedience, and a firm resolution to do all that was in their power to render her reign secure and prosperous.'

On the 14th Sir Edward Seymour delivered to the Commons a message from the King in answer to their address the last session, about the East-India Company, with several papers relating to that Company; namely, a copy of the new regulations drawn up by his Majesty's order, and which the Company had refused to submit to; and the opinion of the Judges thereupon, which the King informed the House was the reason of his having done nothing in the affair, since the Judges had declared, that the Company must have three years notice, and that no company could be set up in that time; for which reason he left the Commons to proceed in that matter as they should think proper.

The next day the Commissioners of accounts laid before the Commons their report about the receipts and issues of the public monies; the consideration of which being deferred to the Thursday following, the business of the day was called for, which was to consider of the King's speech; but it was answered, that, since his Majesty desired their advice as well as assistance, they could not offer the former till they had inquired into the alliances, public accounts, &c. and thereupon it was ordered, that the consideration of his Majesty's speech should be adjourned till the Tuesday following.

On

(1) Accordingly Sir John Ashby being examined, Nov. 19, particularly in relation to the French men of war that escaped into St Malo's, he gave an account of the proceedings of the ships under his command in and after the engagement; with which the House was so well pleased, that the Speaker, by direction of the House, acquainted him, 'That the House took notice of his ingenious behaviour at the bar, and that he had given an account to the satisfaction of the House, and was dismissed from farther attendance.' Pr. H. C. II. 410.

The Commons address.

A message to the Commons about the East-India Company.

1692. On Wednesday, November 16th, the Commons had a debate of two hours, by whom the alliances laid before them should be translated; some proposing, that it should be done by Public Notaries; others, that they should be returned to the Secretary for that purpose; and others, that they should be referred to a Committee, in order to be rendered into English, and these last prevailed. The next day was spent by that House in the business relating to the East-India Company; and, the day following, they read a second time the bill for regulating trials in cases of high-treason; upon which a long debate arose, whether it should be rejected or committed, many of the members looking upon it as very unreasonable at that time, when the enemies of the Government were so active in plotting against it, since by this bill the conviction of such offenders would be made much more difficult than it was before; but in conclusion, it was carried upon the question by one hundred and seventy against one hundred and fifty, that the said bill should be committed to the Committee of the whole House.

On Wednesday November the 23d, the Commons had a long debate about the foreign Generals, on which subject several warm speeches were made, and the Count de Solms was particularly named as the chief occasion of the ill success at Steenkirk by not sending succours, when called for, to support the English, and as a person, who had not treated the English well. It was at first pressed, that no foreign General should be allowed of upon the English establishment; but that motion would not pass, though it was at last resolved with little opposition, that his Majesty should be humbly advised to fill the vacancies, that shall happen for the future, of General officers in our army with such only as are natives of their Majesties dominions; and that the General of the English foot be a native of their Majesties dominions. By which vote they proposed to hinder the coming in of any other foreign Generals than were already employed in the service, and to remove Count Solms. And it was even moved, that the House should desire the King to confer that command upon Lieutenant-General Talmash, who, it was said, was a better and more experienced officer; but this motion was not seconded, and so it fell.

On the 24th of November, the Commons resumed the affair of the East-India Company; and resolved, that there should be a new subscription of a joint stock not exceeding two millions, and not less than 1,500,000 l. to continue for twenty-one years. And the day following the State of the war for the ensuing year was laid before that House. The land force was the same as it was the last year, but the naval somewhat greater. The whole expence amounted to four millions, two hundred thousand pounds; to which was added, deficiency of the last poll-act, amounting to 750,000 l. The estimates were read, and the farther consideration of the supply adjourned to the Tuesday following.

The Lords, on November the 23d, attended their Majesties with their addresses of thanks and congratulation; and on the 28th they resolved, that his Majesty be humbly advised to employ one, who was born their Majesties subject, to be General of the English forces; and the day following they considered the miscarriages of the intended descent into France, and after some debate resolved, to make an address to his Majesty, that all orders, letters, &c. relating to the same, be laid before them.

On Saturday, November 26th, the Committee about the transports made their report to the House of Commons; and after several warm speeches, it was resolved, that in regard many of the great affairs of the Government have been for the time past unsuccessfully managed by those who had the direction thereof, the House should humbly advise his Majesty to prevent the like mischiefs for the future, by employing men of known ability and integrity; this question being carried without a single negative. Some members then represented the prejudices, which they conceived to arise to the public by having all affairs of state passed only through the Cabinet-council; thinking it better to have them considered of in the Privy-Council; upon which there was some debate, but the motion fell.

On the 28th the Commons were employed upon the bill for regulating trials in cases of high-treason, wherein they made several amendments, the principal of which was, that this act should not take place, nor be of any force, till after the expiration of the present war with France; which upon the question was carried by one hundred and seventy five, against one hundred and forty; this amendment being thought to answer the main objection against the bill, of its being unreasonable.

The day following they took into consideration the estimates about the fleet. The first debate was, whether they should allow of the thirty-three thousand seamen demanded by the Admiralty; which some would have reduced to thirty-thousand; but it was carried for the whole number; after which they agreed likewise to all the other particulars of the estimate, except that about the two marine regiments, which they did not allow of.

On the 30th of November, the Commons went again into a grand Committee to give advice to his Majesty. Several speeches were made against the ill management of affairs, and the inactivity and want of vigour, that appeared in those, who had the administration of them; which they imputed to the principles of some of them, who at first opposed the settlement of the government, and therefore could not be thought to be so zealous for the support of it as was necessary in the present state of things. And Mr Arnold went so far as to name the Earl of Nottingham, though he was not seconded. After a long debate the following vote passed without any opposition, that his Majesty be humbly advised, for the necessary support of the Government, to employ in his councils and management of his affairs, such persons only whose principles oblige them to stand by him and his right, against the late King James and all other Pretenders whatsoever.

The day following the House agreed with the Committee about the estimates of the fleet for the ensuing year; and then resolved upon an address to his Majesty, that a list of the ships designed for the next year's service might be laid before them. After this the report was made about the bill for regulating trials in cases of high-treason, to which the House agreed, and particularly

1692. larly to the amendment, that this act should not take place till after the expiration of the present war, which was debated for some time, and at last carried by one hundred and sixty-five against one hundred and forty. Some clauses were then offered to be added to the bill, one of which occasioned a long debate. It was to enact, that it should be high-treason for any person to declare by word or writing, that their present Majesties were not lawful and rightful King and Queen of this realm. This was very much opposed, as a thing irregular to bring in thus a clause for making a new law, and as dangerous to the subject to make words treason. At last it was agreed to lay aside the clause, and that a bill be brought in for the better preservation of their Majesties persons and government. But no further mention was made of the other bill for regulating trials, &c. during this session.

The House of Lords, on the 2d of December, resumed the consideration of the bill of indemnity, and added to it a clause empowering the Council, in case of an invasion, to secure all suspected persons, who refuse to take the oaths, and to give security for their peaceable behaviour. And on the 6th of that month the Earl of Nottingham gave in their Lordships an account of all orders and proceedings about the descent.

On the 3d of December, the Commons proceeded upon the estimates about the land-forces; when the Lord Ranelagh acquainted them, that, of the fifty-four thousand demanded by his Majesty, he designed, that twenty-thousand should be left in England, and the rest employed abroad. Upon this, the first debate was, whether they should agree to have twenty-thousand men kept in England; and it was pressed to begin with this question; but the managers for the Court opposed it, and would not suffer this separate question, insisting to have the whole fifty-four thousand men put into the question together; which occasioned a long debate, but at last it was agreed, that the separate question about the twenty-thousand men to be kept in England should be put first; which being done, it passed without a negative. Then the second question was debated about the thirty-four thousand men to be employed abroad; which was warmly opposed by several, who were against sending any 1692. forces to Flanders, where no advantage was to be expected by the experience of the last campaign; at least they were for lessening the number, since the Kingdom could not bear so great an expence. This debate kept the House sitting till nine at night, when the question being put, it was carried for the thirty-four thousand men with so great a majority, that the opposite side did not think fit to divide for it. On the 5th they went again into a grand Committee to give advice; and after a long debate, and divers angry speeches, they passed the two following votes: 1. That the Committee was of opinion, that there had been an apparent miscarriage in the management of the affairs relating to the descent the last summer. 2. That one cause of the said miscarriage, was the want of giving timely and necessary orders by such persons, to whom the management of this matter was committed. The first passed without any opposition; but the last, which was plainly levelled at the Earl of Nottingham, was carried only by one voice, a hundred and sixty-five against a hundred and sixty-four. The day following they proceeded upon the estimates about the land-forces, and agreed to the allowances demanded for the general officers. But, when they came to the three pounds a day set down for Mr Blaisewait, they would not allow of it, but reduced it to twenty shillings, which, upon the question, was carried by about nineteen voices.

The Lords, on the 7th of December, had the Earl of Nottingham's relation concerning the descent read to them, and it was ordered, that the original letters from Admiral Russel, and other persons therein mentioned, should be laid before the House. After which a motion was made, that they should proceed jointly with the Commons in giving their advice to his Majesty, and to that end it should be proposed, that a Committee might be appointed by either House, to meet together, and consider of heads for the same. But, after a long debate, it was resolved in the negative by a majority of forty-eight against thirty-six; of the former number were all the Lords of the Cabinet Council, except the Lord Steward; all the Bishops present, except Dr Watson Bishop of St David's (1).

The

(1) Leave having been asked and given, that some Lords might protest, if the question was carried in the negative, the Lords, whose names are underwritten, entered their protestation in the reasons following:

1. Because his Majesty, having particularly and expressly desired the advice of his Parliament at this time, when he so much seems to need it, no other method was, or, in our opinions, could be proposed, by which the two Houses might so well and so speedily be brought to that concurrence, which is necessary to render their advice effectual.

2. Because it appears by some papers already imported to this House, that several members of the House of Commons are concerned in the matters before us, as having been so lately employed in his Majesty's service; and we conceive it the easiest, properest, and fairest way of communication between the two Houses, to have so great and important a business, transacted and prepared in a Committee so chosen.

3. Because it cannot be expected, that so many members of the House of Commons, from whom we shall need information, can in any other manner be here present so often, though with the leave of the House, as will be necessary for a sufficient inquiry into the several affairs now under consideration.

4. Because, if the House of Commons intend also to give advice to his Majesty, it is very probable, that both Houses of Parliament may receive such information severally, as will be thought fit to be communicated as soon as possible; and we conceive no way of doing that can be so proper or speedy as in a Committee of both Houses.

5. Because, in a time of such imminent danger to the nation, by reason of so many miscarriages, as are supposed generally to be committed, the closest and strictest union of both Houses is absolutely necessary to redeem us from all that ruin, which we have too much cause to fear is coming upon us.

1692. The same day, the Commons proceeded upon the business of the East-India Company, and agreed to the rest of the regulations, viz. that no man shall have above 10,000 l. stock, nor under 100 l. every 500 l. to have a vote; and no person to have more: The Governors to have 5000 l. stock: The Deputy Governor 10,000 l. The Company to export every year of the English manufactures to the value of 100,000 l. and to furnish the Government with 500 tun of salt-petre yearly at a certain rate. Upon these heads the Committee resolved to move the House, that a bill might be brought in to settle the said trade.

On the 8th of December, the Lords went into a grand Committee upon giving advice; and, having before them the establishment of the ordinance, they found upon it two Dutch officers, Colonel Gower, Colonel of the English train abroad, and Mr Meefters, Keeper of the stores at home; and thereupon, after some debate, it was resolved humbly to advise his Majesty to remove them both from the said employments. Meefters having another post, that of Comptroller of the train abroad, there was not much opposition made to the removing him from this; but the question about Colonel Gower was carried against him by forty-one voices against thirty-eight. After this there arose some debate, whether the Earl of Nottingham's relation should be referred to a Committee of the whole House, or to a select Committee; and it was resolved, as his Lordship himself desired, that it should be considered of in a Committee of the whole House.

The Commons were likewise the same day upon giving advice; and Sir Richard Temple 1692. having moved, that, in pursuance of the King's speech, they would consider how to pay the forces abroad, by sending over English manufactures, and so preventing the exportation of so much money yearly; and, this motion being seconded, it was resolved, that a Committee should be appointed to consider thereof. The Houses being then desirous of rising, Sir Francis Winnington the Chairman was called upon to leave the chair; which, after having put the usual question, he did accordingly, and the Speaker resumed the House. But, as they had omitted in the Committee to direct their Chairman to report what they had done to the House, and to desire leave to sit again, no report could be made, and so the vote, which they had passed in the Committee, fell to the ground. But the Committee was revived by the House, and appointed to sit again on the Monday following.

On the 9th of December, the Commons proceeded upon the estimates about the land forces. They had already agreed to the fifty-four thousand men, to the charge of the general officers, the train, and the transports; and now they agreed to give 200,000 l. more for hospitals and other extraordinary charges, being desirous to throw these together, because in the article about the subsidies to the Dukes of Savoy and Hanover, and the other, about the three Saxon regiments, it was said, that the King paid two thirds, and the Dutch one, which proportion the House was unwilling to allow of, but put the several sums together under one general head, though with an abatement of 35000 l. which they thought

Mr John Hampden published about this time a remarkable piece, intitled, Some short considerations concerning the state of the nation. He begins it with remarking, that 'perhaps there was not any time, in which it was more necessary to join heads and hearts for the service of our native country, that so a safe and effectual method might be agreed upon, to bring the nation through the great and many difficulties it laboured under; and to attain the end, which was proposed in the late Revolution, and in that war, in which it was engaged for the defence of all that was dear to us, against those, who were sworn enemies of our religion and country.' He then considers, that the remedying of all the evils, under which the nation laboured, was only to be expected from the Parliament; and that, if the Parliament should separate what the King had so wisely joined together in his speech, and should either give assistance without advice, or advice without assistance, our affairs would be ruined, and the nation undone.

Mr Hampden next makes some reflections upon the state of the nation, and considers it as in a state of war, and against whom, and for what ends, it was engaged in that war. The person, against whom the war was directed, he tells us, was the French King, who might be said to be in some sort the enemy of mankind, 'the design of whose whole life had been to establish in Europe what they call an Universal Monarchy, which might more properly be called the enslaving of all Europe, and whose hatred to all, that bore the name of Protestant, was inveterate and invincible.' The ends of the war were both just and necessary in the highest degree; self-defence, the maintenance of our ancient free government, the asserting our rights and liberties; and, above all, the preservation of the Protestant religion against popery and idolatry. Mr Hampden then considers, in what state and condition we were for the carrying on this great war, 'which had already lasted almost four years, and was likely 'to last much longer, and at length to end unhappily, 'if effectual measures were not taken by the Parliament to manage it in such a way, and for such ends, as were consistent with our ability, present condition, and true interest.' He proceeds to shew, that the nation was not only in a state of war, but also in a state of decay and consuming, and that in many respects, as, 1. With respect to it's shipping; it being incredible, what numbers of ships had been lost since the beginning of the war. 2. With regard to it's seamen; the occasion of which decay was this, that we had indeed acts of navigation, and one would think our own interest should have inclined us sufficiently to employ our own men in matters of trade; yet there was so great opportunity given to employ foreigners by want of convoys, and the breeding of seamen being interrupted by the loss of so many of our ships, and the giving up the Bank-fishing, and Newfoundland fishing, in a manner intirely to the French, that our trade insensibly slipped from us, our merchants were disappointed and undone, and our seamen discouraged and diminished; in whom notwithstanding consists the true strength and safeguard of this island. 3. In the decay of our trade: 'Not to mention again, says he, the prodigious number of trading ships taken by our enemies, and the discouragement of our seamen by employing foreigners, it is well known, that all nations now drive on a free trade with France, and we alone are excepted from that benefit; while, on the other hand, we bear three parts in four of the charges of this war. The Suedes, Danes, Portuguese, Venetians, and others, take off the French goods as openly as ever; and the two former supply them with ships and naval stores. The Spaniards in the Netherlands maintain as open and regular a trade with them as in the time of full peace, without so much as a disguise, or the least pretence of a disguise, though we know they cannot subsist one moment without us; and therefore

1692. thought the estimates might very well bear. A motion was then made in behalf of the Duke of Wirttemberg and the Majors-General Tetteau and La Forest, who commanded the Danish troops, that their particular pay might be according to the English establishment, and not according to the Dutch, which they were then upon; and this was agreed to in consideration of their good services. And thus the House agreed to the whole state of the war for the ensuing year; their next business being to consider of ways to raise the funds for the same.

In the House of Lords the same day, the Earl of Nottingham's relation, with the original papers therein mentioned, were read; and, because there seemed to be some reflection made therein upon Admiral Ruffel, who was a Member of the House of Commons, their Lordships appointed a Committee to consider how they might come to speak with the Admiral, and to know what he had to say in answer thereto.

Their Lordships likewise on the 10th refused the consideration of the Earl of Nottingham's relation, and after some debate resolved to appoint a Committee to draw up an abstract of what the Earl had farther by word of mouth told the House, that more nearly affected Admiral Ruffel, as if he had been wanting in several things, which were incumbent upon him. The Committee thereupon met, and a question arose, whether their account should be drawn up as coming from the House, or from the Earl of Nottingham; and the first was resolved on; and, to prevent all mistakes and further delays, the Earl was desired to draw up himself the substance of what he had said to the House.

Among other advices, which the Lords resolved about this time to give to his Majesty, one was, that, when the English forces were joined with the Dutch, his Majesty would be pleased to give the precedence to the former; and that an English Officer might command all Dutch Officers of the same rank, though his commission be of a later date. This was grounded upon a treaty, which the Earl of Marlborough told the House was made at the beginning of the war, and of which he produced a copy, it being answered upon the application they made to the King for the treaty, that it could not be found.

The Commons on the 10th of December voted a supply for the navy of two millions and ninety thousand pounds, as they had before granted 1,925,000 l. for the fleet; which together amounted to above four millions without reckoning 750,000 l. for the deficiency of the last year's poll-tax, and 600,000 l. for the civil list. The same day they agreed to the report about the East-India trade; and after that read for the first time the bill for the better preservation of the Government, in which there was appointed a new oath to be taken by all persons in offices.

The day following, December 12th, the House designed to have proceeded upon the advice to the King; but Mr Ruffel informing them, that he heard some papers relating to the last summer's expedition would be sent them from the Lords, and desiring, that the farther consideration of this matter might therefore be deferred for some days, it was accordingly adjourned till the Friday following.

On the 13th the Commons ordered a bill to be brought in, that no person should for the future

‘ we may put a stop to such abuses and destructive practices whenever we please. Those, who know the condition of Denmark, know likewise, that we might easily have hindered the supplies, that have gone from thence to France; but, though that were often advised and pressed, yet nothing could be ever procured to be done. The Dutch, who pretend to be so closely united with us in interest at this time, have private factors every where carrying on a trade with France in the name of other nations; while we alone lose the benefit of that trade, which the rest of the allies divide among them. 4. In the loss and diminution of our treasure, of which the King takes notice in his speech.’ And this proceeded not only from hiring foreigners for convoys, and foreign importers, who carry away the money that should be divided among our English seamen and traders, as was observed above, but principally from those vast sums, which were sent in specie to pay our land-army, little of which ever returned into England again; and that which did, was so clipped and lessened, that it would not pass. 5. In the loss of our men. I shall not, says Mr Hampden, say how many lives have been spilt for the reduction of Ireland, and how many of them might easily have been spared, if things had been rightly managed at first; nor how many of our bravest men perished in the action at Steinkirk, for want of being sustained as they might and ought to have been.’ He then shews, that the nation was likewise in a state of unsettledness in all respects, which must needs be very dreadful in the midst of a war. For, 1. It was intirely unsettled as to the government, the King's title, and the legality of it, being as publicly disputed, and with as little fear of punishment, as any point of natural philosophy in the schools at Oxford, or any moot case of law by the students of the Temple; while others, who pretended to submit to the government, openly renounced and impugned the principles and grounds, upon which it was set up by the nation; and would not suffer any mention to be made of the original contract broken by King James, nor of that new contract made by King William with this nation, in virtue whereof he was King of England; but wrote books and published them, one while to prove, that he was King by conquest, another while to prove, that he was King by an immediate providence of God, and direction from him; both which were equally destructive to the nature of our government, and to all the ends proposed to be compassed in the Revolution. Besides, several bills and declarations had been offered several times in Parliament for abjuring King James's authority, and declaring King William and Queen Mary lawful and rightful King and Queen of this realm; but nothing of this kind had been yet brought to perfection. Nor was the nation in an unsettled condition, only in reference to the King's title, but likewise to the ancient government itself, and the time of holding Parliaments; for the government could not in any sort be thought to be settled, till the manner and time of calling Parliaments, and their sitting when called, were fully determined, explained, and agreed to. 2. The nation was unsettled as to the quiet enjoyment of our own houses, from the quartering of soldiers in them. 3. From the seizing the subjects property for transport ships, without settling any fund to pay them. 4. From the want of proper regulations with regard to trials for treason. 5. From the want of settling a militia. 6. From the decay of trade by the loss of ships for want of convoys. Mr Hampden then affirms, That, in the conduct of the war, and the management of affairs at home, in reference to it, there was evidently, a vein of treachery run through it from one end to the other. ‘ How else, says he, is it possible every thing should

‘ misgive

1692. ture be elected a Member of Parliament, who had any other employment or office of profit; and that no Member of the present House should, during his being such, accept of any office or employment. After this they proceeded to the supply, and resolved, that there should be raised four shillings in the pound upon lands and offices.

The House of Lords on the 15th had a warm debate about the foreign forces then in England, upon a motion, that his Majesty should be humbly advised to send them all away; and at last it was resolved to advise him not to bring any more foreign troops into the Kingdom; but that those already here, which were four Dutch and three French regiments might continue.

On Wednesday the 14th, the Commons had likewise a long debate about the bill for preserving the Government. The main objection against it was, that it made words treason, which would make people unsafe even among their own servants and in their own families; and that the oath to be taken by all persons in offices was, that, during their lives, they should stand by their Majesties against King James and all other Pretenders; which, it was said, laid an obligation upon people beyond what was in their power to be answerable for. To this it was replied, that any thing, that was thought amiss, might be amended in the Committee, but that the scope and substance of the bill was certainly very necessary at that time. But the bill was at last thrown out by two hundred against one hundred and seventy-five, the Court-party being divided upon it (1). The next day they took into consideration a new project for borrowing a million, and resolved to make it part of the supply. The project was, that ten thousand persons should lend 100*l.* each: That a fund of 70,000*l.* should be settled out of the hereditary excise to pay the interest at seven per Cent. which was to be divided among the lenders and the survivors of them, during their lives, provided that no man should at any time have above 10,000*l.* per annum.

The next day, December the 16th, they went into a grand Committee for giving advice to his Majesty, and it was moved, that he should be advised to remove Colonel Gower and Mr Meesters, two Dutch officers, out of the Ordinance; which occasioned a debate of above two hours. At last it was said by several Generals, that this was a trivial matter, not worth the spending their time about; and that, if they had nothing of more weight to lay before the King, they might go to their dinners. Which motion was so well liked, that the Committee adjourned, and the Speaker took the chair without appointing any time for their next sitting.

On the 17th the bill for ascertaining the fees of officers of justice was rejected by the Commons, being the same, which had passed the two Houses the preceding session, but was then rejected by the King.

Two days after the papers given in to the House of Lords by the Earl of Nottingham, concerning the last summer's expedition, being communicated to the Commons at a conference, they were read in that House, when Admiral Ruffel, who thought himself reflected on in them, made answer thereto in his place so much to the satisfaction of the house, that they passed

a vote

' misgive and miscarry, as we see it has done? How could all our preparations this year for a descent upon France have been foretold and retarded as they were, and our men embarked, only to cost half a million, and make us ridiculous to the whole world, unless the hand of Jeab had been in it?—Who can believe, that our victory at sea this year should not have been farther pursued, if all people employed had been well-intentionated?—How came we to labour under such want of intelligence, even in things, in which it may so easily be had, and that for so little money?—When orders are to be given out for any design, there are so many delays, upon one pretence or other, that the time of execution is always over before the orders are received. And besides, they are so defective, and in their nature so impracticable (as we have lately seen in the business of the descent) that it were better none at all should be given. Are there designs on foot to join with our enemies, and rise in favour of them, as there was this summer, when the French were coming? Yet nobody is found out or prosecuted, that was concerned in it. Every body knew, that horses and arms were bought, and some were taken. Every county saw, that their discontented men flocked up to London. Nobody thought the French would either provide to come hither, or seek to fight us at sea, but upon some ground of treachery; and yet there could be nobody discovered, that had any correspondence with them. These things are indications sufficiently plain to any wise man, where the bottom of all this mischief lies. But none are so blind as those, who will not see.'

Mr Hampden concludes with these words: 'All these things put together make a considerable part of the melancholy and miserable state of the nation at this present time. If it be asked, what shall be done to remove all these evils? I say, the first step ' towards a cure is well to understand our disease; and, if the Parliament can be thoroughly sensible of these things, and make the King likewise sensible of them, the very nature of the disease will of itself lead to the proper remedies. Therefore I am humbly of opinion, that the Parliament should begin by a most humble, dutiful, and respectful address to his Majesty, representing to him the true state of the nation in its present circumstances, returning thanks in the most humble and affectionate manner imaginable for that gracious expression of demanding the advice of the Parliament, and assuring him, that neither their advice nor assistance shall be wanting for maintaining and defending his Person and Government against the attempts of all his enemies; as on their side, after what he has had at the opening of this session of Parliament, they cannot doubt but his Majesty will heartily concur with them in what they shall advise for his honour, safety, and greatness, and the good of the nation. After this the Parliament will proceed to offer to his Majesty such bills, as may be most proper to remedy the grievances of which we complain; and at the same time, that they give money for carrying on the war, will advise such measures, as may best enable his Majesty to bring down the excessive power of France, and at the same time to secure the happiness and liberties of the English nation. If debates are free and clear within doors, so as to encourage those without to hope, that there is really a probability of something to be done for the good of the nation, there will be farther proposals made of such things as are thought most proper and necessary to be done at this time.'

(1) Bishop Burnet observes, that the King himself was more set on this abjuration of King James, than he had been formerly. II. 103.

1692. a vote, 'that he had behaved himself during the last expedition with fidelity, courage, and conduct,' and ordered, that this vote should be communicated to the Lords at a conference the next day. Besides this there were some warm speeches made in the House; and it was even moved by Mr Comptroller Wharton, that an address should be made to the King to remove the Earl of Nottingham; but that motion fell to the ground.

The vote of the House of Commons in favour of Admiral Ruffel was communicated to the Lords at a Conference on the 21st of December, and at the same time the narrative and other papers concerning the last summer's expedition were returned to them; which being reported to the House of Lords, some of their Lordships observed, that this proceeding of the Commons seemed to be somewhat irregular and unparliamentary in returning the papers so hastily, without taking any time to consider of them, and it was moved to desire a free conference with them upon it. But it was at last resolved to look into precedents, and appoint a Committee for that purpose.

The Commons on the 21st went into a grand Committee to review the book of rates payable upon goods exported and imported; wherein they made some alterations, though they proceeded no farther than the letter C. And the day following they read for the first time a bill for raising four shillings in the pound upon real and personal estates, which, it was supposed, would amount to two millions; and they passed the bill touching free and impartial proceedings in Parliament, which was afterwards sent up to the Lords for their concurrence. The design of it was to prevent men, after they were chosen Members of Parliament, from accepting any places of profit; for, though any person, who was in an office already, might be chosen, yet, if he accepted one whilst he was a sitting Member, he was to lose his seat in Parliament, and to be incapable of being chosen again; but the Speaker for the time being was excepted. After this the business of the East-India Company should have come on, but a printed paper having been dispersed in the lobby of the House, wherein the chief sticklers against the old Company were all named, and recommended as the only fit persons to have the direction of the new Company, since they had carried on this affair with great charge and loss of time; and, there being among them several Parliament-men, one of them made complaint thereof to the House as being designed for a reflection upon them; but the House treated it with contempt, and, being grown cool upon the East-India business, and Mr Smith, who used to be their Chairman, going out of the House to avoid it, the further consideration of the affair was deferred to the 29th of December; which gave great encouragement to the old Company.

On the 23d the Commons were to have received the report from the Committee for giving advice to the King; but it seemed, that the House was grown weary of that matter, for it was adjourned sine die.

On the 28th of December the Commons made some progress in the money-bill; and the day following, in a grand Committee upon the East-India business, went through several regulations, and particularly agreed to that for a new subscription of a stock not exceeding two millions, 1692. and not under 1,500,000 l.

In the House of Lords the Committee appointed to look into precedents, in order to a free conference with the Commons upon their late vote concerning Admiral Ruffel, reported some precedents, which came near to the point in question; upon which their Lordships on the 30th resolved, to demand such a conference the next day. Accordingly the same day messengers came from the Lords to the Commons, for that purpose; but, it being put to the question, whether they should agree to the free conference desired by the Lords, it was carried in the negative by seventy-eight against sixty-one.

The Lords on the 31st of December read the second time the bill sent up from the Commons touching free and impartial proceedings in Parliament. Great endeavours were used to throw it out; but at last it was resolved by a majority of nine voices, that it should be committed to a Committee of the whole House.

The same day the Commons made some farther progress in the money-bill, as they did likewise on the 2d of January; and the day following went through it to the blanks for the Commissioners names, which were to be filled up the next day. They received likewise a message from the Lords, that they had appointed eleven of the clock the next morning for the free conference; and thereupon named managers for the same, who were only to hear what the Lords had to say to them, and to report it to the House.

The Lords were, on the 3d of January, in a grand Committee upon the bill for free and impartial proceedings in Parliament, and went through it, agreeing to all the clauses of it; but, when it came to be reported to the House, after a long debate, the bill was thrown out by two voices, the majority of proxies, which are not allowed of in a Committee, being against the bill.

It is remarked on this bill, that, when the party that was set against the Court saw they could carry nothing in either House, they turned their whole strength against the present Parliament to force a dissolution. They began with giving it the name of an ill found, calling it the Officers Parliament, because many, that had commands in the army, were of it: and the word, that they gave out among the people, was, that we were to be governed by a standing Army, and a standing Parliament. Then they tried to carry this bill, for rendering all members of the House of Commons incapable of places of trust or profit. The truth was, it came to be observed, that some got credit by opposing the Government, and, to silence them, they were preferred: And then they changed their note, and were as ready to flatter, as before to find fault. This gave a specious colour to those, who charged the Court with designs of corrupting Members, or at least of stopping their mouths by places and pensions. Though the bill had passed the Commons with little difficulty (those in places, having not strength to make great opposition, being looked on as parties, and those out of places having not courage to oppose it, as it would have looked like recommending themselves to one) it was however rejected by the Lords, since it seemed to establish 1697. an opposition between the crown and the people, as if those, who were employed by the one, could not be trusted by the other. The Earl of Mulgrave exhausted his eloquence in a celebrated speech on this occasion (1).

The Commons on the 4th of January resumed the East-India business, wherein they made some further progress, and resolved particularly, by a majority of voices in a thin House, that the subscription for a new stock should be begun within ten days after the passing of the act; which vote did at first lower a little the actions of the old company, but they soon rose again to a hundred and thirty, as they were before, upon a belief, that the Parliament would not have time to finish the business that session.

The Lords in their free conference with the Commons on the 4th of January represented to them, that the House of Lords did look upon the late vote and proceeding of the Commons in returning them the papers about the last summer's expedition to be irregular and unparliamentary. For having transmitted those papers to them for their information in a matter, wherein several persons seemed to be concerned, their Lordships expected, that they would not only have duly considered of them, but likewise have given their Lordships communication of what they had before them relating to that matter, and which they grounded their vote upon. This was the substance of what the Earl of Rochester said, and afterwards gave in writing to Colonel

(1) In this debate, Sheffield Earl of Mulgrave made the following remarkable speech:

My Lords,

' This debate is of so great consequence, that I resolved to be silent, and rather to be advised by the ability of others, than to shew my own want of it. Besides, it is of so nice a nature, that I, who speak always unpremeditatedly, apprehend extremely saying any thing, which may be thought the least reflecting; though even that ought not to restrain a man here from doing one's duty to the public in a business, where it seems to be so highly concerned.

' I have always heard, I have always read, that foreign nations, and all this part of the world have admired and envied the constitution of this government. For, not to speak of the King's power, here is an House of Lords to advise him on all important occasions about peace or war; about all things, that may concern the nation, the care of which is very much intrusted to your Lordships. But yet, because your Lordships cannot be so conversant with the generality of the people, nor so constantly in the country, as is necessary for that purpose, here is a House of Commons also chosen by the very people themselves, newly come from among them, or should be so, to represent all their grievances, to express the true mind of the nation, and to dispose of their money, at least so far as to begin all bills of that nature; and, if I am not mistaken, the very writ for elections sent down to the Sheriffs does empower them to chuse; what? Their Representatives?

' Now, my Lords, I beseech you to consider the meaning of that word, Representatives. Is it to do any thing contrary to their mind? It would be absurd to propose it. And yet how can it be otherwise, if they, after being chosen, change their dependency, engage themselves in employments plainly inconsistent with that great trust reposed in them? And that I will take the liberty to demonstrate to your Lordships they now do, at least according to my humble opinion.

' I will instance first in the least and lowest incapacity, they must be under, who so take employments. Your Lordships know but too well, what a general carelessness there appears every day more and more in the public business. If so, how is it likely, that men should be as diligent in their duty in Parliament, as that business requires, where employments and a great deal of other business shall take up both their minds and their time? But then in some cases it is worse, as in commands of the army, and other employments of that kind, when they must have a divided duty. For it does admirably become an officer to sit voting away money in the House of Commons, while his soldiers are perhaps taking it away at their quarters for want of his presence to restrain them, and of better discipline among them. Nay, perhaps his troop or regiment may be in some action abroad; and he must either ' have the shame of being absent from them at such a time, or from that House, where he is intrusted with our liberties.

' To this I have heard but one objection by a noble Lord, that, if this act should pass, the King is not allowed to make a Captain, a Colonel, without disabling him to sit in Parliament. Truly, if a Captain has only deserved to be advanced for exposing himself in Parliament, I think the nation would have no great loss in the King's letting alone such a preferment.

' But, my Lords, there is another sort of incapacity yet worse than this; I mean that of Parliament-men having such places in the Exchequer, as the very profit of them depends on the money given to the King in Parliament. Would any of your Lordships send and intrust a man to make a bargain for you, whose very interest shall be to make you give as much as he can possibly? It puts me in mind of a farce, where an actor holds a dialogue with himself, speaking first in one tone, and then answering himself in another. Really, my Lords, this is no farce, for it is no laughing matter to undo a nation. But it is altogether as unnatural for a Member of Parliament to ask first in the King's name for such a sort of supply, give an account from him how much is needful towards the paying such an army, or such a fleet, and then immediately give, by his ready vote, what he had before asked by his Master's order.

' Besides, my Lords, there is such a necessity now for long sessions of Parliament, and the very privileges belonging to Members are of so great extent, that it would be a little hard and unequal to other Gentlemen, that they should have all the places also. All the objections, that have been made, may be reduced to these:

' First, it is told us, that it is a disrespect to the King, that his servants or officers should be excluded.

' To this, I desire it may be considered, that it is in this case as when a tenant sends up any body to treat for him. Would any of your Lordships think it a disrespect, nay, would the King himself think it any, if the tenant would not wholly refer himself to one of your own servants, or the King's Commissioners in the case of the crown? And if he chuses rather some plain honest friend of his own to supply his absence here, will any man blame such a proceeding, or think it unmannerly?

' Besides, your Lordships know even this act admits them to be chosen, notwithstanding their employments, provided the electors know it first, and are not deceived in their choice.

' All we would prevent is, that a good rich corporation should not chuse to intrust with all their liberties a plain honest country neighbour, and find him within six months changed into a preferred cunning courtier, who shall tie them to their choice, though he is no more the same man, than if he were turned Papist, which by the law, as it stands already, puts an incapacity upon him.

' Another

1692. Colonel Granville; who answered, that they had nothing to say, but were only to report to the House what they had received from their Lordships (1).

On the 12th of January, the Lords resumed the business of giving advice to the King; and it was moved, that his Majesty should be humbly advised to demand both the Hollanders and Spaniards cautionary towns, as Ostend, Newport, Sluice, &c. which occasioned a long debate; but the question being at last put, whether cautionary towns should be desired for our troops then abroad, without naming either Dutch or Spaniards, it was carried in the negative by thirty-six against twenty-four voices.

The Commons, on the 11th, had a long debate about the Commissioners of the Admiralty. A motion had been made, that his Majesty be advised to constitute a Commission of the Admiralty of such persons, as were of known experience in maritime affairs; which upon the question passed in the negative (2), and now an address was voted, that, for the future, all orders for the management of the fleet should pass through the hands of the Lords Commissioners for executing the office of Lord High-admiral. This was thought to point at the Earl of Nottingham. The day following, they 1692. passed the bill for the Land-tax, and sent it up to the Lords.

On the 13th, the Lords read the money-bill for the first time, and the next day resolved to add a clause, to empower the Lords to appoint Commissioners of their own, to assess their personal estates.

The Commons the same day were in a Committee of the whole House upon the bill for raising a million, but made no great progress therein, because Sir John Sommers the Attorney-General, who was obliged to attend the House of Lords on Lord Banbury's case, who, having committed a murder, claimed his Peerage, left the chair, which he did somewhat abruptly, not without giving some disgust to the House; and at the same time the Lords were displeased likewise, because they stayed for him; but the personal esteem, which every person had for him, was the reason, that no notice was taken of it further than the Lords appointed a Committee to inquire how far the Attorney-General is obliged, by his post, to attend their House.

On the 16th, the money-bill was read the last time in the House of Lords, and passed with the additional clause, whereby they taxed them-

‘ Another objection is, that this act may by its consequence prolong this Parliament, which they allow would be a very great grievance; and yet suppose the King capable of putting it upon us, which I have too much respect for him to admit of; though I am glad, however, that it is objected by Privy Counsellors in favour, who consequently, I hope, will never advise a thing, which they now exclaim against as so great a grievance.

‘ But pray, my Lords, what should tempt the King to so ill a policy? Can he fear a freedom of choice in the people, to whose good will he owes all his power, which these Lords suppose he may use to their prejudice? And therefore give me leave to say, as I must not suspect him of so ill a design as the perpetuating this Parliament, so he cannot, he ought not, to suspect a nation, so intirely, I was going to say, so fondly devoted to him.

‘ My Lords, no man is readier than myself to allow, that we owe the Crown all submission as to the time of calling Parliaments according to law, and appointing also where they shall sit. But with reverence be it spoken, the King owes the nation intire freedom in chusing their Representatives; and it is no less his duty, than it is his true interest, that such a fair and just proceeding should be used towards us.

‘ Consider, my Lords, of what mighty consequence it may be, that so many votes should be free, when upon one single one may depend the whole security or loss of this nation. By one single vote such things may happen, that I almost tremble to think. By one single vote a general excise may be granted, and then we are all lost. By one single vote the crown may be impowered to name all the Commissioners for raising the taxes; and then surely we should be in a fair way towards it. Nay, whatever has happened, may again be apprehended; and I hope those Reverend Prelates will reflect, that if they grow once obnoxious to a prevalent party, one single voice may be as dangerous to that Bench, as a general dissatisfaction among the people proved to be once in a late experience; which I am far from saying by way of threatening, but only by way of caution.

‘ My Lords, we may think, because this concerns not the House of Lords, that we need not be so over-careful of the matter. But there are Noblemen in France, at least such as were so before they were invaded; who, that they might domineer

‘ over others, and serve a present turn perhaps, let ‘ all things alone so long till the people were quite ‘ mastered, and the Nobility themselves too, to bear ‘ them company. So that I never met a Frenchman, ‘ even of the greatest rank (and some had ten thousand pistoles a year in employments) that did not ‘ envy us here for our freedom from that slavery, ‘ which they groan under. And this I have observed ‘ universally, except just Monsieur Launoy, Monsieur ‘ Colbert, or such people, because they were the Ministers themselves, who occasioned these complaints, and thrived by the oppression of others.

‘ My Lords, this country of ours is very apt to be provoked. We have had a late experience of it; and though no wise man but would bear a great deal rather than make a bustle, yet really the people are otherwise, and at any time change a present uneasiness for any other condition, though a worse. We have known it so too often, and sometimes repented it too late. Let them not have this new provocation, in being debarred from a security in their Representatives; for malicious people will not fail to infuse into their minds, that all those vast sums, which have been and still must be raised towards this war, are not disposed away in so fair a manner, as ought to be; and I am afraid they will say their money is not given, but taken.

‘ However, whatever success this bill may have, there must needs come some good effect of it. For, if it passes, it will give us security: If it be obstructed, it will give us warning.’ Pr. H. L. I. 413.

(1) The Earl of Nottingham, it seems, had aggravated Ruffel's errors and neglects very severely. But the House of Commons justified Ruffel, and gave him thanks over and over again; and remained so fixed in this, that, though the Lords communicated the papers, the Earl of Nottingham had laid before them, to the Commons, they would not so much as read them, but renewed their first votes that justified Ruffel's fidelity, courage, and conduct. Burnet II. 103.

(2) This motion was occasioned by a constant clamour in the city of London, against the management of the Admiralty with respect to convoys and cruisers. One of the Lords of the Admiralty, being applied to by some Barbadoes merchants for convoy, and pressing him to provide it, he answered, they needed not to have given themselves that trouble; for the Virginia convoy would be ordered to take care of their ships.

1692. themselves; and then they went into a grand Committee upon the bill for the frequent calling and meeting of Parliaments, which had been brought in by the Earl of Shrewsbury. They agreed, that a Parliament should meet every year, and that there should be a new one every three years, and then came to the clause, which declares, that, if the King should not order new writs to be issued out, the Lord Chancellor or Commissioners of the Great Seal should do it by their own authority under severe penalties. But this was postponed, and they proceeded to the next point, which was, when the present Parliament should determine; some proposing one, others two, and others again three years; but this debate was adjourned.

The Commons spent a great deal of time the same day upon the bill for raising the million, and resolved to put the project two ways; that is, that those, who should subscribe their money with the benefit of survivorship were to have but seven per cent. and those, who should stand only upon their own lives, fourteen per cent. The day following they were again upon the same bill; and, having gone through it, ordered it to be reported the next day.

On the 17th the Lords sent back the money-bill with the additional clause to the Commons, who disagreed nemine contradicente to that clause, as an incroachment upon their fundamental rights in the article of giving money, and sent to the Lords to desire a conference thereupon; but, their Lordships making their messengers wait a considerable time, because they were engaged in a debate upon the Lord Banbury's claim of Peerage, the House of Commons, who had nothing to do, and began to be weary with expecting the return of their messengers, sent for them back, and then adjourned.

The day following the Lords in a Committee of the whole House went through the bill for the calling and meeting of frequent Parliaments, and ordered it to be engrossed. It enacted, that there should be a new Parliament every three years, and meet every year; and that the present Parliament should continue no longer than till the first day of January following. They ordered likewise a bill to be engrossed, by which all persons in offices were to take a new oath, that they would be faithful to their Majesties King William and Queen Mary, and assist them against the late King James and all his adherents.

The same day the managers for the Commons went to a conference with the Lords, to whom they represented, that the Commons had disagreed to the clause added by their Lordships to the money-bill, as being a notorious incroachment upon the rights of the House of Commons, to order and settle all matters relating to the giving of money, which their ancestors had been so jealous of, that they thought it a diminution of this their fundamental privilege to give their Lordships any reason for the supporting of it. The Lords having made a report thereof to their House, the consideration of that matter was adjourned till the next day, when their Lordships, after a long debate, resolved to recede from the said clause, which was carried by so great a majority, that the House did not divide upon it. After this the House appointed a Committee to draw up reasons for their quitting this clause, to be communicated to the Commons the next day, to this effect, that their Lordships did for the present depart from this point purely in consideration of the pressing exigency of affairs, being otherwise of opinion, that of right they might have insisted upon it.

The ill humour, it seems, which thus shewed itself in the House of Lords, was chiefly managed by the Marquis of Hallifax and the Earl of Mulgrave. They had drawn in the Earl of Shrewsbury, who was very ill pleased with the credit, that some had with the King, and lived in a particular friendship with the Earl of Marlborough, whom he thought was both ungratefully and unjustly persecuted. Those Lords had all King James's friends, ready to assist them in every thing that could embroil matters. A great many Whigs, who were discontented and jealous of the Ministry, joined with them: But they knew that all their murmurings would signify little, unless they could stop a money-bill. Wherefore, as it was settled in the House of Commons as a maxim, that the Lords could not make any alterations in money-bills, they put their strength to carry a clause in the land-tax-bill, that the Peers should tax themselves. And though, in the way in which the clause was drawn up, it could not be defended, yet they did all that was possible to put a stop to the bill, and with unusual vehemence pressed for a delay, till a Committee should be appointed to examine precedents. This the Earl of Mulgrave pressed for many hours, with great force of argument and eloquence. He insisted much upon the dignity of Peerage; and made this which was now proposed to be so essential a part of that dignity, that he endeavoured to convince the Lords, that, if they yielded to it, they divested themselves of their true greatness, and nothing would remain, but the name and shadow of a Peer, which was but a pageant. But, after all the force of his rhetoric, the Lords considered the safety of the nation, more than the shadow of a privilege, and so dropped their clause.

On the 20th of January, a complaint was made to the Commons of a printed pamphlet, lately published with licence, and said to be written by Charles Blount, Esq; intitled King William and Queen Mary Conquerors, as containing assertions of dangerous consequence to their Majesties, to the liberties of the subject, and to the peace of the Kingdom. The House therefore, upon examination of the matter, ordered, the next day, the said pamphlet to be burnt by the hand of the common hangman, and that his Majesty be desired to remove Mr Edmund Bobun, the Licensor, from his employment, for having allowed the same to be printed. It was at the same time suggested, that Dr Burnet, Bishop of Salisbury, was the inventor of the notion of their Majesties being Conquerors, which he had first of all published in his pastoral letter. This occasioned a debate of several hours, but at last it was carried by one hundred and sixty-two against one hundred and fifty-five, that the said Pastoral Letter should be burnt by the common hangman. There was likewise complaint made by one of the Members, of a book written on the same subject, by Dr William Lloyd, Bishop of St Asaph, intitled A discourse of God's ways of disposing of Kingdoms; but that motion fell.

1692. The Lords likewise took into consideration the book intitled King William and Queen Mary Conquerors, and ordered it to be burnt the next morning in the Old Palace-Yard in Westminster, and afterwards passed this vote: 'That the 'assertion of King William's and Queen Mary's 'being King and Queen by conquest was high- 'ly injurious to their Majesties, and inconsis- 'tent with the principles, on which this Go- 'vernment is founded, and tending to the sub- 'version of the rights of the people;' This vote they resolved to communicate to the Commons at a conference the next morning, and to desire their concurrence thereunto; which was given by the latter with the remarkable addition of some words, viz. injurious to their Majesties rightful title to the crown of this realm. The same day their Lordships passed the bill for raising a million upon lives, and the Commons went through the Book of Rates, and laid several new impositions upon some commodities, that were imported, which they proposed to give for three years, and thereby to raise 500,000 l.

On the 25th, the Lords read the second time the bill for the new oaths to be taken by all persons in offices, and after a long debate it was carried by a majority of two voices, there being thirty-eight against thirty-six that the bill should be committed.

The day following the Commons proceeded upon the report of the Committee about laying new impositions upon several foreign commodities; and among the rest they laid 8 l. a tun upon French wines, the act of prohibition being expired.

The Commons, on the 27th of January, appointed the bill for the frequent calling and meeting of Parliaments to be read the next day, which was accordingly done, and occasioned a long debate, great endeavours being used to throw it out; but it was at last carried, that it should be read a second time on the Thursday following.

On the 31st, the Lords sat in Westminster-Hall upon the trial of the Lord Mobun, for the murder of Mr William Mountfort the player, the Lord President being Lord High-Steward; and after examination of the witnesses, which lasted till five in the afternoon, their Lordships withdrew to their own House, and, after some debate, adjourned the Court till the next morning, and set a fine of 100 l. each upon the Lord Faulconberg, Lord Newport, Lord Lovelace, and Lord Leigh, for going away before the House was adjourned; which they excused the next day on account of their being faint and quite spent with so long an attendance. On Wednesday morning, February the 1st, the Lords met again in their own House, and continued together till seven at night without going down to the Court in Westminster-Hall, spending the whole day in sitting and debating several points of law, without taking any resolution there- 1692. upon, further than that it was resolved, that every Peer might ask the Judges in open Court what question he pleased as to points of law; and then they adjourned till the 3d, the day before being Candlemas day, on which the Courts of Judicature do not use to sit.

On the 2d of February, the Commons read the second time the bill for the frequent calling and meeting of Parliaments, and committed it.

On the 3d, the Lords met in their own House, and debated about the questions to be asked of the Judges; and about four in the afternoon went down into Westminster-Hall, where several questions were asked the Judges in presence of Lord Mobun the prisoner; after which their Lordships returned to their own house, to debate thereupon; and about nine adjourned the Court till the next morning, when fourteen of them found the prisoner guilty, and sixty-nine acquitted him (1).

The Commons, on the 7th of February, went into a grand Committee upon the bill for the frequent calling and meeting of Parliaments, and divided about the Parliament's meeting every year, which was determined in the affirmative by a hundred and seventy-one against a hundred and sixty. After which they went through the bill, and made the following amendment, that whereas it was said, that the present Parliament should determine the 1st of January next, they extended it to the 24th of March, or sooner, as his Majesty should think fit; the design of that amendment being, that the Parliament might hold another winter session, if his Majesty pleased. A clause was offered to be added to the bill to save the King's right of dissolving and proroguing the Parliament; but it was rejected by a majority of seven voices, because it was thought to cast a reflection upon the bill, as if it were derogatory to his Majesty's prerogative; which they would not allow it to be, but only an explanation of the old law.

The next day the Commons were again in a grand Committee upon the ways of raising the rest of the supply. They reckoned they had already given five millions, viz. two millions by the land-tax; one million by the project for raising money upon lives; one million out of the standing revenues; five hundred thousand pounds by continuing the duties upon wine, vinegar, and tobacco, which were to expire in 1696, for two years longer; five hundred thousand pounds by the new duties added to the Book of Rates for four years; and fifty thousand pounds by the tax they laid of five per cent. upon the East-India Company, and other joint stocks; so that there remained but three hundred thousand pounds to be raised; for the state of the expence for this year was computed at five millions and three hundred and sixty-six thousand pounds; namely, one million nine hun- dred

(1) In the beginning of February 1692-3, the Lord Mobun was indicted for the murder of William Mountfort the player, who, for his good action on the stage and good-nature in life, was a great favourite of the town. A rakish officer had made lewd addresses to Mrs Bracegirdle, the famous actress, which the returning with disdain, the man resolved to get his will of her by force. Mountfort coming from her lodgings, having seen her safe home, was attacked by this officer and basely murdered. The Lord Mobun, being present when the murder was committed, was apprehended, imprisoned in the Tower, and brought to his trial for it before his Peers in Westminster-Hall, the Marquis of Carmarthen being constituted Lord High-Steward. After a trial of several days he was acquitted.

1692-3. dred and twenty-six thousand pounds for the fleet; two millions and ninety thousand pounds for the army; seven hundred and fifty thousand pounds to make good what was borrowed upon the credit of the poll-act; and six hundred thousand pounds for the civil list.

On the 9th, the bill for the frequent calling and meeting of Parliaments was reported to the House of Commons; after which they had a long and warm debate, whether it should be read the third time, which was carried in the affirmative by two hundred against one hundred and sixty-one, and sent back to the Lords, who were desired to concur in the amendments. To this they immediately agreed, and sent down two of the Judges to acquaint the Commons therewith.

This bill, by which it was enacted, that a Session of Parliament should be held every year, a new Parliament summoned every third year, and the present Parliament dissolved, within a limited time, was brought in, when the bill for free and impartial proceedings in Parliament had failed. It was imagined that a bill from the Lords dissolving a Parliament, which struck only at the House of Commons, the Lords being still the same men, would upon that single account have been rejected by the Commons; but they also passed it, and fixed their own dissolution to the 25th of March in the next year, reserving to themselves another Session. The King let the bill lie on the table for some time: So that men's eyes and expectations were much fixed on the issue of it. But, in conclusion, he refused to pass it; so the Session ended in an ill humour. The rejecting a bill, though an unquestionable right of the crown, has been so seldom practised, that the two Houses are apt to think it a hardship, when there is a bill denied (1).

On the 11th of February, a report was made in the House of Lords by the Committee for giving advice to his Majesty; and their Lordships agreed to the several heads mentioned above, only with this alteration, that they then allowed Colonel Gower to continue in his command over the artillery, though this was carried but by one voice, so that their advice was resolved to be drawn up in the form of an address to the King.

(1) Bishop Burnet has the following observation, upon this bill. The statutes (says he) for annual Parliaments in King Edward the first, and King Edward the third's time, are well known. But it is a question, whether the supposition if need be falls upon the whole act, or only upon those words, or oftener: It is certain these acts were never observed; and the non-observance of them was never complained of as a grievance. Nor did the famous act, in King Charles the first's time, carry the necessity of holding a session further, than to once in three years. Antiently, considering the haste and hurry in which Parliaments sat, an annual Parliament might be no great inconvenience to the nation: But, by reason of the slow methods of Sessions now, an annual Parliament in times of peace would become a very insupportable grievance. A Parliament of a long continuance seemed to be very dangerous, either to the Crown, or to the Nation: If the conjuncture, and their proceedings, gave them much credit, they might grow very uneasy to the Crown, as happened in King Charles the first's time; or, in another situation of affairs, they might be so practised upon by the Court, that they might give all the money, and all the liberties of England up, when they were to have a large share of the money, and were

The same day the Commons were upon the 1692-3. bill against mutineers and deserters, and the day following upon the supply, when they resolved, that credit should be given to the King to borrow as much as the review of the last poll come short of 300,000 l. which was all that remained to be raised.

On the 14th the Commons read the second time the bill for several new duties on goods imported, and committed it; as also the bill for taking the public accounts; into a grand Committee on the 17th on which they went, it was moved, that the Commissioners of the said accounts should be impowered to examine and state the old debt of the bankers, arising from the shutting up of the Exchequer in the reign of King Charles II; and this motion occasioned a debate of two hours; but the country gentlemen being jealous, that the design of this motion was either to throw the debt upon the Parliament, or else to obstruct the bill, rejected it.

The day following the Lords finished their address of advice to the King, to which they added, that they humbly advised and prayed his Majesty, that the army to be left in England of twenty-thousand men may consist all of their Majesties own subjects; and the Lords with the white staves were ordered to know his Majesty's pleasure, when he would be attended by the House to present the said address. Their Lordships had some debate about the Lieutenantancy of London; and it was moved, that it might be part of the address to remove out of the Lieutenantancy several persons, who were looked upon not to be well-affected to the Government; but it was rejected, and they resolved, that they would consider of this matter apart; which they did on the 20th, and, after some time spent therein, the further debate was adjourned sine die. Upon this occasion Mr Wilmot, who had suffered very much in the two last reigns, dispersed in the lobby of the House several printed papers, giving very ill characters of divers persons, who were then in the Lieutenantancy of London; of which complaint being made to the House, their Lordships, after some debate, resolved by a Majority of fourteen voices, that the paper was a scurrilous paper;

to be made the instruments of tyranny; as it was in King Charles the second's time. It was likewise hoped, that frequent Parliaments would put an end to the great expence Candidates put themselves to in elections; and that it would oblige the Members to behave themselves so well, both with relation to the public, and in their private deportment, as to recommend them to their electors at three years end: Whereas when a Parliament was to sit many years, Members covered with privileges were apt to take great liberties, forgot that they represented others, and took care only of themselves. So it was thought that England would have a truer Representative, when it was chosen anew every third year, than when it run on to the end of a reign. All that was objected against this was, that frequent elections would make the Freeholders proud and insolent, when they knew that applications must be made to them at the end of three years: This would establish a faction in every body, that had a right to an election; and, whereas now an election put men to a great charge all at once, then the charge must be perpetual all the three years, in laying in for a new election, when it was known how soon it must come round.

1692-3. paper; and ordered Wilmore to be taken into custody.

The Commons on the 22d of February took into consideration the state of Ireland, concerning which they examined several persons, especially upon these heads, 1. The abuses committed in disposing of the forfeitures, which were either given away, or let out to favourite particular persons, so much under the value, that what was worth 100*l.* was not let for 20*l.* 2. The disorders committed by the forces, who lived upon free quarter, and were very vexatious to the country. 3. The proceedings of the late Parliament, and their sudden prorogation, with a protest of the Lord Lieutenant, for that they had asserted their rights with respect to preparing heads for money-bills: And, 4. The great encouragement given to Papists and their favourers. The House did not enter into any debate upon these matters, but ordered, that the said persons should give in writing what they knew of their own knowledge, and what they could make out by other proofs; and that they should lay the same before the House on the Friday following. And because, in speaking upon the point of forfeitures, they charged Mr Cullisford, who was lately one of the Commissioners of the Revenue in Ireland, with divers misdemeanors in the management of that trust, he was ordered to attend the House, of which he was a Member.

The Lords, on the 23d, attended the King with their address of advice, which consisted of these four heads: 1. That the person, who should command the English forces under his Majesty, be born their Majesties subject. 2. That the English officers might have the preference and precedence of all officers in the confederate troops (except those of crowned heads) of the same rank and quality, though the Commissions of the latter be of an older date, according to what was agreed on by a capitulation made in 1678; the contrary practice whereof in the present war they conceived to be a great diminution to the Crown of England, and a great dissatisfaction to their Majesties subjects. 3. That there be left in England twenty thousand English soldiers during the year 1693 under the command of an English General. 4. That his Majesty would be pleased to give effectual order for remedying the great abuses committed by pressing of men for the fleet; and that he would cause such officers, as were guilty thereof, to be cashiered, and further punished according to law. To which his Majesty returned this answer, that he would take it into consideration. 5. That there may be no foreigners at the board of ordnance, since they esteemed it a prejudice to their Majesties service, and a discouragement to their subjects.

On the 24th of February Sir Francis Brewster, Mr Stone, and the rest gave in writing to the Commons, what they had before delivered by word of mouth. And the House having thereupon resumed the consideration of the state of Ireland, after a long debate, which kept them sitting till seven at night, they passed this vote without coming to a division, that it appeared by the information given to the House, that there had been great abuses and mismanagements in the affairs of Ireland; and that an address be made to the King to lay the same before him, that they might be remedied for the future; and 1692-3. to pray him, that a state of the forfeitures might be laid before the Parliament; and a Committee was appointed to draw up this address.

The Lords likewise, on the 28th of February, entered upon the consideration of the state of Ireland; and besides the persons, who were examined before the Commons, the Lady Arglas, the Bishop of Meath, Sir Robert Southwell, and Mr John Pulteney, Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant, were summoned to attend their Lordships, and examined accordingly. After which they were ordered to put the substance of what they had said, in writing. Mr Pulteney gave their Lordships a full account of what had passed within his knowledge, concerning the proceedings of the late Parliament, the forfeited estates, and the army; and then the Lords adjourned the farther consideration of this matter till the next day; when they prosecuted the inquiry, and on the 2d of March, after some debate, came to this resolution, That there had been great abuses and illegal and arbitrary proceedings in the management of affairs in Ireland. By the abuses they meant the embezzlements of the forfeited estates real and personal; and by the illegal proceedings, the disorders committed by the forces, but more particularly they seemed to have their eye upon a complaint, that had among others been made to them, that, a little before the reduction of Limerick, a person being accused of having been concerned in the murder of some of Colonel Foulkes's soldiers quartered at Dublin, the Lords Justices ordered him to be brought before the Council, and immediately commanded the Provost-Martial to cause him to be hanged without any previous proceedings against him, either by trial at common law, or before a Court-martial.

The Commons, on the 28th of February, went into a Committee of the whole House, upon the bill for prohibiting trade with France, and encouraging Privateers, and went through the same; and on the 2d of March they presented to his Majesty their address about the East-India Company; to which his Majesty answered, That he would do whatever was in his power for the good of the Kingdom, and for the advantage of this particular trade; and that this was a matter, which would require some time for him to consider. The day following they proceeded upon the review of the quarterly poll-bill; and, on the 7th, were in a Committee of the whole House, upon the bill for continuing certain impositions upon East-India goods, &c. and went through the same. And, having finished all the money-bills, they sent up the last to the Lords on the 9th of March for their Lordships concurrence. Among other bills, that had passed both Houses, and lay then ready for the Royal assent, was one for punishing mutineers and deserters, which was to take place on the 10th of March; and therefore their Lordships resolved, after some debate, on the Tuesday before, that the Lords with the white staves should acquaint his Majesty therewith, in order that his Majesty, if he thought proper, might come to the House, and give the Royal assent, on the 9th or 10th, to that and other bills, which were ready, that so the bill against mutineers might not commence before it was made a law by the Royal assent, which was thought by some not

1692-3. not very proper; but his Majesty thought fit to leave this, together with the rest of the bills, to the end of the session.

The Lords threw out the bill for prohibiting of lotteries, which was sent them from the Commons. The Patentees of the Royal Oak Lottery are said to have found means to have this bill stopped in the House of Lords.

On the 9th of March the two Houses waited upon his Majesty severally, and presented their addresses about Ireland. The heads of that of the Lords were as follow: 1. That there had been great abuses in the disposing of the forfeited estates, inasmuch that of the personal estates, which amounted to 135,000 l. but 10,000 l. had been accounted for to the King. 2. That protections had been granted to the Irish, not included in the articles of Limerick, whereby the Protestants had been deprived of the benefit of the law against them. 3. That the quarters of the army had not been paid, though the same was deducted out of the pay of the troops; and that the Parliament had made sufficient provision for both. 4. That a Mayor had been imposed for two years together upon the city of Dublin, contrary to their ancient privileges and charter. 5. That one Gaffney and several others, who were accused of the murder of some of Colonel Foulkes's men were executed without any proofs, and one Sweetman, who was the most guilty, discharged without any prosecution. To this address the King made this answer: 'Your Lordships may be assured, I will, as soon as possible, take care to remedy all these matters.'

The Commons, in their address, particularized, the abuses and mismanagements in the affairs of Ireland; which consisted, 1. In exposing the Protestant subjects to the miseries of free quarters, and the licentiousness of an army, to the great oppression of the people there; which they conceived had been chiefly occasioned by the want of that pay, which they did hope they had fully provided for. 2. In recruiting his Majesty's troops with Irish Papists, and such persons, as had been in open rebellion against his Majesty, to the great endangering and discouraging of his Majesty's Protestant subjects in that Kingdom. 3. In granting protections to Irish Papists, whereby Protestants were hindered from the legal remedies, and the course of law was stopped. 4. In reverting out-laws for high-treason against several rebels in that Kingdom (not within the articles of Limerick) to the great discontent of his Protestant subjects there. 5. In letting the forfeited estates at under-rates, to the lessening of his Majesty's revenue. 6. In the great imbezlements of his Majesty's stores in the towns and garrisons of that Kingdom, left by the late King James, and in the great imbezlements, which had been made in the forfeited estates and goods, which might have been employed for the safety and better preservation of Ireland. 7. In the addition made to the articles of Limerick, after the same were finally agreed to, and signed, and thereupon the town surrendered; which had been a great encouragement to the Irish Papists, and a weakening to the English interest, there. These abuses they most humbly besought his Majesty to redress; particularly, that the soldiers might be paid their arrears, and the country their quarters. That no Papist might be admitted to serve in the army. That inasmuch as the reducing of Ireland had been of great expence to this Kingdom, agreeably to his Majesty's gracious assurances, no grant might be made of the forfeited lands in Ireland, till there might be an opportunity of settling that matter in Parliament. That a true account of all forfeitures real and personal, and of the stores left by the late King James, might be laid before the Commons assembled in Parliament. That no out-laws might be reversed or pardons granted to the rebels, but by advice of Parliament. That no protections might be granted to the Irish. And that the additional article in the capitulation of Limerick, by which so wide a passage had been opened to the Irish Papists, to come in and repossess themselves of the estates, which they had forfeited by their rebellion, might be laid before the Commons, that so the manner of obtaining the same, and the prejudices, that had been thereby occasioned to the Protestant interests, might be inquired into. They closed this address, by saying, 'That as his Majesty had been pleased to give such gracious assurances of his readiness to comply with them in any thing, that might tend to the peace and security of this Kingdom; so they doubted not of his Majesty's like grace and favour to that of Ireland, in the safety and preservation whereof this his Majesty's Kingdom was so much concerned.' To this address the King answered, 'I will always have a great regard to what comes to me from the House of Commons; and what may have been amiss in Ireland, I will take care to remedy.'

By these proceedings it was plain, that an ill humour prevailed in both Houses; and that the parties of Tory and Whig appeared almost in every debate, and in every question. In the House of Lords particularly strong opposition was made to every thing that was proposed for the Government. They past many votes, and made many addresses to the King, which were chiefly designed to load the administration, and to alienate the King from the Dutch. Their proposition for a Committee of both Houses to consider the state of the nation, and to give the King advice upon it, was such as had never been offered, but when the nation was ready to break out into civil affairs. This Committee, when once begun, would have grown, in a very short time, to have been a Council of State, and soon have brought all affairs under their inspection. The Commons indeed passed the supplies, but it was with great slowness; and those, who could not oppose them, yet shewed their discontent in delaying the bills, and clogging them with unacceptable clauses. The wasteful method was continued of raising money upon remote funds, by which there lay a heavy discount on tallies; so that above a fourth part was in some of them to be discounted. However, after their complaints of the Admiralty, and of the conduct in Flanders, particularly in the action of Steenkirk, and their voting some heads of an address relating to these matters, the Commons, by a secret management, let the whole fall, and those angry votes came to nothing. Though the Lords persisted in their ill humour, any thing they could do was of less moment, when it was not like to be seconded by the Commons.

Remarks on the proceedings of the Parliament.

1692-3. Soon after the addresses about the Irish affairs, the King came to the House of Peers, and, having given the Royal assent to several bills, concluded the session with the following speech :
The Parliament is adjourned.
 March 14.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

The King's speech.
 Pr H. C. II. 415.

THE large supplies, which you have given me this session, are so great testimonies of your good affections, that I take this occasion, with great willingness, to return my hearty thanks to you. And I assure you, it shall be my care to see, that that money you have given may be effectually applied to such services, as may be most for the honour and interest of England.

I must recommend to your care the peace and quiet of the several counties, to which you are now returning, and doubt not but by your care the supply, which you have so freely given, will not only be effectually levied, but with the greatest equality too, and the least uneasiness to the people, that is possible.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

The posture of affairs does necessarily require my presence abroad; but I shall take care to leave such a number of troops here, as may be sufficient for the security of the kingdom against any attempts of our enemies.

I shall add no more, but that, as I shall continue to expose my own person, upon all occasions, for the good and advantage of these Kingdoms; so I do likewise assure you, that my hearty and sincere endeavours shall never be wanting in any other kind, to make this a great and flourishing nation.

And then, by his Majesty's command, the Parliament was prorogued to the 2d of May.

Among the acts passed this Session were,

Acts passed this Session.

1. An act, that the inhabitants of the province of York may dispose of their personal estates by will. It was the custom before, that the widows and younger children of persons, dying in that province, were intitled to a part of the goods and chattels of their late husbands or fathers (called their reasonable part) notwithstanding any will, or jointure to the contrary.

2. An act for taking special bails, in the country upon actions and suits, depending in the Courts of King's-Bench, Common-Pleas, and Exchequer. By this act, the Judges, by commissions under the seals of their respective Courts, may empower persons, not Attornies and Solicitors, in all the counties of England and Wales, to take recognizances of bails in action, depending in the said Courts, as the Justices and Barons used to do, for which the persons empowered shall receive 2 s. This is a great ease and benefit to such as would otherwise be obliged to appear in person at Westminster.

3. An act for encouraging the apprehending of highway-men. Every person, who shall take any robbers upon the highway, shall have from the Sheriff, without fee, for every offender 40 l. within one month after conviction; and also the horse, furniture and arms, money or other goods of the robber taken with him.

4. An act to prevent frauds by clandestine mortgages. If any person shall acknowledge judgment, statute, or recognizance, and afterwards mortgage his lands to a second creditor, the mortgager shall have no remedy against the mortgagor for redemption of the lands. In case of a second mortgage, the mortgager shall have no equity of redemption against the second mortgagee; and, in case of more mortgages than one, the late or under mortgages shall have power to redeem any former mortgages.

5. An act for the better discovery of judgments in the Courts of law. Particularly all judgments for debt shall in every Easter Term be put into an alphabetical docket, to be searched by all persons paying for every Term's search for judgment against one person 4 d. No judgment, not docketed, shall affect any lands as to purchasers or mortgagees, or have any preference against heirs, executors, or administrators.

6. An act to prevent malicious informations in the Crown-office of the Court of King's-Bench. No information to be filed before recognizance is taken from the informer, that he will effectually prosecute such information.

During the Session of the Parliament several officers of the army, wanting men to compleat their companies, agreed with those, who had warrants to press for the sea; who, under pretence of pressing for the navy, took up great numbers of young men, whom they shipped off for Holland, and there forced them into land-service. Among the rest a servant belonging to one of the Members of the House of Commons happened to be thus spirited away. Upon which the House ordered this grievance to be represented to the King, who, in his answer, let the House know, 'How much he repented, that his subjects should meet with such hard usage; and that he would take all possible care for the future to punish the authors of it. And that in the first place he had called before him the officers of the army, and given them a strict charge, that they should receive no men, that were impressed. And had given orders to the Admiralty to examine the press-masters, that had committed those abuses; and that there should be such exemplary punishment inflicted on them, that others should be deterred from doing the like.'

As to the honours and promotions bestowed by the King in the last year, and the beginning of this, the most remarkable were as follow:

Sir Henry Capel, brother to the Earl of Essex, was created, about the middle of April, 1692, Baron Capel of Tewksbury.

On the 30th of December, Sir John Trevor, Speaker of the House of Commons, and first Commissioner of the Great Seal, was made Master of the Rolls, in the room of Henry Powle deceased. He had enjoyed that place under King James.

Sir Edward Ward was made Attorney-General, which gave such disgust to Sir Thomas Trevor the Solicitor-General, who thought he had a right to succeed to that office, that he had determined to resign his own place, and was with great difficulty persuaded by his friends to continue in it.

At the same time Sir John Lowther, Henry Newcomen, (who had been one of King James's mission to Sea-Captains) Anthony Lord Viscount Falkland, the Admiral, Robert Aysen, Sir Robert Rich, Henry Killigrew, and Sir Ralph Delaval, were appointed Commissioners 1692-3. missioners of the Admiralty. George Rooke, who was soon after knighted on board his ship at Spithead, was made Vice-Admiral of the Red; the Lord Berkley, Vice-Admiral of the Blue; Colonel Matthew Aylmer, Rear-Admiral of the Red; and David Mitchell, Rear-Admiral of the Blue.

Ruffel is dismissed. Burnet. The King being now possessed against Admiral Ruffel, he dismissed him from his service, and put the command of the fleet into the hands of three persons, Killegrew, Delaval, and Shovel. Killegrew and Delaval were thought so inclined to King James's interests, that it made some insinuate, that the King was in the hands of those, who intended to betray him to his enemies. For, though no exception lay against Shovel, yet it was said, that he was put in with the other two, only to give some reputation to the commission, and that he was one against two; so that he could neither hinder nor do any thing. The chief blame of this nomination was cast on the Earl of Nottingham; and of those, who belonged to his office, many stories were raised and spread about, as if there had been among them, besides a very great remissness in some of the concerns of the Government, an actual betraying of all secrets and counsels. The opinion of this was spread both within and without the Kingdom; and most of the Confederates were possessed with it. But he justified not only himself, but all his under Secretaries, and the King and Queen still continued to have a good opinion of his fidelity, though they saw some defects in his judgment, with a great party-heat, that appeared upon all occasions, and even in the smallest matters.

A change in the ministry. Burnet.

The King made likewise considerable alterations in his Ministry. Every body was now grown weary of the Great Seal's being in commission. It occasioned the proceedings in Chancery to be more dilatory and more expensive, and there were such exceptions made to the decrees of the Commissioners, that appeals were brought against most of them, and they were generally reversed. Sir John Sommers had now got so great a reputation, both in his post of Attorney-General, and in the House of Commons, that the King on the 23d of March gave him the Great Seal, with the title of Lord Keeper. He was excellently well skilled in his own profession, and had an uncommon share of knowledge in all parts of polite and useful learning. He had a great capacity for business, with an extraordinary temper; for he was fair and gentle, perhaps to a fault, considering his post; and had all the patience and softness, as well as the justice and equity, becoming a great magistrate. He had always agreed in his notions with the Whigs, and had studied to bring them to better thoughts of the King, and to a greater confidence in him.

Sommers made Lord Keeper.

His character.

The same Day Sir John Trenchard was sworn one of their Majesties principal Secretaries of State, and of the Privy-council. He had been engaged far with the Duke of Monmouth, as has been observed. He got out of England, and lived some years beyond sea, and had a true knowledge of foreign affairs. He was a calm and sedate man, and much more moderate, than could have been expected, since he was a leading man in a party. The bringing him and Sir John Sommers into those posts was ascribed chiefly to the great credit, which the Earl of Sunderland had gained with the King. He had now got into his confidence, and declared openly for the Whigs. This Earl, after he was removed from his places by King James, retired into Holland, where he wrote a letter to a friend in vindication of himself, which was published in London, in 1689. He was seized at Rotterdam by order of the States, and excepted out of the act of indemnity by the Parliament; but it was thought, his detention was by collusion, and that he was apprehended on purpose to be formally discharged, to make way for his more honourable return to England. However this be, it is certain, that the same express that carried the King's letter to the States, on his advancement to the throne, conveyed another for the discharge of the Earl of Sunderland; and his being excepted out of the pardon, seems to have been done purely in compliance to common fame, that he had been deeply concerned in all King James's arbitrary proceedings: For the confidence King William put in him afterwards shews he was not dissatisfied with his conduct at that juncture. Most assuredly, his advice to King James (from what motive soever it flowed) not to accept the offer of a French army, made the way easy to accomplish the revolution.

But as these advancements had a considerable effect on the whole party, and brought them to a much better opinion of the King, so a party came to be now formed, that studied to cross and defeat every thing. This was led by Sir Edward Seymour and Sir Christopher Musgrave; the latter of whom was a Gentleman of a good family in Cumberland, whose life was regular, and his deportment grave. He had lost a place in King James's time; for, though he was always a high Tory, yet he would not comply with that King's designs. He had indeed contributed much to increase his revenue, and to offer him more than he asked; but he would not go into the taking off the test. Upon the revolution the place, out of which he had been turned, was given to a Gentleman, who had a good share of merit in it. This alienated him from the King; and he, being a man of good judgment and great experience, came to be considered as the head of the party; in which he found his account so well, that no offers, that were made him, could ever bring him over to the King's interests. Upon many critical occasions he gave up some important points, for which the King found it necessary to pay him very liberally (1).

However, the party of the Tories was too inconsiderable to have raised a great opposition, if a body of Whigs had not joined with them. Some of these had such Republican notions, that they

they were much set against the prerogative, and thought the King was become too stiff in maintaining it. Others were offended because they were not considered nor preferred, as they thought they deserved. The chief of this body of men were Mr. Paul Foley and Mr. Robert Harley, who were both this Session made Commissioners for examining and stating the public accounts of the Kingdom. Foley was a younger son of one, who from mean beginnings had, by iron-works, raised one of the greatest estates, that had been known in England in that time. He was a learned, though not a practising, lawyer, and was a man of virtue and good principles, but morose and wilful; and he had the affectation of passing for a great Patriot, by his constant finding fault with the Government, and keeping up an ill humour with, and a bad opinion of, the Court. Harley was descended of an antient and good family, and very eminently learned; much turned to politics, and of a restless ambition. He was a man of great industry and application, and knew forms and the records of Parliament so well, that he was capable both of lengthening out, and of perplexing debates. Nothing could answer his aspiring temper. So he and Foley joined with the Tories to create jealousies, and raise an opposition.

That, which gave them much strength, was the King's cold and reserved way. He took no pains to oblige those, who came to him; nor was he easy of access. He lived out of town at Kensington, and his chief confidants were Dutch. He took no notice of the Clergy, and seemed to have little concern in the matters of the Church or of Religion. And at this time some Deists were publishing books against the Christian Religion in general, as the Socinians were more particularly against some points of the orthodox faith (1). These, expressing great zeal for the Government, gave a handle to those, who were waiting for all advantages, and were careful of increasing and improving them, to spread it all over the nation, that the King, and those about him, had no regard to religion, nor to the Church of England.

In this situation were affairs when the King departed for Holland. He went to Harwich on the 25th of March, but, the wind proving contrary, he returned to Kensington, from whence he set out again on the 31st, and embarking near Gravesend, and being attended with a squadron of men of war commanded by Admiral Mitchel, arrived safely at the Maese on the 2d of April, went to the Hague, thence to Laas, and afterwards to the army in Flanders, where the French were this year so strong, that their forces exceeded the Confederates almost by one half at the beginning of the campaign. But the King's diligence, in possessing himself of the camp at Parke near Louvain, intirely broke the French King's designs upon Brabant; who was thereby obliged to send a strong detachment, under the command of the Dauphin, and the Marshal de Boufflers, into Germany, and return himself to Verailles, without attempting any thing (2). The French, under the Duke of Luxemburg, were all this while incamped at Meldert; and, though their convoys were much disturbed by the garri-son of Charleroy, yet it seemed a trial of skill between both armies, which should continue longest in their posts. But at length the French were forced to quit theirs first, marching to Heilshelm, in their way towards the Maese; which gave the King an opportunity of sending a strong detachment under the command of the Prince of Wirtemberg, to force the lines, which the French had made to cover their conquered countries from the Scheldt to the Lys; and so on to the very sea by Dunkirk. At the same time Count Tilly, General of the troops of Liege, was marching with a reinforcement to join the King, of which Luxemburg being informed, marched immediately with a good body of troops to hinder that conjunction; which he did effectually, surprizing the Count in the hollow way, through which he was marching, and forcing him to retreat to Maeffricht, leaving near two hundred of his men killed, and all his baggage behind him. Wirtemberg's forcing the lines with good success, and raising great contributions, did not hinder Luxemburg from laying siege to Huy, which made the King advance nearer the country of Liege. But, when he came to Tongres, he was surprized to hear, that the castle of Huy had capitulated. Upon farther in-formation that Luxemburg was drawn nearer Liege, the King sent ten battalions thither, which, with great difficulty, got at length into the place, that now absolutely rejected the neutrality, which Luxemburg had offered. Though the Bishop was true to the Allies, yet there was a faction formed among the capitulars to offer themselves to the French; but the garrison adhered to the Bishop; and now, when so great an army lay near them, they broke the measures which that faction had taken. Luxemburg thereupon made a feint of besieging Liege, though his real design was to attack the King, now incamped at Neerhespen, so much weakened by the several detachments he had made to reinforce the garrisons of Liege and Maeffricht, that it was generally computed, that the French were at least thirty-five thousand men stronger than the Confederates.

As soon as the King had notice of the enemies approach, he got on horseback with the Elector of Bavaria, and chief officers of the army, and finding by the enemy's countenance, that it was the vanguard of their whole army, that was coming to attack him in his own camp, he immediately ordered to arms, and to draw up in battle to expect the enemy. Most of the general officers were for repassing the Geet, but the King chose

(2) The French King had opened the campaign with great pomp in Flanders, coming thither in person, accompanied by the Ladies of the Court, which appeared the more ridiculous, since there was no Queen at the head of them; unless Madam de Soubise was to be taken for one, to whom respects were indeed paid with more submission than is commonly due to Queens; so that what might be wanting in the outward ceremony, was more than balanced by the real authority she possessed. Estimé, II. 120.

(1) Whether

1693. chose to take the advantage of the ground he had, and venture a battle, notwithstanding the great disproportion of the two armies, rather than expose his rear to the enemy's charge. Besides, the French were now near the large and defenceless town of Brabant, which must feel the effects of their fury, unless they were stopped by venturing an engagement; and as the benefits of a victory were great, so, upon the worst supposition of the event, the King had still Wirttemberg's victorious army ready to make up the breaches of his own; an advantage, which the enemy had not so ready on their side. But however, as the King might have secured himself from all attacks, by passing the river, his conduct, in not doing it was much censured, considering his strength and the enemy's. The right of the Confederates in this camp was at Heilshelm and Wangen, upon the river Geet, and reached as far as Neer-Winden, being covered with a small brook, several hedges, and hollow ways. The Elector of Bavaria had his quarters at Wangen; the body of foot and left wing of the horse reached from thence as far as Dormal, upon the brook of Beck, where Levee remained in their rear.

As soon as the enemy drew up by the Confederate camp, the King ordered Brigadier Rumsey, with the regiments of O-Farrel, Mackay, Lauder, Leven, and Monroe, to the right of all, to guard some hedges and hollow ways upon the right of the village of Lare. The Brandenburg battalions were posted to the left of this village; and more to the left the infantry of Hanover. Prince Charles of Brandenburg, as Major-General, commanding the six battalions of Brandenburg, and Lieutenant-General Dumont the Hanoverians, with whom he was to defend the village of Neer-Winden, that covered part of the Confederates camp, between the right wing of horse, and their main body. These were afterwards reinforced by the first battalion of the first regiment of guards, and the second battalion of Scots guards. Upon the left at Neer-Landen the King ordered the first battalion of the Royal regiment, Churchill's, Selwin's, and Trelowney's, Prince Frederic's battalion of Danes, and Fagel's, to possess this village, that covered the left to the brook of Beck, where it was covered by the village of Neer-Landen. The ground was open between the villages of Neer-Winden and Neer-Landen; whereupon the King ordered a retrenchment to be made in the night from the one to the other, to cover the body of foot; which was indeed but a slight breast-work, as may easily be judged by the short time they had to make it, and the small number of men who worked about it, being only thirty of each battalion. What remained of the body of the foot was drawn up in one line within this retrenchment to defend it. The dragons upon the left were ordered to the village of Dormal, to guard that pass upon the brook of Beck, and from thence the left wing of horse reached to Neer-Landen, where it was covered by this brook, and from thence turned off to the right behind the body of foot (1).

The King, who had been on horseback till late in the evening, not only to give all the necessary commands, but to see them executed, ordered his coach to be brought to the rear of Stanley's regiment, where he reposed himself about two hours, and early in the morning sent for Dr. Menard, one of his chaplains, to pray with him in the coach.

By sun-rising the French were drawn up within the reach of the Confederates cannon, which played upon them with good success, and which the French sustained with great resolution till about six of the clock, when they made a motion to draw nearer the King's retrenchments. About eight Luxemburg ordered a strong body of troops to attack the villages of Lare and Neer-Winden, which they did with great fury and various success, having gained and lost these posts more than once; but at length the Allies maintained their ground, and here it was the Duke of Berwick was taken prisoner by Brigadier Churchill. This ill success did not discourage the French from trying their fortunes against the Confederates left wing at Neer-Landen. This post, indeed, was not a weak one, but it was attacked with a great disproportion of forces, and the fire was very smart on both sides. The first battalion of the Royal regiment was, after a sharp dispute, forced to retire, but was soon after encouraged by the King's presence (who rode immediately from the right to the left) and sustained by Selwin's, who observing a passage in this place, where horse could come upon his rear, ordered trees to be cut down, and to stop it up. The horse, where Hamilton's grenadiers had before been posted, was likewise set on fire; and by this time the two regiments above-mentioned being supported by Prince Frederic's and Fagel's, the enemy, after a sharp dispute of about two hours, were intirely beaten off, and pursued quite out of the defile into the very plain; so that they attempted this place no more.

Hitherto the success of the day was visibly on the side of the Confederates; and the French, who continued a faint fire at Neer-Winden, seemed as if they designed to draw off. But Luxemburg, having still several brigades of fresh men, resolved to gain the village of Neer-Winden, and ordered the Prince of Conti to make the attack. The enemy had remained masters of the outermost hedges of this village; for, though our rallied forces had made the French give way considerably, yet they could not intirely clear the village. The Prince of Conti, with the best foot in the French army, charged the Confederates so vigorously, that he obliged them, spent as they were by the former encounters, soon to yield to him the avenues of Neer-Winden; upon which success Luxemburg came to observe the passages, that led to the Confederates camp, for his horse to march in. As the Marhal de Villeroy was marching with a strong body of horse this way, Count d'Arco, General of the Bavarian Cuirassiers, charged them with so much vigour, that, notwithstanding their brave resistance, he repulsed them quite within their foot; the Duke de Chartres, who charged with them, narrowly ing, said, Now I believe Waldeck is dead; that General being allowed to have been the best in his time for incamping.

rowly escaping being made prisoner. Thereupon the Confederates endeavoured to regain once more the post of Neer-Winden; and the Elector of Leiria ordered two battalions to charge the enemy in front, whilst three others should charge them upon their left flank. But the French rallying, and being considerably reinforced, the attempt became impossible, the Dutch and the Scots guards having spent all their ammunition by their continual fire. The King, who had left Neer-Landen upon the enemy's fresh attempt upon Neer-Winden, led twice the English battalions to the charge, up to the right of the retrenchment (which was now flanked and under the enemy's command) where they fought with great bravery. In the mean time Luxemburg, who had found a more convenient passage for the horse between the posts of the King's and Zurbeck's brigades, came in himself with the Prince of Conti and Count de Marfin, into the plain of the Confederates camp, with the Carabineers, and several other regiments; whilst the Marshal de Joyeuse passed between Neer-Winden and Lore with three brigades. Conti, being joined by the French guards, fell upon the Hanover horse, and broke them; whilst part of the enemy's second line of horse, and the reserve, came in upon their left along the hedges of Lore. The Marquis d'Harcourt, who had been sent for from Huy with his detachment of twenty-two squadrons, came time enough to have his share of the day. He joined these, and made his dragoons alight to chase our foot out of the village of Lore. The Duke of Villeroy came in upon our right of the retrenchments; which place the English foot disputed with undaunted resolution, till, being overpowered, the French remained masters of this part of the retrenchment, which they levelled, to make room for a body of horse to come in.

After the Hanover horse had been broken, the rest of the Confederate right wing of horse, being cut off from the body of foot, was soon overthrown by the enemy, who now had the opportunity of charging them both front and flank. The Elector of Bavaria did what he could to resist the numerous multitude of the enemies horse, that charged him thus; but, finding it impossible, with no small difficulty he retreated over the bridge, and rallied on the other side as many of the scattered horse and foot as could get over, to favour the retreat of those, who were ready to pass. The King did what he could to remedy this disorder, riding to the left to bring up the English horse for the relief of the right wing. But the enemy had now got another body of horse in our camp commanded by the Duke d'Elboeuf. At the same time the Duke de Montmorency, Luxemburg's son, fell upon the right flank of the Dutch horse, and put them in disorder before the English horse, which were led on by the King, could come up and form their squadrons; so that they were forced to charge the enemy in the same order they rid up to them (and most of them had rid as fast as their horses could gallop) but that did not hinder them from doing extraordinary service. The King himself charged at the head of Lord Galkway's regiment, which distinguished itself very much on this occasion. Colonel Wyndham, at the head of his regiment, charged several times through and through the enemy's squadrons. Colonel Loe was made prisoner, and taken to the French camp. The King, who had been wounded by a cannon-ball in the leg, was rescued by a Gentleman of the French King's guards from the hands of one, who was offering to slay him.

The King, seeing the battle lost, ordered the infantry to retreat to Dormal upon the brook of Beck, which post had hitherto been kept by the dragoons of the left wing, who had nothing to do this day; and finding, that the enemies were surrounding him on all sides, he ordered the regiments of Wyndham, Lamley, and Galkway to cover his retreat over the bridge at Neerhespen, which he gained with great difficulty. There was now nothing but confusion and disorder in the Confederates camp; all those, who could not get the paces for the retreat, being pressed by the enemy, were forced to throw themselves into the river, where many were drowned, the Earl of Atblone narrowly escaping the same fate. Lieut. nant-General Talmash brought off the English foot with great prudence, bravery, and success, but some of the English life-guards were so terrified with the apprehension of a pursuing enemy, that they did not think themselves safe till they reached Breda. Sixty pieces of cannon and nine mortars were lost; but all the baggage had been sent to Leuwe the night before, where it was safely brought off in respect of the enemy, but generally plundered by our own soldiers.

The King in this battle was seen every where, acting the different parts of a General and of a private soldier. He had supported the whole action with so much courage, and so true a judgment, that it was thought he got more honour that day, than even when he triumphed at the Boyne. He charged himself, in several places, and was in the midst of the most imminent dangers; many being shot round about him with the enemies cannon, and himself escaping no less than three musket shots, one through his peruke which fastened him for some time, another through the sleeve of his coat, and a third, which carried off the knot of his scarf, and left a small contusion on his side. In a word, he gained so far the respect and admiration of his very enemies, that it was a common saying among them, That they wanted but such a King to make themselves masters of Christendom. And the Prince of Conti, in an intercepted letter to his Princess, declared, "I saw the King exposing himself to the greatest dangers; and surely so much valour very well deserved the peaceable possession of the crown he wears." The French King himself likewise was reported to have said, that Luxemburg's behaviour was like the Prince of Conti's, but King William's like Marshal Turenne's.

The French lost so many men and suffered so much, in several onsets they had made, that they were not able to pursue a victory, which cost them so dear. The Confederates lost in all about seven thousand; and among these there was scarce an officer of note, only the Count de Salms had his leg shot off by a cannon-ball, of which he died in a few hours. By all the accounts that came from France, it appeared that the French had lost double that number, with at least two thousand officers killed or wounded; and these accounts seem to be confirmed by Luxemburg's continuing in the battle, at Ware, without attempting any t

1693: The King's army was in a few days as strong as ever, by recalling the Duke of Wurtemberg and the battalions he had sent to Liège, and some other bodies that he drew out of garrisons. The rest of the campaign passed over without any other action; only after the King had left the army, and Luxemburg had been reinforced with some troops from the sea-coast, and a great detachment under Boissiers from the Rhine, he sat down before Charleroy. The place was attacked with great fury, but the garrison made such a vigorous resistance, that, though they had little or no prospect of relief, yet they held out six and twenty days from the opening of the trenches, and then made an honourable capitulation. The country about Charleroy had been so cut up, that it was not possible to subsist an army that might have been brought to relieve it.

Affairs of Catalonia. The French had better success and less opposition in Catalonia, where so early as the 29th of May they invested Roset, and carried on the siege with that diligence, that they made themselves masters of the place in seven days. Then they advanced to Barcelona, expecting their fleet, which was to have bombarded it by sea, while their army attacked it by land. This put all Spain in great consternation; the design of the invasion was to force them to a separate peace; while they felt themselves so vigorously attacked, and saw that they were in no condition to resist.

Affairs of Germany. The Dauphin, with a great part of the French army, had been sent to make head against the Germans, who had brought an army together, commanded by the Elector of Saxony, the Landgrave of Hesse, and the Prince of Baden. The Germans (who had been retarded by some disputes about the command) were so slow, and the French so forward, that the latter passed the Rhine about the middle of May at Philipsburg; and, without any opposition, the Marquis de Chamilly invested the city of Lieidelsberg. At the same time the Duke de Lorge crossed the mountains to oppose the Prince of Baden, who was not yet in a condition to act but defensively, so that the town was left to defend itself. But, besides its natural weakness, there was at this time such a division between the garrison and the townsmen about the money, that was called in, and which the garrison would have to be current again, that, when the regiment of Sconbeck was ready to enter the place to reinforce the garrison, the townsmen would not suffer them to come in; which gave Monsieur de Melac an opportunity to seize a redoubt, which commanded that part of the town. In short, the French, on the 21st of May, made themselves masters of the suburbs with little opposition, and their grenadiers drove the besieged with so much fury to the castle-gates, that above six hundred of their soldiers were left without, who were all put to the sword. The Governor of the castle, apprehending the same fate, accepted the conditions, which de Lorge imposed upon him, and was contented to be conducted to Wimpel with the rest of his garrison, consisting of twelve hundred men, two pieces of cannon, and twelve waggon-laden with baggage. The Imperialists were no sooner out of the city, but the French set both that and the castle on fire, and committed several other barbarities in the Palatinate, not sparing so much as the tombs of the deceased Electors. Flushed with this easy success, de Lorge advanced towards the Neckar, with a design to attack the Prince of Baden, who lay intrenched with his army on the other side of the river; which the French twice endeavoured to pass, but were forced to abandon their enterprize with the loss of near a thousand men. Some time after the Dauphin in person joined the army, which consisted of near seventy thousand men; and, having crossed the Neckar, made a show of attacking the Prince of Baden, but found his Highness so well posted, that he repassed the river, without attempting any thing; and having put a garrison into Stugard, and sent a detachment into Flanders and Piedmont, he returned in August to Versailles.

With regard to the affairs of Italy, the Duke of Savoy was no sooner recovered of his long illness of Italy, disposition, but he put himself at the head of the army; which, being considerably strong, made the inhabitants of Dauphiné apprehensive of a worse irruption into their country than the last; but the Confederates seemed now chiefly to aim at the driving the French out of Italy, by dispossessing them of Casal and Pignerol; neither of which was effected this year. Casal indeed was blocked up for some time, and the Fort of St. George carried by assault, which completed the blockade of that place; but things went no farther, and the Duke of Savoy, with the main army, laid siege to Pignerol, and took the fort of St. Bridget, that covered the place, but paid too dear for this post, that after all it was debated, whether they should carry on the siege, or only bombard the town. Whilst the Allies were thus deliberating among themselves, Catinat, being considerably reinforced, descended into the plains, and gave the Duke such apprehensions for Turin, that he drew off from about Pignerol, and incamped at Marsaglia, having first blown up the fort of St. Bridget. The army was presently drawn up. The Marquis de Leganez commanded the left wing, composed of the King of Spain's troops. The Duke, and under him the Count of Caparra, commanded the right wing; and Prince Eugene the main battle, having under him the Marquis de la Parrelle, and the Count de las Torres. As for Duke Schemberg, being denied the post due to him, he resolved to fight on foot at the head of his own regiment, like an ordinary Colonel. The Confederate army, being thus disposed, marched into the neighbourhood of Orbasson, from whence they perceived the enemy towards the hills, between Orbasson and Piasaque. Early the next day the French advanced towards the Confederates, making use of the advantage they had in the ground, which was full of woods and vineyards; and soon after the cannon began to play on both sides. About half an hour after eight the French fell upon the Confederates left wing with near twenty thousand men, without firing a shot, having their bayonets at the ends of their fuzees, and their swords in their hands. They were received and driven back with great vigour; but, renewing their attack, they took in front and flank the Neapolitan and Milanese horse, who, after having courageously withstood the fury of their enemies, were at last overpowered by their numbers, and pushed upon the German horse. These, being at the same time charged by the little Gendarmes, were no longer able to maintain their ground, but fell upon the infantry, which was put also into disorder.

1693. order. The second line was brought on to oppose the enemy, while the first line rallied; but, the horse giving way, the foot was quickly routed.

While things passed thus on this side, the French were thrice repulsed with great loss by the Confederates main battalia and right wing, till their horse which had made the left wing give way, attacked the Confederates infantry behind and in flank, who had no longer any horse to cover them, and were at the same time attacked by the enemy's foot. All the troops fought with great courage, and the dispute was desperate on both sides. His Britannic Majesty's forces, which were posted in the main battle, particularly distinguished themselves; and Duke Schomberg, their General, was desired by the Count de las Torres, after the enemy's third attack, to take upon him the command, and cause a retreat to be made by the body of foot and the right wing. But his Grace, resenting the usage, which he had met with before, told him, that it was necessary first to have his Royal Highness's order; and till it came he would bear the enemy's fire; adding, that he found things were gone so far, that they must now either conquer or die. The Confederates resisted the repeated efforts of the enemy with extraordinary resolution, but were at last forced to abandon the field of battle, and to retire with the loss of the greatest part of their cannon, and of seven or eight thousand men. Duke Schomberg, having fought with unparalleled valour, received a wound in his thigh, of which he died not many days after, to the regret of all good and gallant men, for he was of that number in an eminent degree. The honour of the action, but with that the greatest loss, fell to the French; for, though they carried the victory by their numbers, yet the resistance, which they met with, was such, that the Duke of Savoy gained more in his reputation, than he suffered by the loss of the day. With this ended the campaign in Piedmont.

Our affairs at sea more fortunate than at land. The English and Dutch fleet was large and strong, and set out early. The Joint-admirals were not at first restrained by any particular instructions, but ordered in general only to use their utmost endeavours to annoy the enemy and protect the trade. But afterwards they received her Majesty's commands more particularly from the Lords of the Admiralty, chiefly regarding the security of a great fleet of merchantmen of near four hundred sail, English, Dutch, Hamburgers, &c. Much time was however spent, several councils of war held, and divers representations made, before they could come to a resolution, what number of ships to appoint for the special convoy, and how far to accompany them with the whole fleet. It was at last determined, that the whole fleet, together with the Mediterranean Squadron, should proceed together thirty leagues West South-west from Ushant; and that when the Admirals spread a blue flag at the main top-mast head, and fired three guns, Sir George Rooke, as well as the other convoys, should go forward, according to the orders, which they had received from the Lords of the Admiralty; but, being come to the height limited, on the 4th of June, they resolved, in another council of war, to proceed with the Mediterranean Squadron twenty leagues farther, and then to return to the former station, to take up the cruisers, from whence it was judged advisable to proceed to the rendezvous North-west of Ushant. Sir George Rooke therefore, with twenty-three men of war, and the Turkey fleet, left the main body of the fleet on the 6th of June, and, steering for the Straights, left by the way the vessels bound for Bilbao, Lisbon, St. Ubes, and other parts, under the convoy of two men of war. He was unhappy in that, which, upon any other occasion, would have been a great happiness; he had a fair and strong gale of wind, so that no advice sent after him could overtake him; nor did he meet with any ships at sea, that could give him notice of the danger that lay before him. Being come, on the 17th, within sixty leagues of Cape Vincent, he discovered part of the French fleet (1), which made him call a Council of war, wherein it was resolved, that, the wind being fresh northerly, and giving a fair opportunity of hastening their passage to Cadiz, the merchant-ships should make the best of their way. Upon the discovery of the enemy's whole fleet, consisting of eighty sail, commanded by Monsieur de Tourville, Rooke being of opinion, that he was too far advanced to think of a retreat, resolved to push for it; but, the Dutch Vice-Admiral Vandergoos bringing to, and letting him know, he chose to avoid fighting, which he thought hazardous; he likewise brought to, and stood off with an easy sail, that so the Dutch and the heavy ships might work up to the windward; sending at the same time the sheerneck's with orders to the small ships, which were near the land, and could not (as he judged) keep up with the fleet, to endeavour to get along shore in the night, and save themselves in Faro, St. Lucar, or Cadiz. About six in the evening, the French Admiral and Vice-Admiral of the Blue, which had the whole afternoon gained upon the squadron, notwithstanding all the sail they could make, came up with the leeward and sternmost of the Confederate fleet. There were three Dutch men of war, whereof two were commanded by the Captains Schryver and Harder Poel, who for five hours together bravely fought, first eleven, and then seven of the enemy's men of war. They had the good fortune to get clear of the first eleven, but were at last forced to yield, after having made a most obstinate resistance (2). The Dutch merchant-ships immediately tacked, and stood in for the shore, as the enemy

(1) The French either were, or feigned to be, at first, in as great a surprise as the Confederates; for they stood away with several of their ships, and abandoning others, set fire to them. And, though it may have been a decoy to draw them on, yet the great numbers of ships might very well make them apprehend it to be the whole body of the English and Dutch fleets coming upon them. And, indeed, had they come so far with them, such an occasion offered, which perhaps might not be found again in an age, of destroying the whole naval force of France.

(2) The Captains being carried on board the French Admiral's ship, the Dutch ships were driven to a retreat.

(1) The

1693. enemy did after them. The Admiral stood off all night, having a fresh gale at North North West; and the next morning fifty-four of the merchant-ships, with several men of war, were about him; but of the latter no more than two of those belonging to the Dutch, and one Hamburgher, five sail of the enemy's ships being to the leeward, and two to the windward, which last kept sight of him until it was night. The next day the Admiral called the officers of the men of war and merchant-ships on board him, to inform himself from them what account they could give of the rest of the fleet, and to advise what was best to be done for their security; and at last determined to fail to Maderas for water, and from thence, either to Cork or King'sale, at the former of which ports he arrived on the 3d of August (1).

Thus the enemy with great art had drawn the Confederate Squadron and the merchant-ships into this misfortune; and if they had pursued the advantage with as much conduct and resolution, not a ship could well have escaped them; for the Admiral and Vice-admiral of the Blue were within shot of Sir George Rooke, when they tacked and stood in for the shore after the Dutch; which tacking saved the rest of the fleet, by giving them opportunity to make their escape. However, the loss was very considerable, and fell hardest on the Dutch; for, besides four of the greatest Smyrna ships and one Dutch man of war, which Monsieur Coetlogon burnt or sunk at Gibraltar, and seven, which he took, Monsieur D'Estrees took two Dutch men of war, burnt a rich pinnace and an English man of war, took twenty-nine merchant-men, and destroyed about fifty more. The French, instead of following Rooke to the Maderas, tried what they could do upon Cadiz, but found that it was not practicable. They came next to Gibraltar, where the merchants, terrified at the bombs thrown among them, sunk their ships to prevent their falling in their hands. From thence they sailed along the coast of Spain, and burnt some English and Dutch ships at Malaga, Alicant, and other places. They hoped to have destroyed the Spanish fleet; but they put in at Port Mahon where they were safe. At length, after a glorious campaign the French came back to Toulon. Thus the voyage was quite lost, and the disgrace of it was visible to the whole world, and very sensible to the trading part of the nation.

The appearances were such, that it was generally surmised, our counsels were betrayed. The Secretary, that attended on the Admirals, was much suspected, and charged with many things: But the suspicions rose high, even as to the Secretary of State's office. It was said, that our fleet was kept in port, till the French were laid in their way, and was then ordered to fail, that it might fall into their hands; Many particulars were laid together, which had such colours, that it was not to be wondered at, if they created jealousy, especially in minds sufficiently prepared for it. Upon enquiry it appeared, that several of those, who, for the last two years, were put in the subaltern employments, through the Kingdom, did upon many occasions shew a disaffection to the Government, and talked and acted like enemies. Our want of intelligence of the motions of the French, while they seemed to know every thing that we either did, or designed to do, cast a heavy reproach upon

(1) The following letter, written by Captain Littleton, Commander of the Smyrna-factor man of war from Cadiz, contains some particulars of this unfortunate affair, not mentioned in other accounts.

"The 26th of June, N. S. says he, at nine in the morning, we arrived to the height of Cape Vincent. About two in the afternoon the head-moſt failors discovered the French, and about four in the afternoon both sides engaged for some time. After this the head-moſt retired, and gave notice the same evening to the officer in chief. The 27th in the morning we arrived near Lagos, and our ships took a fire-ship of the enemy's, which reported, that there were at Lagos eighteen French men of war, with some fire-ships and merchant-men. About four in the morning two ships blew up, or else the enemy set them on fire themselves, within cannon-shot of the convoy. The Commander also gave the signal of drawing into a line of battle; for till then we defied no more than nine and twenty sail of the enemies. There was no wind stirring till ten o'clock, at which time a fresh gale arose, and then we discovered a greater number of ships. The convoy also steering southward perceived on the one side forty sail under three flags, beside another Squadron, which endeavoured to get between us and the coasts; which the Admiral observing, gave notice to the merchant-men to make all the sail they could for the port of Cadiz, while the men of war kept the enemy in play. This design was observed by the French, who made all the sail they could to intercept us. But the convoy, having the wind, kept the enemy in play till the evening, and gave time to the nimbleſt failors to get hither. Towards five in the afternoon the eighteen French men of war abovementioned engaged the convoy, and the fight lasted some part of the beginning of the night, the rest of the fleet not being able to come up with them. The 28th in the morning the fight began with greater fury, so that about seven o'clock our vessels saw four ships on fire, not knowing whether French or English, and the guns were heard till nine, though the event be not yet known. It is to be feared we have lost some men of war, and several merchants. The engagement happened about six miles from Cape St. Mary."

After having given an account of this misfortune from our own writers, let us now hear what the French say to it: "The English and Dutch, says Father Daniel, sustaining every day great losses from the French privateers, and more particularly by those of St. Malo, had resolved to secure their Smyrna fleet from any insult; by putting it under a convoy of two and twenty men of war. Advice of this precaution being carried to the King of France, his Majesty ordered the Marshal de Tourville to sail with sixty ships, towards the coast of Portugal, and then way-lay the Smyrna fleet. Their scouts discovered it a few days afterwards; but, as they had information, the English were at sea with a fleet of ninety men of war, which had been seen on the coast of France, the Marshal, who was not yet joined by the Toulon Squadron, consisting of thirty ships, under the Count d'Estrees, thought fit to detach twenty of his best failors, to take a view of the English fleet, and to begin the attack, if they did not find them much more numerous than themselves; whilst he would back them with the body of his fleet. They executed the orders given them, and took, at the beginning of the attack, two men of war; after which they burnt, sunk, or ran a-ground upon the coast sixty merchant-ships; seven and twenty were taken, and the remainder, which could not make their way for England, took refuge at St. Lucar, Cadiz and Gibraltar. The Marquis de Coetlogon, Commander of a Squadron, burnt four ships very richly laden at Gibraltar, 1693. upon our Ministers, who were now broke in pieces, that they acted without union or concert: Every one studied to justify himself, and to throw the blame on others: A good share of this was cast on the Earl of Nottingham, the Marquis of Caermarthen was not exempted: The Earl of Rochester began now to have credit with the Queen; and seemed to be so violently set against the Whigs, that they looked for dreadful things from him, if he came again to govern: For, being naturally warm, and apt to heat himself in company, he broke out into sallies, which were carried about, and began to create jealousies, even of the Queen herself.

But, while France was thus triumphing every where over the Allies, she had a more dangerous enemy to encounter within her own bowels, famine. This was occasioned by two bad harvests that came successively one after the other. They had also suffered much in their vintage, so that they had neither bread nor wine. Great diligence was used to bring in corn from all parts; and the famous Dubart seasonably brought great quantities from Sweden and Denmark, which he safely conveyed into the harbour of Fréjus. Strict orders were given by the Court for regulating the price of corn, and furnishing the markets with it. There was also a liberal contribution ordered by the French King for the relief of the poor. But, after all possible care to alleviate the misery, great multitudes perished for want; and the whole Kingdom fell under an extreme poverty: So that all the pomp of their victories could not make them easy at home. They tried all possible methods for bringing about a general peace; or, if that failed, for a separate peace, with some of the Confederates: But there was no disposition in any to hearken to them, nor could they engage the northern Crowns to offer their mediation. Some steps were indeed taken, and a memorial was presented to King William, by the Dutch Minister, wherein some offer was made, not only to the Empire, Spain, and Portugal; but likewise to England: But, as the demands of the French were still so high, that there was no prospect of a just peace, these offers were rejected.

Affairs

"and carried off thirteen, though they were defended by the batteries of the place, and an esplanade. If a greater number of men of war had taken the same course by night, as the Sieurs de Bellisle, Errard, de Chaland, and d'Henri, the English and Dutch would have sustained a far greater loss; though, as it was, it amounted, according to the relations of the Captains of ships, who were taken, to above twenty millions of livres." Monsieur de Forbin, who was in the action, gives us the following account of it in his Memoirs: "The King of France's fleet, which consisted of seventy-five men of war, commanded by the Marshal de Tourville, set sail for the freights of Gibraltar, where the Count d'Efrees, who was coming with twenty other ships from Provence, was to join them. They came to anchor in the road of Lagos on the coast of Portugal. I was sent out for intelligence, with orders strictly to examine whatever came to my view; and particularly, if I saw a great number of ships, I was to make it my business to discover, whether they were merchant-men, or the enemy's ships of force. I was accompanied with three other Captains, who were sent on the same errand. We set sail together, and in a few days we discovered a fleet of the enemy's merchant-men. We found they consisted of upwards of a hundred and fifty sail, of which being well assured, we returned with all possible haste to the fleet, to inform the Admiral, that it was a fleet of merchant-men, and not men of war. Upon this advice the Admiral made ready for sailing, and stretched out (for what reason I am at a loss to say) before the wind, to ten leagues distance. The next day our whole fleet discovered the enemy. The Admiral gave orders for the chase, but the enemy took the advantage of the wind which our working the night before had made us lose, and made off, in so much, that we did them very little damage. We took nevertheless two of their men of war of sixty guns; and about thirty of their merchant-ships, which ran a-ground on the coast of Portugal, were burnt; I burnt three of them myself, and took a fourth. It was happy for them, that they came off so well; for, had it not been for the false step I just mentioned, their whole fleet would have been lost."

(1) This memorial was as follows:

S I R,

London, Decemb. 19. O. S. 1693.

The desolation this present war carries into most parts of Europe, together with the duty incumbent on a Christian King, to apply all the remedies, that lie in his power, to so general a calamity, oblige the King of

Denmark, my Master, to impart to your Majesty those proposals of peace, which the most Christian King has communicated to him. My Master might have reason to decline his offers towards the peace of Europe, and taking upon him so important a business, as to advance he has already made, as well as the King of Sweden, have not only proved ineffectual, but likewise been so miscontrived, as to render them suspected. Nevertheless, it is most evident, that without any prospect of private interest (the union of the northern crowns, for the security of the trade of their respective subjects, being so well established, and enjoying the privileges of neutrality, that the continuation of the war might very much increase the riches of their Majesties dominions) the public welfare of Europe, and the desire to see a just and lasting peace, have prevailed above all other considerations. Wherefore the King, my Master, has represented in the most Christian King, that the proposals, which he has made hitherto towards a general peace, have been looked upon by the Confederates rather as a means to disunite them, and to crush and subdue them one after another, than as a mark of his sincere intentions of settling the public repose. But his most Christian Majesty, to remove all manner of distrust, has not only, by repeated protestations, assured the King my Master of the sincerity of his sentiments in this affair, but has likewise delivered a project of a general peace, and added to the conditions, that concern the Empire, and which are already known to your Majesty, some others relating to the rest of the Allies, which are comprehended in the following heads:

I. That, notwithstanding the advantages his arms have gained this campaign, no alterations shall be made in the conditions his most Christian Majesty has already offered to the Emperor, the Princes and States of the Empire, and the Dukes of Lorraine and Savoy.

II. His Majesty shall restore to the Catholic King the important place of Roset, that of Belvers, and whatever has been conquered in Catalonia during the present war.

III. Towards the forming a barrier in the Lower Countries, which may remove all jealousy and uneasiness from the States of Holland, his most Christian Majesty shall, upon that consideration, restore the places of Mons and Namur to the King of Spain, and cause Charlroy to be razed.

IV. His said Majesty shall restore to the Bishop of Lige the town and castle of Hur, and recompense him for Dinant and Bouillon, by annexing upon that account to his Bishoprick such a portion of the country of Luxembourg, as shall be determined to that Bishop, and judged equivalent by arbitrators.

V. I.

1693. Affairs in Scotland grew more and more out of joint. Many, whom the King had trusted in the Ministry there, were thought enemies to him and his Government; and some took so little care to conceal their inclinations, that, when an invasion was looked for, they seemed resolved to join in it. They were taken out of a plot, which was managed by persuading many to take oaths to the Government, on design to betray it; and were now trusted with the most important posts. The Presbyterians began to see their error, in driving matters so far, and in provoking the King so much; and they seemed desirous to recover his favour, and to manage their matters with more temper. The King came likewise to see, that he had been a little too sudden in trusting some, who did not deserve his confidence. Duke Hamilton had for some years withdrawn from business; but he was now prevailed with to return to Council; many letters were intercepted between France and Scotland: In those from Scotland, the easiness of engaging that nation was often repeated, if no time were lost; it seemed therefore necessary to bring that Kingdom into a better state.

Proceedings of the Parliament of Scotland.
A Session of Parliament was held there *, which, on the 18th of April, was opened with a speech by the Duke of Hamilton, his Majesty's Commissioner, and another by the Earl of Tweeddale, the Lord Chancellor of that Kingdom; after which the King's letter was read, which exhorted that Assembly to union; to which letter they returned a very dutiful answer. On the 25th of that month, the Committee, appointed to consider of the security of the nation, voted, that four new regiments of foot, and two of horse, should be immediately raised, to make up the forces then subsisting in that Kingdom six thousand men, without reckoning those on the English establishment; and that for maintaining them, and defraying other public expences, a supply should be given their Majesties of 114,000 l. sterling, to be raised in eighteen months. The Parliament was engaged the same day in a debate about their absent Members; and as it appeared, that several had never come to the House since the Convention had been turned into a Parliament, and had neither taken the oath of fidelity to their Majesties, nor the Assurance (which latter was an abjuration of the late King James) it was resolved and declared, that their places were void; that new elections should be made in their stead; and that fines should be set upon those absentees. With regard to other Members, who had taken the oath of fidelity, but not the Assurance, they were summoned to appear in Parliament by the 15th of May, and to take the Assurance; and, in default thereof, to be dealt with as the others. And lastly, as the heretors or free-holders of the shire of Angus, out of their disaffection to the Government, had hitherto refused to chuse Members to be sent to Parliament, it was resolved, that the said heretors should be cited before the Parliament on the 15th of May, to shew why they had omitted to chuse their Members.

Secretary Johnston likewise laid before a private Committee an information, which he had received,

V. His Majesty consents, that the treaty of commerce made at Nimwegen with the States be renewed without any alteration.

VI. His Majesty thinks the States of Holland will be glad to obtain such important restitutions, and to put an end to the war by a peace so advantageous both to Spain and all the Allies, especially after the prosperous campaigns of France, which may be still attended with others no less successful. But that neither Holland, nor any other State of Europe, may have any ground of apprehension, that, upon pretence of new rights his Majesty will extend the boundaries of his dominions in the Low-Countries, beyond what shall be regulated by the treaty, his Majesty declares, that, in case the King of Spain dies without issue, he consents, that the Low-Countries fall to the share of the Duke of Bavaria, upon condition, that the Emperor makes the same declaration. And his Majesty shall, as well for himself, as for the Dauphin his son, confirm the said renunciation by all the formalities necessary for that purpose, in behalf of his Electoral Highness.

His most Christian Majesty hopes, that this last engagement will, more than any thing besides, secure to the Confederates the firmness of the peace they shall make with him. And he thinks, that, after so advantageous proposals, the world will soon know, whether Europe may hope to see the public tranquillity restored, or whether the preparations of war are to be renewed.

This, Sir, is what the most Christian King has communicated to the King, my Master, and which his Majesty has commanded me to impart to you. He does in no manner pretend to prescribe rules to your Majesty, since your prudence will best judge what is most for your glory and interest; but however, he thinks these proposals deserve a serious consideration. And, because there is no mention made of England, the King, my Master, has made it already his business to incline the most Christian King not to insist upon that, which might put a stop to the general peace. In the mean time, the King, my Master, thinks it necessary.

ry, that, in order to advance a work so profitable and beneficial to all Europe, a negotiation be set on foot. And his Majesty is the more confirmed in this opinion, by reason the winter will soon be over, and that it is to be feared, left by laying till the next campaign an opportunity be given to France, either of enlarging her conquests, or by a powerful irruption into Germany, and the superiority of her forces, to divide the Confederacy; which would give a just pretence to that crown of recalling the offers she has already made, and render a peace very difficult, if not altogether impossible. The King, my Master, does not only offer to become guarantee with all the Princes and Potentates, that will concur with him, but likewise to unite himself in particular with your Majesty by a most strict and indissoluble alliance.

Upon the whole matter, the King, my Master, is persuaded, that nobody has more reason to contribute to this peace, than your Majesty, since it will confirm to you the glory and advantages you have gained during the war; and will besides make Europe to be eternally beholden to your Majesty for the peace the groans after. If your Majesty thinks, that there is any thing defective, in relation to the security of the peace, or that wants to be either altered or explained, the King, my Master, engages to procure to your Majesty all the satisfaction imaginable; and, if you are pleased to confide in his mediation, he will manage it to your Majesty's entire satisfaction. Lastly, the King, my Master, has commanded me to assure your Majesty, that, being, upon several accounts, concerned in the prosperity of your Royal Family, he will, to the utmost of his power, promote its interest and advantage, and desires your Majesty to be persuaded, that all the advances he has made in this affair have no other aim, and are grounded upon no other principle.

* These proceedings are taken from MS. original letters of Mr. James Vernon (Under-Secretary to Sir John Trenchard, Secretary of State) to Sir William Dutton Colt, Envoy extraordinary at Hanover.

1692. ceived, of dangerous practices against the Government, and how the late endeavours to alter the Magistracy of Edinburgh were concerted by the enemies of the Government; and he produced proofs of the same, and of the designed invasion the last year.

The Scots Parliament proceeded to augment their tax, so as to proportion it to the maintenance of six thousand three hundred men; to supply the magazines of the Kingdom with arms and stores, and to satisfy the country for their arrears of quarters; so that the whole sum then given amounted to 156,000*l.* sterling, to be raised in eighteen months, upon these branches, viz. 48,000*l.* by a poll, 45,000*l.* by an excise upon beer and malt, and by continuing the Cess upon land, which was then to last seven months and an half, to ten months and an half beyond that term, 63,000*l.*

The Committee for the security of the Kingdom, who had before them several intercepted letters and papers, relating to dangerous designs and practices against the peace of the Kingdom, having made their report to the Parliament, it was resolved, that there were sufficient proofs to evince, that a design was carried on both there and in France, for invading the nation with foreign force; and that, in order thereunto, there were established correspondencies and concerts; and that assurances had been given both at home and abroad, for effecting such a design, which had lately proceeded so far, that declarations were concerted for that purpose, and the raising of men, and naming of officers to command them, were resolved; as also reconciliations made amongst the different parties of the disaffected; and the proofs were plain, that the late King James's interest was at the bottom of the late debates concerning the elections at Edinburgh; with regard to which, King James had been desired to interpose his authority by letters. In the debate of this vote it was endeavoured to divide it into questions, and to separate the latter part, which related to the Magistracy of Edinburgh, from the former part of designs in general; but, the House reserving that upon the previous questions by three to one, the main question was carried without any division.

The whole Presbyterian party in Scotland was now again intire in the King's interest. The matters of the Church were brought to more temper than was expected. The Episcopal Clergy had more moderate terms offered them; they were only required to make an address to the General Assembly, offering to subscribe to a confession of faith, and to acknowledge Presbytery to be the only government of that Church, with a promise to submit to it; upon which, within a fortnight after they did that, if no manner of scandal was objected to them, the Assembly was either to receive them into the government of the Church, or, if they could not be brought to that, the King was to take them into his protection, and maintain them in their churches, without any dependance upon the Presbytery. This was a strain of moderation, that the Presbyterians were not easily brought to. A subscription, that owned Presbytery to be the only legal government of that Church, without owning any divine right in it, was far below their usual pretensions. And this act vested the King with an Authority very like that, which they used to condemn as Erastianism.

Another act was also passed, requiring all persons in any office of the Church or State to take, besides the oath of allegiance, a declaration called the Assurance, owning the King and Queen to be their rightful and lawful Sovereigns, and promising fidelity to them against King James and all his adherents. This Council was also empowered to tender these, as they should see cause for it, and to fine and imprison such as should refuse them.

When the Session was near an end, Nevil Payne was brought before the Parliament to be examined, upon the many letters, which had been intercepted. There was a full evidence against him in many of his own letters; but he sent word to several of the Lords, and in particular to the Duke of Hamilton, that, as long as his life was his own, he would accuse none; but that he was resolved he would not die, since he could deliver enough to clear his person. This struck such a terror into many of them, whose sons and near relations had been concerned with him, that, he moving for a delay, on a pretence of some witnesses, who were not then at hand, a time was given him beyond the continuance of the Session; by which he escaped, and that inquiry was suppressed.

The Session ended calmly; but the King seemed to have forgot Scotland so intirely, that he let three months go over, before he took notice of any of their petitions. And though he had asked, and had supplies for an augmentation of forces, and many had been gained to consent to the tax by the hope of Commissions in the troops, that were levied, yet the King did not raise any new ones, but applied the supply to other uses. This began to raise an ill humour, which had been almost quite laid aside in the whole course of this Session, which was thought a reconciling one. The Episcopal Clergy let slip the day prefixed for making their submission to the Assembly, and did not take the oaths; for which reason they could claim no benefit by the acts that had been carried in their favour, not without some difficulty. And the law, which was intended to save them, did now expose them to ruin, since by it they, not taking the oaths, had lost their legal rights to their benefices. However, they were suffered to continue in them, and were put in hope, that the King would protect them, though it was now against law. They were also made to believe, that the King did not desire, that they should take the oaths, or make any submission to Presbytery. And it is certain, that no public signification of his Majesty's mind was made to them; so that they were easily imposed upon by furnishes and whispers; and upon this the distractions grew up afresh. Many concluded there, as well as in England, that the King's heart led him still to court his enemies, even after all the manifest reasons, which he had to conclude, that the steps they had made towards him were only feigned submissions to gain such a confidence, as might put it in their power to deliver him up.

The Earl of Middleton had gone over to France in the beginning of this year; and it was believed, that he was sent by a great number of men, with a proposition, which, had he had the assurance to have made, and the Court of St. Germain's the wisdom to have accepted, would have been very serviceable to the King's affairs.

1693. lousies of the nation. It was, that King James should offer to resign his title in favour of his son; and likewise to send him to be bred up in England, under the direction of a Parliament, till he should be of age. But it is not known, whether the Earl ever ventured upon this advice; but in another he succeeded better. When King James thought the invasion from Normandy, the former year, was so well laid, that he seemed not to apprehend it could miscarry, he had prepared a declaration, of which some copies were brought over. He promised nothing in it, and pardoned no body by it, but spoke in the stile of a Conqueror, who thought he was Master, and therefore would limit himself by no promises, but such as were conceived in general words, which might be afterwards expounded at pleasure. This was much blamed, even by his own party, who thought, that they themselves were not enough secured by so loose a declaration; and therefore the Earl of Middleton, upon his going over, procured one of another strain, which, as far as words could go, gave all content; for King James promised every thing, and pardoned all persons. His party got this into their hands, and they waited for a fit occasion to publish it to the nation.

Affairs of Ireland.
Burnet.
Kennet.

A Parliament had been summoned in Ireland, by the Lord Sidney; but they met full of discontent, and were disposed to find fault with every thing: And there was too much matter to work upon; for the Lord Lieutenant was apt to excuse and justify those, who had the address, to insinuate themselves into his favour: So that they were dismissed, before they had brought their bills to perfection. The English in Ireland thought the Government favoured the Irish too much; some said, this was the effect of bribery, whereas others, thought it was necessary to keep them safe, from the persecutions of the English, who hated them, and were much sharpened against them. The protecting the Irish was indeed in some sort necessary, to keep them from breaking out, or running over to the French; but it was very plain, that the Irish were still enemies to the English nation, and to the present Government: So that all kindness shewed them, beyond what was due in strict justice, was the cherishing an inveterate enemy. There were also great complaints of an ill administration, chiefly in the revenue, in the pay of the army, and in the embezzeling of stores. Of these, much noise was made in England, which (as has been related) drew addresses from both Houses of Parliament to the King, which were invidiously, penned; every particular being severely aggravated. Upon this the King recalled the Lord Sidney, (who was made Master of the Ordnance) and put the government of Ireland into three Lords Justices: Lord Capel, Sir Cyril Wyche, and Mr. William Duncomb, who had lately been Envoy Extraordinary in Sweden. When they were sent from Court, the Queen did very earnestly recommend to their care, the reforming of many disorders, that were prevailing in that Kingdom: For neither had the late destructive war, out of which they were but beginning to recover themselves, nor their poverty, produced those effects that might have been expected.

July. 10. The Queen taking into consideration, that the great scarcity and excessive price of corn in France invited the exportation of it from this Kingdom thither, whereby not only her enemies were supplied, but her own subjects might be exposed to want; she issued out a proclamation for preventing the exportation of corn to France, and enhancing the price of it at home; and, because by this further command the poor were like to become sufferers, she at the same time ordered all the laws in force for setting them at work to be effectually put in execution.

In October, the King arrived at the Hague from Loon, and prevailed with the States of Holland to agree to the raising of fifteen thousand men for augmenting the land-forces; and likewise to the addition of a considerable number of ships to their navy; for which he thanked them in their public assembly. The King, having waited almost a month for a fair wind, embarked at last on the 28th of October, landed at Harwich the 29th, and on the 30th arrived at Kensington. The Parliament being met on the 7th of November, pursuant to the last prorogation, the King made the following speech to both Houses:

"My Lords and Gentlemen,

"I Am always glad to meet you here, and I could heartily wish, that our satisfaction were not lessened at present, by reflecting upon the disadvantages we have received this year at land, and the miscarriages in our affairs at sea. I think it is evident, that the former was only occasioned by the great number of our enemies, which exceeded ours in all places. For what relates to the latter, which has brought so great a disgrace upon the nation, I have repented it extremely, and as I will take care, that those, who have not done their duty, shall be punished, so I am resolved to use my utmost endeavours, that our power at sea may be rightly managed for the future. And it will well deserve your consideration, whether we are not defective both in the number of our shippings, and in proper ports to the westward, for the better annoying our enemies, and protecting our trade, which is so essential to the welfare of this kingdom.

"My Lords and Gentlemen,

"I am very sensible of the good affection, wherewith you have always assisted me to support the charges of the war, which have been very great; and yet I am persuaded, that the experience of this summer is sufficient to convince us all, that, to arrive at a good end of it, there will be a necessity of increasing our forces both by sea and land the next year. Our Allies have resolved to add to theirs; and I will not doubt, but you will have such regard to the present exigency, as that you will give me a suitable supply to enable me to do the like. I must therefore earnestly recommend it to you, Gentlemen of the House of Commons, to take such timely resolutions, as that your supplies may be effectual, and our preparations so forward, as will be necessary both for the security and the honour of the nation."

In answer to this speech the Commons unanimously resolved, that they would support their Majesties and their Government, and grant a sufficient

1693; sufficient supply for the vigorous prosecution of the war. But the first thing they did was to inquire into the miscarriages of the fleet the last summer, and to take into their consideration the preservation of the trade of the nation. Some time having been spent in examining the instructions and orders given to the fleet; the number of ships for the line of battle, and of the convoys and cruizers; the Admirals, who commanded both, and the results of the several Councils of war held by them; the Commons resolved, on the 17th of November, "that it was their opinion, that there had been a notorious and treacherous mismanagement in the miscarriage of the Smyrna fleet." Their next inquiry was, "Why the Streights fleet was stopped till the main fleet went out?" and "then, Why the main fleet did not convoy Sir George Rooke's squadron, and the merchant-ships, out of danger of the French?" And it being alledged, that the main fleet was not sufficiently victualled, the Commons examined the State of the victualling the fleet at its sailing from Spithead, and thereupon resolved, on the 27th of November, "That there was sufficient beer on board the main fleet, when Sir George Rooke separated, to have convoyed his squadron, and the merchant-ships out of danger of the Brest fleet." Two days after the question being put, "That it did appear to that House, that the Admiral, that commanded the fleet the last summer, had, on the 11th of May last, information, that part of the Brest fleet was going out to sea," it passed in the negative. And on the 6th of December another question being put, "That the Admirals, by not sending into Brest, for intelligence, before they left the Streights squadron, were guilty of a high breach of the trust, that was reposed in them, to the great loss and dishonour of the nation," it was likewise carried in the negative by a hundred and eighty-five against a hundred and seventy-five.

The House of Lords likewise took into consideration this affair, and after hearing the Admirals, and reading the letters and orders in relation to it, resolved, on the 10th of January, "that the Admirals, who commanded the fleet last summer, had done well in the execution of the orders they received;" though some Lords entered their protest (1). There was likewise a conference between the two Houses upon the same subject (2).

Before this inquiry in Parliament, the Admirals had been examined at the Council-board; but nothing could be made to appear to the prejudice of their honour, only some flying reports, which gave occasion to this order of Council

(1) It was as follows:

1. Whereas by an order of the Admiralty, bearing date the 19th of May last, the Admirals were to direct Sir George Rooke, that, after their parting with him, he should steer such a course for his passage to Cádiz, as should be thought most safe by a Council of war, with relation as well to the Brest fleet, if gone out to sea, as the Toulon squadron; it does not appear to us, that there has been any Council of war from the 22d of May to the 4th of June, which was the day the signals were given for their parting from the Streights fleet; which last Council of war was not called till after the signals for parting were given, and occasioned by the accident of the Turky fleet's being becalmed.

2. That though it does appear by the result of the Council of war the 4th of June, that they had no intelligence where the enemy was; yet notwithstanding we do not find in that Council, it was so much as proposed, how to get intelligence where the Brest fleet was, pursuant to the order of the Admiralty of the 19th.

3. We conceive it to be the duty of an Admiral or General to use his utmost endeavours to discover the motions of an enemy, without an order from his superiors, and much more when he has one.

4. Their not sending one or more good failors to find out, if the French fleet were sailed from Brest, as also what course they steered, so as to give intelligence to our main fleet, at a station appointed, before they parted with Sir George Rooke, was, as we conceive, the chief cause of the misfortune, that happened to the Turky fleet.

5. It appears by the Admiral's own letters to the Admiralty of the 14th of July and 18th of September last, that, at a Council of war held on the 22d of May, they were of opinion, that that part of the Admiralty's order of the 19th, which related to the course Sir George Rooke was to steer, was unreasonable and impracticable; yet they did not send up to have it explained, though the fleet did not sail till the 30th. This looks as if they rather designed an artificial excuse for doing nothing, than the discharge of the trust reposed in them.

6. That Sir George Rooke's narrative, which might have given a farther light to the inquiry into the Admiral's conduct last summer, was not allowed to be read.

7. This vote seems to approve of the behaviour of the Admirals in the last summer's expedition, which differs, as we conceive, from the opinion the greatest part of Europe has of it, and may be of ill consequence, by giving our Allies no very fair prospect of better success.

8. Because by this vote is prevented any further inquiry into the last year's miscarriage relating to the Admirals, if any new matter should arise from new evidence; and it may stop any prosecution of the King's, in case he should think fit to proceed further in this affair.

(2) On the 16th of January a conference having been desired by the Lords, Colonel Granville reported from the Committee appointed to attend it, that the Duke of Devon managed for the Lords, and acquainted them, that the Lords having had laid before them by the Earl of Nottingham an extract of a letter dated from Paris June 1st N. S. received May the 30th O. S. 1693, as follows:

"There are sixty-eight ships, in which there are thirty thousand one hundred and eighteen men, and four thousand eight hundred and seventy-six guns."

"We have news since, that this fleet was sailed, and was out of sight."

And whereas upon an address to the King, that such Lords, as are of the Privy-council, may have permission from his Majesty to acquaint the House; when the intelligence of the French fleet's sailing from Brest was communicated to the Admirals of the fleet:

Thereupon several of those Lords informed the House, that the said letter was laid before the Committee of the Council; and, that it was taken for granted, that the intelligence therein was sent to the Admirals of the fleet; but it not appearing clearly, whether it was so communicated or not, their Lordships desired of the House of Commons to inquire, by the most proper methods of the Members of that House,

693. Council on the 25th of October: "Whereas a report has been raised and spread by Henry Killigrew, Sir Ralph Delaval, and Sir Cloudesty Shovel, Admirals of their Majesties fleet, that the Right Honourable the Lord Viscount Falkland, one of the Lords of their Majesties most Honourable Privy-council, did, upon reading a paper at the board, stifle something, that was material to their justification, the Lords of the Council having considered of, and examined into the matter, are satisfied, and do declare, that the said report is false and scandalous; although, upon the said examination it did also appear, that something happened, which might mislead the Admirals into that error. And it is ordered in Council, that this be printed and published in the Gazette." (1)

A bill for the more frequent elections of Parliament having, after the third reading, been rejected by the Commons on the 28th of November, another bill to the same purpose was sent down to them by the Lords, which being read the third time, was likewise rejected.

Supplies.

The Commons, having unanimously voted a supply for the vigorous prosecution of the war, agreed, on the 25th of November, "that the sum of 500,000*l.* be raised towards the discharging the wages due to the seamen; and that a farther sum of two millions be granted to their Majesties, in full, for the maintenance of the fleet, including the ordnance, by reason of the revenue now falling short." As for the army, the Commons, having examined the offensive treaties and alliances, which the King was now under with the Confederates, and the proportions of forces that the Confederates were obliged to make for the carrying on this present war, unanimously resolved, on the 20th of December, That the number of the land-forces in their Majesties pay be increased, by the raising six new regiments of English horse, four new regiments of English dragoons, and fifteen new regiments of English foot, to be commanded by officers, who were their Majesties natural born subjects: That eighty-three thousand one hundred and twenty-one men, including commission and non-commission officers, were necessary for the service of the year 1694, to be employed in England, and beyond the seas: And that the sum of two millions, five hundred and thirty-five thousand, five hundred and ninety pounds be granted for the maintenance of the land-forces (2). They also gave 118,000*l.* to make good the annuity deficiency, and 293,692*l.* to make good the deficiency of the poll-bill. Thus the supplies, given for the service of the year 1694, amounted to near five millions and a half, which were raised by a land-tax of four shillings in the pound, by two more lives in the annuities, by a further excise on beer, and a duty upon salt (3).

The

House, who were of the Privy-council, whether this intelligence, of the French fleet's being sailed out of Brest, was communicated to the said Admirals, and when it was so communicated. Accordingly an humble address was voted, that his Majesty would be pleased to command, that a copy of the said letter might be laid before the House; and likewise that his Majesty would permit such Members of the House, as were of his Privy-council, to acquaint the House what intelligence was received of the French fleet's sailing from Brest, and whether, and when the said intelligence was communicated to the said Admirals.

On the 10th of February, Mr. Secretary Trenbald, according to order, presented to the House of Commons an account in writing of the said letter and intelligence; viz. that he believed, the Earl of Nottingham did, on May 31, bring to a Committee of Council a letter from Paris, dated June 1. N.S. and received May 30. O. S. an extract of which the Lords had communicated to the House; but he did not remember, that this letter was publicly read at the Committee, though several Lords might read it singly; but that, it remained in the hands of the Earl of Nottingham, there being no resolution taken at the said Council, that the said letter should be communicated to the Admirals of the fleet. That, to the best of his remembrance, a list of the French fleet, being part of the said letter, was the same day sent to him by the Earl of Nottingham; a copy of which list he sent to the Admirals, as appeared by comparing it with the papers delivered by them into the House. That the same day there came a letter from Scilly, dated May 7th, with advice, that the French fleet was seen off that Island; which letter being publicly read at the Committee, a copy thereof, together with the abovementioned list, was immediately by two express sent to the Admirals of the fleet, and were received by them. It was resolved therefore by the House of Commons, that the same be communicated to the Lords at a conference; which was done accordingly. But it does not appear, that it was attended with any extraordinary consequences.

(1) Bishop Burnet says, The enquiry into the conduct at sea, particularly, with relation to the Smyrna fleet, took up much time, and held long: Great exceptions were taken to the many delays; by which it seemed a train was laid, that they should not get out of our ports, till the French were ready to lie in their way, and intercept them; our want of intelligence was much complained of: The instructions that the Admirals, who commanded the fleet, had received from the Cabinet Council, were thought ill given, and yet worse executed; their orders seemed weakly drawn, ambiguous, and defective: Nor had they shewed any zeal in doing more, than strictly to obey such orders: They had very cautiously kept within them, and had been very careful never to exceed them in a tittle: They had used no diligence to get certain information, concerning the French fleet, whether it was still in Brest, or had sailed out; but, in that important matter, they had trusted general and uncertain reports too easily: Nor had they failed with Rossie, till he was past danger. To all this their answer was, That they had observed their orders; they had reason to think, the French were still in Brest; that therefore it was not safe to sail too far from the coast of England, when they had (as they understood) ground to believe, that they had left behind them a great naval force, which might make an impression on our coast, when they were at too great a distance from it; the getting certain intelligence from Brest, was represented as impracticable. They had many specious things to say in their own defence, and many friends to support them; for it was now the business of one party to accuse, and of another to justify that conduct. In conclusion, there was not ground sufficient to condemn the Admirals; as they had followed their instructions: So a vote passed in their favour. II. 125.

(2) Namely, 210,773*l.* for the office of ordnance, 31,808*l.* for the pay of the general officers; 11,060*l.* for levy-money; 40,808*l.* for the transports; 147,000*l.* for hospitals and contingencies; and 1,990,781*l.* for the pay of the horse, dragoons, and foot.

This duty upon liquors was now given for sixteen years; that upon salt for three years. The advances of these duties were to be re-

The King refuses to pass the Place bill
Pr. H. C.
11. 432.

The bill for rendering all members of the House of Commons incapable of places of trust and profit, which had been brought in the last Session, under the title of a bill touching free and impartial proceedings in Parliament, and after passing the Commons had been rejected by the Lords, was now again set on foot, and went through the Lords as well as the Commons; so that when the King came to the House of Peers to pass the land-tax, it lay ready for the Royal assent, but the King thought fit to refuse it. Upon this, the Commons, the next day entering into a grand Committee on the State of the nation, agreed to the following resolution, "That whoever advised the King not to give the Royal assent to the act, which was to redress a grievance, and take off a scandal upon the proceedings of the Commons in Parliament, is an enemy to their Majesties and the Kingdom; and that a representation be made to the King to lay before him, how few instances have been in former reigns of denying the Royal assent to bills for redress of grievances, and the grief of the Commons for his not having given the Royal assent to several public bills, and in particular to this bill, which tends so much to the clearing the reputation of this House, after their having so freely voted to supply the public occasions." And, a Committee being appointed to draw up the representation, it was the day following reported to the House, when the two first paragraphs being exactly conformable to the vote, were agreed to, but the third rejected, which was as follows:

"We beg, Sir, you will be pleased to consider us as answerable to those we represent; and it is from your goodness we must expect arguments to soften to them, in some measure, the necessary hardships they are forced to undergo in this present conjuncture; and therefore humbly beseech your Majesty, for the removing all jealousies from your people, (without which the Parliament will be unable to serve your Majesty, or to support the Government) to be pleased to follow the course of the best of your predecessors, and direct some expedient, whereby your Majesty, your Parliament, and People, may reap the fruit designed by that bill, to which your Majesty, by ill advice, was pleased to lately to deny the Royal assent."

Instead of which the following paragraph was agreed to:

"Upon these considerations we humbly beseech your Majesty to believe, that none can have so great a concern and interest in the prosperity and happiness of your Majesty and your Government, as your two Houses of Parliament; and do therefore humbly pray, that, for the future, you would be graciously pleased to hearken to the advice of your Parliament, and not to the secret advices of particular persons, who may have private interests of their own, separate from the true interest of your Majesty and your People."

To this address, presented by the whole House, the King was pleased to reply:

"Gentlemen, I am very sensible of the good offices you have expressed to me upon many occasions, and the zeal you have shewn for our common interest; I shall make use of this opportunity to tell you, that no Prince ever had a higher esteem for the constitution of the English Government than myself, and that I shall ever have a great regard for the advice of Parliament."

"I am persuaded, that nothing can so much conduce to the happiness and welfare of this Kingdom, as an intire confidence between the King and People, which I shall by all means endeavour to preserve. And, I assure you, I shall look upon such persons, as my enemies, who shall advise any thing, that may lessen it."

However kind this answer appeared, yet, as it was not thought to be direct, the Commons proceeded to take it into consideration, and the question was put, That application be made to his Majesty for a farther answer, but it passed in the negative by two hundred and twenty-nine against twenty-eight.

The East-India Company having, on the 11th of November, 1693, obtained a new charter, whereby they were empowered to raise the sum of seven hundred forty-four thousand pounds, to be added to their general joint-stock, the subscription of each person not exceeding ten thousand pounds; several merchants and others, on the 7th of December, petitioned the Commons for erecting a new East-India Company. Upon which the House examined the charters of the old Company, the book of new subscriptions, the state of their present stock, and the petition above-mentioned, and after mature deliberation resolved, on the 19th of January, "That all the subjects of England have equal right to trade to the East-Indies, unless prohibited by act of Parliament." And this gave occasion to the creating of a new East-India Company, more to the division of the merchants, than to the benefit of trade.

On the 16th of December the Earl of Bellamont having presented to the Commons articles of impeachment against Thomas Lord Coningsby and Sir Charles Porter, two of the late Lords Justices of Ireland, but the Commons after several debates agreed "That, considering the state of affairs in Ireland at that time, the House did not think fit to ground an impeachment against the Lord Coningsby and Sir Charles Porter for the matters charged upon them." Accordingly, the Lord Coningsby and Sir Charles Porter were restored to their places in the House.

The

paid in the sixteen years by way of annuities for that time. A poll-tax was also passed; and an act for granting several rates and duties upon tonnage and poundage of ships and vessels, and upon beer, ale, and other liquors. This excise to be one moiety of the additional excise before granted, and expiring in the year 1697. There was also an act for duties upon vellum, parchment, and paper for four years. The several stamps were, 40 s. 5 s. 2 s. and 6 d. 1 s. 6 d. and 1 d. every sheet or skin used, to be so stamped, and to pay. Another act was for licensing and regulating hackney and stage coaches. By it seven hundred hackney-coaches to be licensed, and 50 l. to be paid for a licence to be good twenty-one years, besides 4 l. a year each coach; stage-coaches to be licensed but for one year, and to pay 8 l. for a licence.

(1) B. F.

1693. The humour of the nation running at this time upon lotteries, some Members of the House of Commons contrived to raise that way a million for the Government. This design having been propoed to and approved by the House, it was resolved, 1. "That a fund of 140,000 l. per annum be raised and vested in their Majesties for the term of sixteen years, for recompensing such persons, as should advance the sum of one million. 2. That the impositions, lately resolved by the House to be laid upon salt, be part of the said fund. 3. That, towards the further answering of the said 140,000 l. per annum, one moiety of the duties of excise, granted to their Majesties, by an act made in the second year of their reign, be granted and continued to their Majesties, after the monies charged upon the said duties should be satisfied. And, 4. that a bill be brought in upon the said resolutions." Which was accordingly done, and the bill received the Royal assent.

While the Commons were debating of the supplies, the Commissioners, whom they had appointed for taking the public accounts, having laid before the House an account of what money had been paid for secret service, and to Members of Parliament, out of the public revenue, it was resolved, "That the Lord Viscount Falkland, a Member of that House, by begging and receiving two thousand pounds from his Majesty, contrary to the ordinary method of issuing and bestowing the King's money, was guilty of a high misdemeanor and breach of trust; and that he be committed to the Tower of London, during the pleasure of the House." He was two days after discharged upon petition.

The King, being impatient for the dispatch of what business lay before the Parliament, came to the House of Peers on the 8th of February, and, passing some bills, made a short speech to both Houses, earnestly recommending to them the finishing of those affairs which they had under their deliberation, and particularly the discharging of the debt for transport-ships, which were used in the reduction of Ireland. All the money-bills being passed, and the King desirous of beginning an early campaign, he came again to the House of Peers on the 25th of April, and closed the Session with this speech:

My Lords and Gentlemen,

"THE proofs you have given of your affection to me, and the zeal you have expressed for the Government, oblige me to return you thanks before I put an end to this Session; and, in particular, to thank you, Gentlemen of the House of Commons, for the large supplies you have provided to carry on the war.

"I will endeavour to do my part; and it is from the blessing of God, that we must all expect such success as may answer our desires.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

"The posture of affairs making it necessary for me to be absent for some time out of this Kingdom, I recommend it to you, that in your several stations you be careful to preserve the public peace."

Then the Lord-Keeper, by his Majesty's command, prorogued the Parliament to the 18th of September following.

The most material acts passed this Session were:

1. An act for repealing a clause in the Statute of 34 and 35 of Henry VIII, by which Justices of the Peace in Wales were limited to eight in each country. By this act as many Justices may be appointed as the King pleases.

2. An act to prevent disputes and controversies concerning Royal mines. By this act, all proprietors of copper, tin, iron, or lead mines, shall hold the same, notwithstanding such mines shall be claimed to be Royal mines. Only the ore of such mines (except tin-ore in Cornwall and Devonshire) may be demanded by the King, and all claiming Royal mines under him, at the following rates: Copper-ore washed, 16 l. the tun. Tin-ore washed, 40 s. the tun. Iron-ore the same. Lead-ore washed, 9 l. the tun. In default of payment, the proprietors may dispose of the ore.

3. An act for the relief of the orphans and other creditors of the city of London. The city, it seems, by reason of sundry accidents and public calamities, being now become indebted to the orphans and other creditors for principal money and interest thereof, in a much greater sum than they were able to pay, the Parliament, on the petition of the Lord Mayor, &c. enabled them, by this act, to settle a fund for raising money, to pay the yearly interest at four per cent. for the whole debt. The fund consists of several branches, particularly, a rent charge of 8000 l. a year, upon all the revenues of the city: 2000 l. a year upon personal estates, within the city: 600 l. a year, out of the profits of the convex-lights: 4 d. a chaldron upon coals: 4 s. a tun upon wines, &c. (1) This bill had miscarried in several Sessions, but now found a very quick passage, through the Commons, the reason of which will but too plainly appear in the next Session of the Parliament.

During the Session, the town was entertained with the trial of a cause in Westminster-Hall, of Norfolk, bearing with impatience the suspected commerce, which Mr. Jermaine had maintained with his Dukes, had the last winter lodged a bill of divorce in the House of Peers; but their Lordships, being unwilling to proceed in that affair before there were some proofs of the facts made in the course of the common law, his Grace thereupon brought an action of adultery against Mr. Jermaine before the Court of King's-Bench. and the Test against popery; a bill concerning the forfeitures both in England and Ireland; a bill for registering of wills, &c. another against stock-jobbers; and another for the encouragement of privateers.

St. Malo bombarded.

Admiral Wheler
capt. Owen
Burchet.

Towards the middle of November, Captain Bombow bombarded St. Malo four days successively, though without any great success, having only destroyed some few houses, and thrown down part of the town-wall. But in the end of February arrived the melancholy news, that a fleet of merchant-ships under a convoy of men of war, commanded by Sir Francis Wheeler (who had been sent the last year on a fruitless expedition to the West-Indies) having sailed on the 17th of that month from Gibraltar, up the Streights, met the next day with a most violent storm, which continued all that day, and the following night, so that on the 19th, about five in the morning, Sir Francis's own ship, the Suffex, was foundered, and himself, with all his men, except two Moors, drowned; the Cambridge and Lunley Castle men of war, the Serpent bomb-ketch, and the Mary ketch, together with the Italian Merchant, the Aleppo Factor, the Great George, and the Berkshire bound for Turky, the William for Venice, and the Golden Merchant for Leghorn, all English, were driven ashore on the East-side of Gibraltar, and most of the men lost. The same fate attended three Dutch ships richly laden; but Rear-Admiral Nesbitt, with two Dutch men of war, had the good fortune to be blown out of the Streights, and put safe into Cadiz; as did the rest of the fleet on the 19th into Gibraltar. This loss, how great soever, was soon after repaired, the King having caused the men of war on the stocks to be finished with extraordinary diligence.

On Sunday, December the 31st, Prince Lewis of Baden arrived at Gravesend, and on Tuesday he came up the river in the King's barge, and was conducted to the apartment prepared for him at Whitehall. His Highness continued in England till the 14th of February, during which time he concerted measures with the King, and was treated with very singular respects, and at a great expence, not only by the King, but also by several Peers, particularly the Duke of Ormond.

On the 22d of November 1693, the King granted to the Earl of Abington the office of Chief Justice in Exchequer on this side of Trent, vacant by the death of the Lord Loxley; and appointed the Lord Viscount Stanley, Master of the ordinance, to be Colonel of the first regiment of foot-guards, in the place of the late Duke Schomberg, in whose room the Duke of St. Albans was sworn Captain of the band of pensioners; and, about the middle of January, the Lord Charles Butler, brother to the Duke of Ormond, was created Lord Butler, Baron of Wexford in the county of Huntingdon, and Earl of Arran in Ireland. Peregrine Bertie was sworn Vice-Chamberlain to his Majesty, upon the resignation of Sir John Lowther; Raigyny, who had been instrumental in the reduction of Ireland, and for his services created Earl of Galway, was, at this time, appointed to command the King's forces in Piedmont in quality of Lieutenant-General, and to be Envoy Extraordinary to the Duke of Savoy. When old Raigyny his father died, he offered his service to the King, who unwillingly accepted of it; because he knew that an estate, which his father had in France, and of which he still had the income, would be immediately confiscated: But he had no regard to that, and heartily engaged in the King's service, and was afterwards employed in many eminent posts, in all which he acquitted himself with great reputation, and was also deemed a man of eminent virtues, great piety and zeal for religion.

When the King returned to England, from the last campaign, he plainly saw the necessity of changing both his Measures and Ministry. He expressed his dislike of the whole conduct at sea, and named Raigyny for the command of the fleet the next year. He dismissed the Earl of Nottingham, and would immediately have brought the Earl of Shrovelbury into the Ministry. But, when that Lord came to him, he thought the King's inclinations were still the same, that they had been for some years, and that the turn, which he was now making, was not from choice, but from force; for which reason his Lordship went into the country. However the King soon after sent for him, and gave him such assurances, that he was again made Secretary of State, to the general satisfaction of the Whigs. But the person, who had the King's confidence to the highest degree, was the Earl of Sunderland, who, by his long experience and his knowledge of men and things, had gained an ascendancy over him, and had more credit with him, than any Englishmen ever had. He had brought the King to this change of counsels, by the prospect, he gave him of the ill condition his affairs would be in, if he did not intirely both trust and satisfy those, who, in the present conjuncture, were the only party, that both could and would support him. It was said, that, the true secret of this change of measures was, that the Tories signified to the King plainly, that they could carry on the war no longer; and that therefore he must accept of such a peace, as could be had. This was the most pernicious thing, that could be thought on, and the most contrary to the King's notions and designs; but, they being positive, he was forced to change hands, and to turn to the other party. So the Whigs were now in favour again, and every thing was done, that was like to put them in good humour. The Commission of the Licutenancy for the city of London, on which they had set their hearts, much more perhaps than it deserved, was to altered, that the Whigs were the superior number; and all other commissions over England were much changed. They were also brought into many places of trust and profit; so that the King put his affairs chiefly into their hands, yet so, that no Tory who had expressed zeal or affection for the Government, was taken out.

The same day the Parliament was prorogued, the King bestowed the title of Duke on the Earl of Shrovelbury; and created the Earl of Mulgrave, Marquis of Normandy, with the grant of a pension of three thousand a year. He was also with the Lord Down, on the 3d of May, of the Privy Council. At the same time Henry Lovett was made Baron Lowest of Chertsey in the County of Surrey.

1694. ward Ruffel, Sir George Rooke, and Sir John Houblon, were appointed three of the Commissioners of the Admiralty. On the 30th of April, the Marquis of Caermarthen was created Duke of Leeds; William Earl of Bedford Marquis of Tavistock, and Duke of Bedford; William Earl of Devonshire, Marquis of Hartington and Duke of Devonshire; John Earl of Clare, Marquis of Clare, and Duke of Newcastle; Francis Lord Newport, Treasurer of their Majesties Household, Earl of Bradford in the county of Salop; and Lord Vilcount Sydney, Lord Warden of the Cinque Ports, Earl of Romney in the county of Kent. On the 2d of May, Sidney Lord Godolphin, Sir Stephen Fox, Charles Montague, Sir William Trumbull, and John Smith, were appointed Commissioners of the Treasury. Mr Montague, a branch of the Earl of Manchester's family, had begun, though a young man, to make a great figure in the House of Commons. He was not only made Commissioner of the Treasury, but soon after Chancellor and Under-Treasurer of the Exchequer. He had great vivacity and clearness, both of thought and expression: His spirit was at first turned to wit and poetry, which he continued still to encourage in others, when he applied himself to more important business. He came to have great notions, with relation to all the concerns of the Treasury, and of the public funds, and brought those matters into new and better methods: He shewed the error of giving money upon remote funds, at a vast discount, and with great premiums to raise loans upon them; which occasioned a great outcry, at the sums that were given, at the same time that they were much shrunk, before they produced the money, that was expected from them. So he pressed the King to insist on this as a maxim, to have all the money for the service of a year, to be raised within that year.

The King goes a-broad.

Affairs being thus settled at home, on Thursday in the evening, May the 3d, the King and Queen went down to Gravesend, where his Majesty embarked about five the next morning, the wind being then fair; but, changing soon after, the King came on shore again at Gravesend about ten; and, for better expedition, went the same day with the Queen to Canterbury; and on the 6th of May went early thence to Margate, where he embarked on the Fubbs Yatch, and set sail about eleven with a fair wind for Holland, being attended by eight Dutch Men of war, which came from the Downs. He landed the next day at the Hoek of Holland, over-against the Brille, at six in the evening, and came about midnight to the Hague, and next morning went first into the assembly of the States of Holland, and afterwards that of the States-General, and made a short speech in each of them, and received their compliments on his safe arrival; and after a few days went to Loo to take the diversions of that place, till matters were ripe for his going to the army.

A bank erected. Barnet.

About this time a draught of a commission for taking subscriptions for the Bank of England, together with a schedule containing the draught of a charter for the corporation of the Bank, were first approved and signed by her Majesty on the 8th of June; and the charter, which was to pass under the Great Seal of England, after the first day of August, if the sum of 1,200,000*l.* or one moiety, or more thereof, should be subscribed by that time, or sooner, if the whole 1,200,000*l.* should be sooner subscribed, was accordingly granted towards the middle of July, the Commissioners having taken subscriptions amounting to that sum by the 5th of that month. The constituting of the Bank occasioned great debates: Some thought a Bank would grow to be a monopoly. All the money of England would come into their hands; and they would in a few years become the masters of the stock and wealth of the nation. Others argued for it: That the credit, it would have, must increase trade and the circulation of money, at least in Bank notes. It was visible, that all the enemies of the Government set themselves against it, with such a vehemence of zeal, that this alone convinced all people, that they saw the strength that our affairs would receive from it. The Dutch often reckon up the great advantages they had from their Banks; and they concluded that, as long as England continued jealous of the Government, a Bank could never be settled among us, nor gain credit enough to support itself: And, upon that, they judged that the superiority in trade must still lie on their side. This, with all the other remote funds that were created, had another good effect: It engaged all those, who were concerned in them, to be, upon the account of their own interest, zealous for maintaining the Government; since it was not to be doubted, but that a Revolution would have swept all these away. The advantages that the King, and all concerned in tallies, had from the Bank, were soon so sensibly felt, that all people saw into the secret reasons, that made the enemies of the Constitution set themselves with so much earnestness against it.

Numb. XVII. Vol. III.

The Confederate fleet was out early this year; Affairs at sea but yet they were neither able to block up that of France in Brest, nor to fight them at sea; Burchet. than which the English desired nothing more. Boyer. Barnet. The French, on the contrary, industriously avoided an engagement, and were no sooner out of the harbour, but they made all the sail they could towards the Mediterranean, having formed great designs against Spain, both by sea and land, this campaign. In order to break their measures, and prevent the intire loss of Catalonia, sent to the King thought fit to send his fleet into those seas; but, before Admiral Ruffel left the coast of France, being informed, that there was a fleet of French merchant-men in Bertram Bay, A fleet of French merchant-men destroyed. bound to the eastward, he detached Captain Pickard and the Roe-kuck fire-ship, either to take or destroy them. These orders Captain Pickard executed with so good success, that, of fifty-five sail, he burnt or sunk thirty-five, and drove the man of war, that was their convoy, among the rocks, where she soon after blew up, with her two sloops of between ten and fifteen guns.

The same good fortune did not attend the design, which the English and Dutch had been long concerting, to destroy the harbour of Brest; The design against Brest unsuccessful. the execution of which desperate attempt was committed to Lieutenant-General Talmash. On the 5th of June the Lord Berkeley, Admiral of the Blue Squadron, parted from Admiral Ruffel with twenty-nine men of war of the line of battle, English and Dutch, besides small frigates, fire-ships, bomb-ketches, and transport-ships; the 7th he came to an anchor between Bertram-bay and Camaret (a small neck of land in the mouth of the river of Brest) notwithstanding the 1694. the enemies bombs from Camaret western point, from a castle on a high rock in Bertram-bay, and from two forts on each side of the Isthmus, going into Brest road.

The same day the Lord Cutts and the Marquis of Caermarthen, in his own galley, stood in a considerable way into the bay, and, having taken a view of it amidst the enemies fire, they returned, and gave the Lord Berkeley an account of the posture of the bay, and the situation of the castle, which they found very advantageous to defend the landing-places (1). Upon this, it was thought advisable, that the Monk, a ship of sixty-guns, and the Diamelen, a Dutch ship of equal force, should go in; but the Marquis of Caermarthen not believing, that those two men of war would be sufficient to cover the boats at their landing, nor to assist their land-forces by playing upon the enemy, who were better prepared and more numerous than was expected, and ready to be seconded on all occasions, by fourteen squadrons of horse. Therefore on the 8th, after a consultation of the English and Dutch flags, and the general officers of the land-forces, it was resolved, that six other men of war should be added to the two former (2), which the Marquis undertook to pass so near, as to bear upon the castle to the best advantage, and to perform those other services, for which they were designed. This was a work of great difficulty and danger; for, no sooner was the Monk come within reach of the enemies mortars, but they began to play at her from the point des Filettes, and the western point of Camaret. As soon as the rest of the ships were got into the bay, they were surprized with three batteries more, which they never perceived till they felt their shot. But, notwithstanding all these difficulties, the Marquis posted the ships in such a manner, as gave great assistance to the land-forces, and did the enemy considerable mischief. For these ships, as soon as they had dropped their anchors in the bay, fired continually upon the French, and forced them to run twice out of Camaret fort.

On the other hand, Talmash, with a small number of well-boats, and about nine hundred men, went a shore in a confused manner, under a little rock, on the south-side of a small bay. Whereupon a detachment of the French marines charged the English so vigorously, that they were forced to retire to their boats in great disorder. It happening, at the same time, to be the tide of ebb, most of those boats stuck fast, so that the men were either miserably slaughtered, or obliged to beg for quarter. The rest of the boats retreated under the protection of the men of war, which, with incredible labour and hazard the Marquis of Caermarthen brought off, except the Wesep, a small Dutch man of war. Of the land forces about four hundred were taken prisoners, and as many killed or desperately wounded. And, as for the loss sustained at sea, four hundred men were lost in the three English and four Dutch ships under the Marquis's command. This expedition, which cost the brave Talmash his life (3), could not but prove unsuccessful, the French having had time to provide themselves against it, the design having been the town-talk in London some months before it was put in execution (4).

To revenge this affront Lord Berkeley failed Dippe towards bombarded.

(1) Bishop Burnet says, that, when our fleet came so near, as to see what preparations were made for the defence of the place, the Council of officers were all against making the attempt; but that General Talmash had set his heart so much upon it, that he could not be diverted from it. He fancied, that the men they saw were only a rabble brought together to make a shew, though it appeared very evidently, that there were regular bodies among them, and that their numbers were double to his. Burnet, II. 130.

The famous Engineer Fauban, whom the King of France had employed to put Brest and the places in the harbour, which were likely to be attacked, in a posture of defence, wrote to that King, before the English fleet arrived, 'That his Majesty needed to be under no apprehensions; that he had made all the subterraneous passages under the castle bomb-proof: that he had placed ninety mortars, and three hundred pieces of cannon, in proper places: That all the ships were out of the reach of the enemy's bombs, and all the troops in good order: That there were three hundred bombardiers in the place, three hundred gentlemen, four thousand men, regular troops, and a regiment of dragoons just arrived.'

(2) Namely, the Greenwich of fifty-four, the Charles galley of thirty-two, the Shoreham of thirty-two, the Darkestone of forty-four, the Wesep of thirty, and the Wolf of thirty guns.

(3) He was shot in the thigh, of which wound he died a few days after, and was much lamented; for he was a brave and generous man, and a good officer, and very fit to animate and encourage inferior officers and soldiers. 'But he was much too apt to be discontented, and to turn mutinous; so that, upon the whole, he was one of those dangerous men that are capable of doing as much mischief as good service.' A little before his death, he is reported to have said, that, as he lost his life in the performance of his duty to so good a prince, he was perfectly easy as to that point; but that it was a great trouble to him, that the Government had been so basely betrayed. It is said, he knew who were the traitors, and named to a person, who stood at his bed-side, that he might discover them to Queen Mary, in the King's absence, that the might be on her guard against those pernicious Counsellors, who had retarded the descent and given the French time to be prepared for it. Oldm. p. 92.

(4) Father Daniel says, that the Lord Berkeley, came into the bay of Camaret with a squadron of six and fifty men of war, bombs and other vessels. General Talmash made a descent at the head of a battalion of grenadiers, and between eight and nine hundred men, which were landed by a great number of shallops. A brisk fire ensued, as well from the English on one side, as from the French batteries and intrenchments on land, on the other. The Sieur de Benisse, Captain of a French company of marines, observing, that there was some confusion among the English troops, sallied out sword in hand, at the head of sixty men, being immediately followed by another company. He defeated the enemy, killed a great number of their men, and pursued them to their shallops; into which they threw themselves in such numbers, that they could by no means get them off. Upon this the Count de Servon, Marshal of Camp, the Sieurs de Paisse, Brigadier of foot, and du Plessis, Brigadier of horse, marched a squadron of the regiment of du Plessis up to the shore, which soon obliged the English in the boats which were stranded, to demand quarter. The others, which had not yet made their defence, retreated under favour of the cannon of their ships. A Dutch vessel, which ventured too near the shore, ran a-ground, and was obliged to surrender. The English lost four hundred men in the descent, among whom was their General Talmash, and forty officers, with five soldiers, made

The townsmen, despairing to quench the flames, began to run away in great consternation; whereupon two regiments of the militia of Bretagne were sent to encourage them; but the disorder was so great, and the fire so dreadful, that the soldiers themselves fled with the rest. If the English had known what had passed, they might in all probability have possessed themselves of the place. However they so ruined it, that the greatest part of the houses were reduced to ashes, and scarce any left unshattered.

and Havre de Grace, of France, sailed towards Havre de Grace; and on the 16th of July began to bombard the town under the direction of Captain Bembow, which they continued to do till the next morning, when, the wind blowing hard, they gave over. The 18th towards the evening, the weather being calm, the following night was spent in throwing in two hundred and fifty bombs more into the town; but, the wind growing high, the bomb-ketches stood off again; and on the 24th the Lord Berkeley failed from Havre de Grace, leaving it considerably damaged. Dunkirk was the place of the greatest importance, for which reason that attempt was pursued in several ways, but none of them succeeded. These bombardings of the French towns soon spread a terror among all, that lived near the coast; batteries were every where raised; and the people were brought out to defend their country. But they could do the English no hurt, while their bombs at a mile's distance did great execution. The action seemed inhuman; but the French, who had bombarded Genoa, without a previous declaration of war, and who had so often put whole countries under military execution, even after they had paid the contributions, which had been laid on them (for which they had protection given them) had no reason to complain of this way of carrying on the war, which they themselves had first begun.

Death of the Bishop of Liege. The death of the Bishop and Prince of Liege, towards the beginning of this year, gave the French a fair prospect of embroiling the affairs of the Confederates on that side. For as the death of the Elector of Cologne in 1688 had divided the Empire and France on account of the two Candidates, Prince Clement of Bavaria on the one side, and Cardinal Furstemberg on the other, and kindled the war, which soon after spread itself over the face of almost all Europe; so, if the French could have got the Cardinal of Bouillon to have been advanced to the Principality of Liege, they had great hopes, at least to humble the Allies so far, as to make them accept the conditions of peace, which the French King had already offered them. But, notwithstanding the private endeavours of the French faction, and the Cardinal of Bouillon's open protestations, the major part of the Chapter of Liege made choice of the Elector of Cologne, and the rest of the Grand Masters of the Teutonic order, to be their Prince and Bishop; both which sent to the Emperor and Court of Rome to have their respective election confirmed. This double return was like to be attended with fatal consequences; for as the Grand Master of the Teutonic order was no less than brother-in-law to the Emperor, who in all probability would have espoused his cause; so his Competitor was brother to the Elector of Bavaria, whose interest was supported by that of his Britannic Majesty and of the States of Holland. Whilst both parties impatiently expected the decision of the See of Rome, the contest was determined by the death of the Grand Master, who was carried off by a contagious distemper, then reigning in the city of Liege; so that the Elector of Cologne, in some time after, obtained the peaceful possession of that Bishopric and Principality; which, together with the great power of the Allies in Flanders this campaign, made things look with an ill aspect on the affairs of France.

The Confederate army, under the King's Campaign command, was encamped at Mont St Andre, in Flanders, consisting of thirty one thousand horse and dragoons, and fifty one thousand foot, all as good troops, as ever had been in the field; besides a body of about seven thousand men, under Count Thian near Ghent. The French were not much inferior in number; but the Dauphin, who commanded in person, declared, that he had received orders from his father not to stir from his camp near Huy, as long as the Confederates continued in their's at St Andre. However, not being able to subsist there any longer, he resolved at last to decamp, and tho' he thought to have concealed his design, by sending out several detachments of horse, under pretence of foraging, to reinforce the Marquis of Harcourt's body (on the other side of the Maele) who was to seize the advantageous post of Pieton; yet the King, who was apprehensive of it, decamped before him and soon gained the post of Pieton, where there was not forage for above four days; and, being informed of the enemy's march, he moved towards Nivelle, thence to Lessines; having before sent orders for baking bread at Ghent and Delb. When the army came to Chieire, the Elector of Bavaria was detached with a considerable body of horse and foot, and some pieces of cannon, to possess himself of a post upon the Scheld; and the army followed with an intention to have passed the river at Pont Esperies. But, though the Confederates made great expedition to get thither, yet the French made more to prevent them; for, the Elector having advanced towards Pont d'Escabuffe, in order to force the passage of the river, he found the French, to the number of thirty-thousand, so well intrenched on the other made prisoners. Many more were drowned; and, a bomb happening to fall into a bomb-veffel full of soldiers, it blew up with all that were in it. This enterprise cost the English and Dutch two thousand men. They burnt one of their vessels in the night, and another of sixty pieces of cannon was run a-ground. The French, on the contrary, had no more than five and forty slain. Monsieur Vauban, who commanded at Brest, had taken all his precautions with an admirable skill, as well with regard to the batteries as the intrenchments, in which was placed a battalion of marines, with some other soldiers, under the command of the Marquis de Langeron.

1694. other side, that he did not think it prudent to pursue his enterprise. By this hasty march the French cavalry suffered much; but that loss was inconsiderable in comparison of the advantage, which they gained by hindering the Allies from penetrating into French Flanders, where, considering their strength, they would, in all probability, have made some important conquest, or at least, secured winter quarters. The King of France was so sensible of it, that he wrote a letter, which he ordered, to be read at the head of the army, wherein he returned thanks, in the first place, to the Princes of the blood; next to Marshal Luxembourg, as having a principal share in the conduct; then to the rest of the Marshals of France, and all the general officers; and lastly to all the French and Swiss infantry, regiment by regiment, acknowledging how much he was obliged to their zeal and incredible diligence.

Whilst the French were deeply intrenched near Courtray, from whence they had sent strong detachments to cover Ypres, Menin, Berg St Winoc, Furnes, and Dunkirk, the King, finding it impossible to attempt any thing on that side, resolved to lay hold on this occasion, to dispossess the enemy of the town and castle of Huy. In pursuance of this design, the Prince Tserclaes de Tilley passed the Meuse, and invested the place with all the horse and dragoons of the Bishopric of Liege, a party of Brandenburg horse, and some battalions of foot. The next day arrived sixteen regiments of foot with the Duke of Holsheim Ploem, whom the King appointed to command the siege, and at whose approach the town immediately surrendered. By the 19th of September, the batteries were raised against the castle; and, all things being ready for an assault by the 27th, the French Governor beat a parly, and surrendered that fortress the next day. By this conquest the French were totally expelled out of the Bishopric of Liege, Dinant at that time being a part of France. Thus ended the campaign in Flanders. But the Confederates, especially the English and Dutch, grew weary of keeping vast armies, which did nothing else than lay for some months advantageously posted, in view of the enemy, without any action.

The French, under the command of Marshal Noailles, made a better figure in Catalonia; for, being near thirty thousand strong, and much superior to the Spaniards, they arrived on the 26th of May on the banks of the river Ter; which they resolved to pass, notwithstanding they found the Spaniards intrenched on the other side. Accordingly, having sounded all the fords that same evening they forced their way through; and, after half an hour's dispute, constrained the Spanish foot to abandon their retrenchments. The Spanish cavalry shewed a more than ordinary valour and conduct in covering the foot, and at last made their own retreat without any great loss, except that of their baggage, the French not thinking it safe to pursue them, because of the narrowness of the ways. However the Marshal de Noailles improved this advantage by laying siege to Palamos, a town by the sea-side, about twenty-two leagues from Barcelona, to the South East. On the 30th of May, the place was invested; and, on the 7th of June, all things were in a readiness to storm the covered way. This the French grenadiers performed with great resolution, entered the town at two narrow breaches, plundered it, and put all they met to the sword. Of those, who were saved, all were made prisoners of war; only some of the officers, who were most wounded, were sent to Gironne upon their parole; not only, said the French General in his letter to the King his Master, because they seemed to desire, but because he considered the terror, that it would strike among the soldiers and people. Marshal Noailles judged rightly of the matter; for the Spaniards immediately withdrew their garrison out of St Felix Quinola, and the castle of St Elome; and, though they pretended to make a stout resistance at Gironne, a well fortified town, which the French had besieged by the 19th of June, yet they surrendered it in ten days upon very ignominious terms. From Gironne the French advanced to Ofsalric, a little town upon the road to Barcelona, which they quickly carried without any great resistance, and thereby enlarged their territories twenty miles in extent. But the army, because of the excessive heats, beginning now to be sickly, Noailles put them into quarters of refreshment, upon the fertile banks of the river Terdera, where they lived as undisturbed from the Spaniards, as if they had been in the middle of France. After they had sufficiently refreshed themselves, they formed a design upon Castle Folet, a town a little to the West of Gironne, which they took, having routed a body of country militia, that came to relieve it, and made the garrison prisoners of war.

Whilst the French were busy on this side, the Spaniards thought to improve this opportunity by retaking Ofsalric, which they actually besieged, and had carried their point so far, that the Governor was upon articles of surrender, and hostages were already exchanged; but, the Spaniards insisting, that the Miquelets should be made prisoners of war, the Governor in the mean time had notice, that Noailles was marching to his relief; whereupon he redemanded his hostages, and refused to stand to the articles, so that the siege was immediately raised.

Frustrated with these successes, the French threatened no less than the besieging of Barcelona, the Capital of Catalonia, and the only fortified town of that province in the hands of the Spaniards. The Court of Madrid felt their weakness, and saw their danger so visibly, that they were forced to implore the protection of the English fleet. The French had carried the best part of their naval force into the Mediterranean, and had resolved to attack Barcelona both by sea and land, at the same time; and, upon their success there, to have gone round Spain, destroying the coast every where. All this was intended to force the Spaniards to accept the offers, which the French were willing to give them. But, to prevent this, Admiral Russel was ordered to sail into the Mediterranean with a fleet of threecore great ships. He was so long stopped in his voyage by contrary winds, that the French, if they had pursued their advantages, might have finished the conquest of Catalonia. But, as they were resolved not to hazard their fleet, it was brought back to Toulon, long before Admiral Russel could get into the Mediterranean, which was now intirely left to him. However, it was thought, that the French intended to make a second attempt in the end of the year, as soon as he should sail back to England.

1694. land; for which reason it was proposed, that he might lie at Cadiz all the winter. This was an affair of such importance, that it was long and much debated, before it was resolved on. It was thought a dangerous thing to expose the best part of our fleet, so much as it must be, while it lay at so great a distance from us, that convoys of stores and provisions might easily be intercepted. And indeed the ships were so low in their provisions, when they came back to Cadiz (the vessels that were ordered to carry them, having been stopped four months, in the channel by contrary winds) that our fleet had not then above a fortnight's victuals on board. Yet, when the whole matter was thoroughly canvassed, it was agreed, that our ships might both lie safe, and be well careened at Cadiz. Nor was the difference in the expence, between their lying there and in our own ports, considerable. By their lying there, the French were shut up in the Mediterranean; so that the ocean and their coasts were left open to us. They were in effect shut up within Toulon; for they, having no other port in those seas but that, resolved not to venture abroad; so that now we were masters of the seas every where. These considerations determined the King to send orders to Admiral Ruffel, to lie all the winter at Cadiz; which produced very good effects. The Venetians and the Grand Duke of Tuscany had not thought fit to own the King till then. A great fleet of stores and ammunition, with all other provisions for the next campaign, came safe to Cadiz; and some clean men of war were sent out in exchange for others, which were ordered home (1).

In Piedmont.

Little was done in Piedmont this summer: For though the Duke of Savoy openly rejected the proposals made to him from France, after his defeat at Marsaglia, yet a secret negotiation was carried on, which rendered him very unactive, and the French careless on that side. And when it was expected that the Confederate army would form the siege of Casale (the success of which enterprize was as little doubted of) they contented themselves with the taking the fort of St George, whereby that place was more closely blocked up. Neither is it worth the while to mention either the small successes of the Vaudois in the valley of Pragelas; their routing of some Irish detachments sent against them in the valley of St Martin; or their faint irruption into Dauphiné as far as Briançon.

The Imperialists, headed by Prince Lewis of Baden, lying incamped near Hailbron, Marshal de Lorge, with the French army under his command, adventured to pass the Rhine, and to march towards them in order of battle. The Prince, believing the enemy had a mind to fight, went on to meet them. But, the French finding him so resolute, retreated towards Wiselock, passed the Neckar, burnt the town of Laudenburg, and ruined the flat country. This so incensed the Prince of Baden, that, though he was not yet reinforced by the Saxons, he advanced to Wiselock, an advantageous post, of which he possessed himself, after a sharp encounter with the enemy, wherein the French lost three hundred men, and the Germans about half that number. Upon this de Lorge repassed the Rhine, and for some time the two armies only observed one another. At length the Prince of Baden, impatient of action, crossed the Rhine in his turn; of which the French General was no sooner informed, but he marched towards Landau. On the other hand, the Prince advanced and made himself master of several small places, and of all the passes as far as Croon Welfemburg; and it was confidently expected that now the Germans would either force the French to a battle, or secure winter-quarters on that side the Rhine. But neither of these happened; for in a few days the Imperialists repassed the Rhine, bringing away with them fourteen thousand head of cattle; and having destroyed a great quantity of forage in the country, and some magazines of the French; which put an end to the campaign in Germany.

The campaign ended every where to the advantage of the Confederates, though no signal successes had happened to their arms. At the conclusion of it, the Court of France flattered their people with hopes of a speedy end of the war. And some men of great consideration were sent to try, what terms they could bring the Empire or the States-General to. But the French were yet far from offering conditions, upon which a just or a safe peace could be treated of (2). The States sent some persons as far as Moesbricht, to see what pow-

(1) While the fleet lay at Cadiz, Captain Killgrew was sent out with six men of war to execute certain orders, and meeting by the way with two stout French men of war called the Trident and the Content, they were both taken, but Killgrew lost his life in the engagement. Burchet, 816.

(2) In this year, 1694, was published a piece intitled, Reflections upon the conditions of peace offered by France; and the means to be employed for procuring of better. The author begins with observing, that 'since persons, who are possessed with too great opinion of the power of France, and are ignorant of the reasons that oblige that Crown to wish to see an end of the war, might be apt to imagine, that the conditions of peace, which were proposed in Sweden by the Count d'Avaux, ought not to have been so disdainfully rejected, it might not be amiss to shew, how captious and unjust those conditions were, and how necessary it was to look upon them as a snare, which we ought to be very cautious of falling into; since it was certain, that they would have left France in a condition to break the treaty, which it would make with the Allies, upon the first favourable occasion, that should present itself; and it could not be doubted, but that our enemies would be ready to renew the war, after the term of some few years, and to push on their arms with so much the more fury, as they should then find fewer obstacles to their designs; if they were not reduced to such restitution, as should give us security, that they would not dare again to violate their words.' He then demonstrates from a series of facts the unmeasurable ambition of France; and shews the necessity of humbling that kingdom. He remarks, that no security had been offered by it to the Allies; and that it was the interest of England and Holland to re-establish a good barrier in Flanders and Brabant. 'It is a truth, says he, of which none can doubt, that the conquest of the Low-Countries would put France into a condition of giving laws to all Europe; and it is another truth, that is no less evident, that nothing can hinder the French from making this conquest upon the first occasion, if we accept of the conditions of peace, which they now offer us. The greatest of our interests then is here concerned, lest France being in possession of the ports of the Spanish Netherlands, and keeping the Hollanders in slavery, or at least in an indispensable necessity of re-

And when they saw how limited these were, the negotiation was soon at an end; or rather, it never began. When the French saw this, they disowned their having sent any on such an errand, and pretended, that this was only an artifice of the Confederates to keep one another and their people in heart, by making them believe, that they had now only a small remnant of the war before them, since the French had instruments every where at work, to solicit peace.

During the King's absence there was little remarkable in England, but the eminent prudence of the Queen in preserving the peace of the nation; though the Jacobites were industrious and implacable in their plots against the Government. Colonel Parker had been committed to the Tower for high-treason, and a bill of indictment was found against him in Trinity Term; but on Saturday, August the 11th, by a stratagem he made his escape in the night, and fled from justice; and though there was a proclamation for the discovering and apprehending of him, with a reward of four hundred pounds for

'maining in a good union with that Crown, the French would become absolute masters of our commerce; left they should oppress Germany, Spain, and Italy; whilst we being shut up in our island, and out of all communication with the continent, should be spectators of that Revolution, without being able to hinder it. It is visible therefore, that the safety of England depends upon the preservation of the Low-Countries. But what shall we say of the glory of the nation? It is certain, that, if we procure an advantageous peace for the Allies, by continuing the war with the same vigour, that we have shewn hitherto, England will have the honour of having saved Europe from chains, and will remain the arbiter of its destiny.

'It is the general interest of all Christendom to settle the house of Austria in a sort of equality with France. This equilibrium is necessary for the security of the People, and even for that of the Sovereigns too. But it is the particular interest of England to re-establish this equality, that she may have the balance in her hand, and turn it to which side she pleases. This is the only means we can make use of, not only to maintain the Empire of the sea, which we have regained the possession of in so glorious a manner, but even to enable us to decide the success of wars, and the conditions of treaties for the future. The nation begins already to recover in Europe the rank which she ought to hold. Our fleets are mistresses of the two seas; the security of our commerce is perfectly re-established; we have seen the French reduced to a necessity of letting their maritime towns in the ocean be burnt, while their fleet is shut up, and as it were imprisoned in part of the Mediterranean, to avoid the being attacked by ours. We have begun to stop the progress of their arms in the Low-Countries; and the taking of Huy is not of so little importance, but that it opens a way to greater conquests, in giving us an opportunity to draw off a great part of our garisons from Liege and Maastricht. Besides, we may without flattery say, that we have a numerous army upon the Rhine, and may expect great things from that Prince that commands it. The Duke of Savoy will be able to make a more considerable diversion on that side, than he hath hitherto done, because he will act in concert with our fleet. And it is to be hoped, that the Turks, discouraged by their losses, and being convinced that France will sacrifice them, will at length, by making an accommodation with the Emperor, prevent the danger they would be in, if they should be the last in making a peace. Add to all this, the extremity to which France finds herself now reduced: They are forced to abandon to us the two seas; they are under an impossibility of augmenting their forces by land; their commerce is absolutely ruined; their subjects discontented, and their troops ill paid. In a word, if the Allies will but make the best of this conjuncture, it seems the most certain, that they must quickly obtain reasonable conditions of peace, and that Europe may thereby enjoy a solid and durable repose.'

About the same time was published likewise another piece intitled, The Englishman's choice and true interest in a vigorous prosecution of the war against France, and serving King William and Queen Mary, and acknowledging their right. The Author begins with animadverting upon those, who murmured against the taxes and the war; and complains, that the King had been too good to his enemies, whose false pretences in opposing his Majesty he exposes. He then considers the state of the war, and observes, that there were some, who represented, that our navy might guard our coasts against invasions; or our militia, and other forces at home, might be enough to preserve us, if the enemies land. But these men, says he, cannot but own, that it is much better for England to be at charges in keeping the enemy at a distance, than to be the seat of war; and that if any one of those Allies, whom they undervalue, joined with France, it were such an accession to its power, as the French party here would be very glad of; nor is there any one of them, who would not in such a case be as much magnified by that party, as now they are lessened. But it is evident, that if the French should swallow Flanders, (which they had certainly done before now, if it had not been for the Confederacy) Holland, which has lately set us to good an example since the battle of London, must necessarily truckle, and their navy be at the command of France. And how could we expect a fleet able to secure us against both, when hitherto we and Holland in conjunction have done so little against the naval Force of France, excepting that memorable time, when Admiral Ruffel (whose victory was by some men held a crime) to his eternal honour and glory, so well maintained the reputation of the English nation. If France had no enemy but England, and were at liberty to employ against it all their armies in Flanders, upon the Rhine, in Piedmont, in Catalonia, and in their garisons, (which together amount to near four-hundred thousand men) while so many here shew themselves ready to declare for them; what could England hope for, but to be a field of blood? And how could we think, that the French swords would be sheathed, while there were one Protestant remaining? Nay, when we consider, how barbarously they use the people, whom they subdue, though of their own religion, without regard to religious houses or churches, or the sepulchres of Princes, we may believe that the English Papists would find little better quarter than others. They, who have had such fatal proofs of the English valour and enmity to them, would take care never more to be in fear of their ancient enemies; nor is it to be thought, that any thing less than our total extirpation would satisfy them.' The author then justifies the present settlement, exposes the absurd conduct of those Protestants, who were enemies to the Government; shews, that the Jacobites were more inexcusable than the Papists, and observes, that the former 'magnified the power of France, and the advantage of its way of Government to make war, or command peace, and mightily lessened and reproached the Confederates; and that chiefly under a popular mask of zeal against leagues with Popish Princes; which they, good men! are so far from, that they are

The King returns to England. His Majesty having spent some months in his usual diversions at Loo, and then settled the publick foreign affairs at the Hague, embarked the 8th of November on the William and Mary yacht in the Masfe, being attended by a squadron of men of war under the command of the Lord Marquis of Caermarthen; and the next day landed at Margate. He lay that night at Canterbury, and was met by the Queen at Rocheſter. The day following he came to Kensington; and on Monday the 12th, the Parliament being met at Westminster, the King made the following speech to both Houses:

My Lords and Gentlemen,

The King's speech to the sixth Session of the Parliament. I Am glad to meet you here, when I can say our affairs are in a better posture both by sea and land, than when we parted last.

Pr. H. C. II. 445. The enemy has not been in a condition to oppose our fleet in these seas; and our sending so great a force into the Mediterranean has disappointed their designs, and leaves us a prospect of further success.

With respect to the war by land, I think I may say, that this year a stop has been put to the progress of the French arms.

Gentlemen of the House of Commons,

I have had so much experience of your good affection to me, and of your zeal for the public, that I cannot doubt of your assistance at this time. I do therefore earnestly recommend to you, to provide such supplies, as may enable me to prosecute the war with vigour;

for submitting to the worst of them without terms. They insinuate, continues he, as if England bears the charge of a needless war, to maintain the dominion of a foreign Prince; not considering, that the Dutch alone have in their pay one hundred and six thousand, five hundred, and forty men, besides their allowing twenty-five thousand gilders a month towards carrying on the war in Piedmont; and are so far from being discouraged by the late misfortunes from a vigorous prosecution of the war, that they have added fifteen thousand to their former land-forces, besides increasing their navy. And it is a known maxim that the preservation of Flanders is more for the interest of England than of Spain. If Flanders be an accession to France, Holland must soon follow, and England next. The importance of Flanders is sufficiently confessed by these Gentlemen, when they would have others believe there is a necessity of our truckling to France, upon the taking of a town or two. And yet they are for giving it all up. But any man, who has seen the noble towns and large country yet remaining, would think it very well worth the preserving. Antwerp itself, if it were in the French hands, would command the trade of Christendom. He next refutes the insinuations of the Jacobites against the French Protestants in England, and against the Dutch; and takes notice of their insolence towards the King; whom they represented as no friend to the English nation.

(1) He had been seized on account of the Lancashire plot, and knew so much of the designs of the conspirators, that they were very busy to get him out of prison, being looked upon as the most daring and desperate, as well as the most active and bloody of all which is the only means to procure peace to Christendom, with the safety and honour of England.

I must likewise put you in mind, that the act of tonnage and poundage expires at Christmas; and I hope you will think fit to continue that revenue to the Crown; which is the more necessary at this time, in regard the several branches of the revenue are under great anticipations for extraordinary expences of the war, and subject to many demands upon other accounts.

I cannot but mention to you again the debt for the transport-ships employed in the reducing of Ireland, which is a case of compassion, and deserves relief.

My Lords and Gentlemen,

I should be glad you would take into your consideration the preparing some good bill for the encouragement of our seamen. You cannot but be sensible, how much a law of this nature would tend to the advancement of trade, and of the naval strength of the Kingdom; which is our great interest, and ought to be our principal care.

The Parliament was opened with a calmer face than had appeared in any Session during this reign. The supplies that were demanded, amounting to almost five millions, were all readily granted (2). An ill humour indeed appeared in some, who opposed the funds, that would most easily and most certainly raise the money that was given, upon this pretence, that such taxes would grow to be a general excise; and that the more easily money was raised, it would be the more easy to continue such duties to a longer period, if not for ever; the truth was, their agents. While he was in the Tower, a person came to him and told him, 'he had brought him liberty, but he must have two hundred pounds.' Parker replied, 'You shall have three hundred pounds.' And accordingly he had it, as he told Goodman; and by this man's means he got out of the Tower in the night, and from thence to France. Oldm. p. 94.

For the army, 2,382,000 l.

For the raising these sums:

1. The subsidy of tonnage and poundage, that was granted to King Charles II. for life, was now continued for five years.

2. A land-tax of 4s. in the pound.

3. Certain rates and duties upon marriages, births, and burials, and upon bachelors and widows, for five years.

The burial of every person 4s. and over and above for a Duke or Dukes 50 l. Marquis 40 l. and so descending gradually through all degrees.

Every child 2s. and over and above for a Duke's child 30 l. and so on through all degrees, as in the burials.

Every marriage 2s. 6d. but every Duke over and above 50 l. &c.

Every bachelor above twenty-five years of age, and widow, 1s. a year, but every Duke over and above 12 l. 10s. &c.

4. An act for additional duties upon coffee, tea, and chocolate, towards paying the Debts due for transport-service, for the reduction of Ireland.

5. An act for certain duties upon glass-ware, stone and earthen bottles, coal and culm.

1697. was, the secret enemies of the Government proposed such funds, as would be the heaviest to the people, and would not fully answer what they were estimated at; that so the nation might be uneasy under that load, and that a constant deficiency might bring on such a debt, that the Government could not discharge but must sink under it.

With the supply-bills, as the price or bargain for them, the bill for the frequent meeting and calling of Parliaments went on. It was prepared by order of the Commons, and brought in by Mr Harley on the 22d of November, and, in a few days passing the House, was sent up to the Lords, who gave it their concurrence without any amendment. Four days after, on the 22d of December, the King gave it the Royal assent. It enacted, that a new Parliament should be called every third year, and that the present Parliament should be dissolved before the 1st of January 1695-6. This act was received with great joy, many fancying that all the other laws and liberties were now the more secure, since this was passed into a law. Men, that intended to sell their own votes without doors, spared no cost to buy to votes of others in elections. But now it was hoped that men's characters and reputations would be the prevailing considerations in the choice of Members of Parliament, and that our Constitution, particularly that part of it relating to the House of Commons, would recover its strength and reputation; which was now much sunk; for corruption was so generally spread, that it was believed every thing was carried by that method. But time, and the many additional acts made upon this head, have plainly shewn how vain were these hopes, and how difficult it is to put an end to the corrupt practices which obstruct the freedom of elections.

The very day this bill was brought in died Dr John Tillotson, Archbishop of Canterbury. He was taken with a fit of the dead palsy, while he was in the chapel at Whitehall on a Sunday. He felt it coming on him, but, not thinking it decent to interrupt the divine service, he neglected it so long, that all remedies were ineffectual; and he died the fifth day after he was seized, on the 22d of November. His distemper did so oppress him, and speaking was so uneasy to him, that though it appeared, by signs and other indications, that his understanding remained long clear, yet he was not able to express himself to others. He seemed still serene and calm, and in broken words said, He thanked God he was quiet within, and had nothing then to do, but to wait for the will of heaven. His body was buried, at his own desire, in the Church of St Lawrence-Jury in London, where he had been the Tuesday Lecturer many years (1). He was a man of excellent judgment and temper. He had a clear head, with a most tender and compassionate heart. He was a faithful and zealous friend, but a gentle and soon conquered enemy. He was truly and seriously religious, but without affectation, bigotry or superstition. His notions of morality were fine and sublime. His thread of reasoning was easy, clear, and solid. He was not only the best Preacher of the age, but seemed to have brought preaching to perfection. His sermons were so well heard and liked, and so much read, that all the nation proposed him as a pattern, and studied to copy after him. His parts remained with him clear and unclouded; but the perpetual flanders, and other ill usage he had been followed with, for many years, most particularly since his advancement to that great post, gave him too much trouble and too deep a concern: It could neither provoke him, nor fright him from his duty; but it affected his mind so much that this was thought to have shortened his Days.

Both King and Queen were much affected with Tillotson's death. The Queen for many days spoke of him in the tenderest manner, and not without tears. He died so poor, that, if the King had not forgiven his first-fruits, his debts could not have been paid: So generous and charitable was he in a post, out of which Sanicroft had raised an estate, which he left to his family (2). Among the Prelates that were talked of to succeed him, Stillingfleet Bishop of Worcester, was one. The Queen was inclined to him, and spoke more than once to the Duke of Shrovesbury on that subject, and also pressed the King earnestly for him. But the Whigs did generally apprehend, that both his notions and temper were too high; so the person most approved of by the Ministry, as well as universally well liked by the people, was Dr Tennison Bishop of Lincoln, who for serving the cure of St Martin's in the worst time, with so much courage and discretion, had now many friends, and no enemies. Accordingly he was translated to the See of Canterbury on Jan. 10, 1694-5, and had the privilege of recommending Dr James Gardiner to the See of Lincoln, which he had resigned.

About a month after Tillotson's death, the Queen was taken ill, but the next day her illness seemed to go off. The day following she went abroad; but her illness returned so heavily on her, that she could disguise it no longer. She shut herself up in her closet that night some hours, and, burning many papers, put the rest in order. After that, she used some slight remedies, thinking it was only a transient indisposition; but it increased upon her, and within two days after, the small-pox (which then raged about London) appeared with very bad symptoms. It is said, the Physician's part was universally condemned, and that her death was imputed to the negligence or unskilfulness of Dr Ratcliffe. He was called for; and it appeared, but too evidently, that his opinion was chiefly considered, and most depended on. Other Physicians were afterwards called; but not 'till it was too late. The King was struck with this beyond-expectation. On the second day of her illness he passed the which had been provided for her, that the money was raised by the sale of the copy of Tillotson's Sermons, published by Dr Barker, amounting to 1500*l.* (the largest sum that had till then been given for a copy) was the greatest part of what was left.

1694. the bill for frequent Parliaments, which if he had not done that day, it is very probable he would never have passed it. Never was such a face of universal sorrow seen in a court, or in a town, as at this time: All people, men and women, young and old, could scarce refrain from tears: On Christmas day, the small-pox funk so intirely, and the Queen felt herself so well upon it, that it was for a while concluded she had the measles, and that the danger was over. This hope was ill grounded, and of a short continuance: For, before night, all was sadly changed. It appeared, that the small-pox were now so funk, that there was no hope of raising them. The new Archbishop attended on her; he performed all devotions, and had much private discourse with her: When the desperate condition she was in was evident beyond doubt, he told the King, He could not do his duty faithfully, unless he acquainted her with the danger she was in: The King approved of it, and said, whatever effect it might have, he would not have her deceived in so important a matter. And, as the Archbishop was preparing the Queen, with some address, not to surprize her too much with such tidings, she presently apprehended his drift, but shewed no fear nor disorder upon it. She said, she thanked God she had always carried this in her mind, that nothing was to be left to the last hour; she had nothing then to do, but to look up to God, and submit to his will; it went further indeed than submission; for she seemed to desire death, rather than life; and she continued to the last minute of her life in that calm and resigned state. She had formerly wrote her mind, in many particulars, to the King: And she gave order, to look carefully for a small scrutoir that she made use of, and to deliver it to the King: And, having dispatched that, she avoided the giving herself or him the tenderness, which a final parting might have raised in them both.

The day before she died she received the Sacrament, all the Bishops who were attending being admitted to receive it with her. When this was over, she composed herself solemnly to die; she slumbered sometimes, but said, she was not refreshed by it; she tried once or twice to have said somewhat to the King, but was not able to go through with it. Several cordials were given, but all was ineffectual; she lay silent for some hours: And some words, that came from her, shewed her thoughts began to break. In conclusion, she died the 28th of December, about one in the morning, in the thirty-third year of her age, and sixth of her reign.

She was the most universally lamented Princess, and deserved the best to be so, of any in our age or in our history. Bishop Burnet has written an essay on her character, in which he affirms nothing is said, but what he knew to be strictly true, without the enlargement of figure or rhetoric (1).

The King's affliction for her death was as great as it was just; it was greater than those, who knew him best, thought his temper capable of.

When

(1) Her character is also drawn by Mr Boyer, in the following manner:

Her person was tall and well proportioned; her shape, while Princess of Orange, easy and genteel; her complexion light brown; her visage oval, her eyes quick and lively, and the rest of her features regular. Her stately port and native air of greatness commanded respect from the most confident; but her sweet and graceful countenance tempered the awfulness of Majesty, and her affable temper encouraged the most timorous to approach her.

Her apprehension was clear and ready; her memory exact; and her judgment steady and solid: Her soul free from all the weaknesses of her own sex, and endowed with the courage and strength, that seem peculiar to ours. She was neither elated with prosperity, nor dejected by adversity; and it remains undecided, whether she bore with more temper the smiles or the frowns of fortune!

When the necessity of affairs called the King out of his dominions, she alone was sensible of his absence, which she fully supplied to these three Kingdoms by her wife and prudent administration. While he went abroad as the arbiter of Europe, to wage a just war, she staid at home to maintain peace and administer justice. He was to oppose and conquer enemies; she to maintain and gain friends. In all this there was a union of their thoughts, and a concurrence in the same ends, the safety of Europe, the support of the Protestant religion, and the honour and prosperity of England. An eagerness of command was so far below her, that never was so great a capacity for Government joined with so little appetite to it; or an authority so unwillingly assumed, so modestly managed, and so cheerfully laid down. It was easy for her to reward, for all sorts of bounty flowed readily from her; but it was much harder for her to punish, except when the nature of the crime made mercy become a cruelty, for then she was inexorable.

She had the most active zeal for the public, and the most constant desire of doing good, joined with such unaffected humility, that the secret flatteries of vanity.

ty, or self-love, had no power over her. For, when due acknowledgements were made, or decent things said upon occasions, that well deserved them, these seemed scarce to be heard, and she presently turned off the discourse to other subjects.

Her piety and virtue were real and unaffected; and the vivacity and sweetness of her temper and conversation softened all those disagreeable ideas, which the world is too willing to entertain of the severities of virtue, and of the strictness of true religion.

She was not content with being devout herself, but she infused piety into all, who came near her; especially those, whom she took into her more immediate care, and whom she studied to form with the tenderness and watchfulness of a mother. She charmed them with her instructions, as she overcame them with her kindness. Never was mistress both feared and loved so entirely as she was. She scattered books of instruction round about her, that such as waited might not be condemned to idleness, but might entertain themselves usefully, while they were in their turns of attendance.

She had a sublime idea of the Christian religion in general, and a particular affection to the Church of England; but an affection, that was neither blind nor partial. She had a true regard to piety wherever she saw it, in what form or party soever. Her education and judgment led her to the national communion; but her charity was extended to all. She longed to see all Protestants, both at home and abroad, in a close and brotherly conjunction; and few things ever grieved her more, than that the prospect of so desired a union vanished out of sight.

Access to her was never obstructed by self-interested supercilious domestics. She made those her favourites, who made the distressed theirs. She wondered, that the true pleasure, which accompanied doing good, did not engage Princes to pursue it more effectually. Without this she thought, that a private life was the happier as well as the safer state. When reflections were once made before her of the sharpness of some Historians who had left heavy imputations on the memory of some Princes, she answered, 'That, if those Princes 1694. When she died, his spirits sunk so low, that there was reason to apprehend, that he was following her; for some weeks after he was so little master of himself, that he was not capable of minding business, or of seeing company.

There are two things that seem to cast some reflection on the memory of Queen Mary; her behaviour, when she first came to Whiteball, after her father's abdication; and her lasting quarrel with her sister, the Princess of Denmark. The Queen arrived in England the very night before the throne was filled, and appeared so very cheerful and gay, as if she had not the least concern for what had happened to her Father. When she came to her own apartment at Whiteball (says the Duchess of Marlborough, who was then waiting on her) she ran about it, looking into every closet and conveniency, and turning up the quilts upon the bed, as people do when come into an inn, and with no other sort of concern in her appearance but such as they express; a behaviour, which, though at that time the Duchess was extremely carested by her, she thought very strange and unbecoming. For whatever necessity there was of deposing King James, he was still her father, who had been so lately driven from that chamber and that bed; and therefore, if she felt no tenderness, she should (as the Duchess observes) at least have looked grave, or even pensively sad, at so melancholy a reverse of his fortune. But Bishop Burnet's account of this incident entirely clears the Queen from the charge of indecency, and want of tenderness on so moving an occasion. It had, it seems, been given out, that she was not well pleased with the late transactions, both with relation to her Father and the present settlement. Upon which the Prince wrote to her, that it was necessary she should appear, at first, so cheerful, that no body might be discouraged by her looks, or to be led to apprehend that she was uneasy by reason of what had been done. This made her put on a great air of gaiety, when she came to Whiteball, and, as may be imagined, had great crowds of all sorts coming to wait upon her. The Bishop owns, he was one of those who censured her in his thoughts. He was of opinion, that a little more seriousness had done as well, when she came into her Father's palace, and was to be set on her Father's throne the next day. He had never seen the least indecency in any part of her deportment before, which made this appear so extraordinary, that some days after he took the liberty to ask her, how it came, that what she saw so sad a revolution, as to her Father's person, made not a greater impression upon her? She took this freedom with her usual goodness, and assured him, that she felt the sense of it very lively upon her thoughts. But she told him, that the letters which had been sent her, had obliged her to put on a cheerfulness, in which she might, perhaps, go too far, because she was obeying directions, and acting a part, which was not very natural to her.

As to the breach between the Queen and her sister, the Bishop says, it cannot be mentioned without some reflections on her memory, and he owns himself much troubled to see her carry it so far. Doubtless the Queen imagined, the Princess was in the wrong to seek after a Parliamentary provision, without any previous application to her or the King, and afterwards to refuse to dismiss from her service the Lady Marlborough (when the Earl her husband was in disgrace) though earnestly desired, nay, ordered by their Majesties so to do; and therefore she might think the Princess had injured her in not submitting to her will. However this be, the Queen saw her not in her last illness.

‘were such, as the Historians represented them, they had well deserved that treatment; and others, who tread their steps, might look for the same; for truth would be told at last.’ Her charity was not confined to her own subjects, but extended in a most particular manner to multitudes of French exiles, whom the persecution sent hither. The scattered Vaudois had a share in her bounty; and, when by the King's intercession restored to their valleys, they were enabled by the Queen to transmit their faith to their posterity. She likewise took care of preserving the poor remnants of the Bohemian churches, and formed nurseries of religion in some parts of Germany, which were exhausted by war. And the last great project, that her thoughts were working on, with relation to a Noble and Royal provision for disabled seamen at Greenwich, was particularly designed to be so constituted, as to put them in a probable way of ending their days in the fear of God.

She was a perfect example of conjugal love, chastity, and obedience. She set her husband's will before her as the rule of her life. Her admiration of him made her submission not only easy, but delightful. And it is remarkable, that when Dr Tennison, named to be archbishop of Canterbury, went to comfort the King, his Majesty answered, ‘That he could not but grieve, since he had lost a wife, who in seventeen years had never been guilty of an indiscretion.’

The openness of her behaviour was subject to universal observation, but it was under that regularity of conduct, that those, who knew her best, and saw her oftenest, could never discover her thoughts further, than as she herself had a mind to reveal them; and this she managed so, that no distrust was shewn in it, nor distaste given by it.

She maintained sincerity so entirely, that she never once needed explanations to justify either her words or actions. As she would not deceive others, so she avoided the saying of any thing, that might give them occasion to deceive themselves. And, when she did not intend to promise, she took care to explain her meaning so critically, that no fruitless hopes might be conceived from general words of favour.

Her age and her rank had denied her opportunities for much study; yet she had read the best books in English, French, and Dutch, the three languages, that were almost equally familiar to her. She gave the most of her retired hours to the reading of the Scriptures, and of books relating to them. Next to the best subjects, she bestowed most of her time on books of history especially of the latter ages, and particularly of her own kingdoms, as being the most proper to give her useful instructions. She had a great relish, as well as a great love, for poetry, but loved it best, when it was conversant about divine and moral subjects; and she would often express her concern for the defilement of the English stage.

She had no relish for those indolent diversions, which are too common consumers of most people's time, and which make as great wastes on their minds, as they do on their fortunes. If she used them sometimes, it was only in compliance with forms, because she was unwilling to seem to censure others with too harsh a severity. She gave her minutes of leisure with the greatest delight to architecture and gardening. She had no other inclination, besides this, to any diversions, that were expensive; and, since this employed many hands, she was pleased to say, That she hoped it would

For though the Princefs, upon news of the Queen's indisposition, sent a Lady of her bed-chamber, to desire that she might be allowed to wait on her Majesty, she received for answer the next day, in a letter to the Lady that brought the message, that the King and Queen thanked her for sending and desiring to come: but, it being thought so necessary to keep the Queen as quiet as possible, hoped she would defer it. This deferring the Princefs's coming, (says the Duchess of Marlborough) was only to leave room for continuing the quarrel, in case the Queen should chance to recover, or for reconciliation with the King (if that should be thought convenient) in case of the Queen's death. By this delay, the two sisters never met; though, (as Bishop Burnet says) the Queen, when dying, sent a reconciling message to the Princefs. Be that as it will, upon the death of the Queen, the Princefs, by advice of the Lord Sunderland and others, wrote the following letter to the King:

S I R,

' I beg your Majesty's favourable acceptance of my sincere and hearty sorrow for your great affliction in the loss of the Queen. And I do assure your Majesty, I am as sensibly touched with this sad misfortune, as if I had never been so unhappy, as to have fallen into her displeasure.

' It is my earnest desire, your Majesty would give me leave to wait upon you, as soon as it can be without inconvenience to you, and without danger of increasing your affliction, that I may have an opportunity myself, not only of repeating this, but of assuring your Majesty of my real intentions to omit no occasion of giving you constant proofs of my sincere respect and concern for your Person and Interest, as becomes,

Your MAJESTY'S

most affectionate Sister,

and Servant,

The King, thinking a reconciliation expedient, now that the Princefs was become the next heir to the Crown by the act of settlement, consented that she should wait upon him at Kensington at a time he appointed, where she was received with extraordinary civility. The person, who managed entirely the affair between the King and the Princefs, was the Lord Sunderland. He had, before there was any thought of the Queen's dying, designed to use his utmost endeavours to make up the breach. He also persuaded his Majesty to give the Princefs St James's house, to which the King added, by way of present, most of the Queen's jewels.

But, notwithstanding these and some other favours, the good correspondence, that appeared between the King and Princefs, was little more than an appearance. They lived indeed in terms of civility, and in formal visits; but the King did not bring her into any share of business; nor did he order his Ministers to wait on her, and give her any account of affairs.

be forgiven her. When her eyes were endangered by reading too much, and in all those hours, that were not given to better employments, she wrought with her own hands, and that sometimes with so constant a diligence, as if she had been to get her livelihood by it. It was a new sight (and such a one as was made by some, the subject of raillery) to see a Queen work so many hours a day. But she used to say, ' That she looked on idleness as the great corrupter of human nature: That, if the mind had no employment given it, it would create some of the worst sort to itself.' Her example soon wrought on, not only those, who belonged to her, but the whole Kingdom to follow it; so that it was become as much the fashion among the ladies of quality to work, as it had been formerly to be idle.

She thought it a barbarous diversion, which resulted from the misfortunes, imperfections, or follies of others; and she scarce ever expressed a more entire satisfaction in a sermon, than in that of Archbishop Tillotson against Evil-speaking. When she thought some were guilty of it, she would ask them, If they had read that sermon? Which was understood to be a reprimand, though in the softest manner. She had indeed one of the blessings of virtue, that does not always accompany it; for she was as free from censures, as she was from deserving them.

In those steps of her later years, which, at first appearance, seemed capable of hard construction, she weighed the reasons, which she went upon, with great caution and exactness. Her inclinations lay strong to a duty, that nature had put her under; but she was determined to accept the Crown, because she was persuaded, that there was no other visible means left to preserve the Protestant religion, not only here, but every where else. And, when the famous battle of the Boyne was fought, her concern was equally divided between a Father and an Husband.

She received the intimations of approaching death with an entire resignation to the will of God; and, when in the closest struggle with that King of terrors, she preserved a perfect tranquillity. The melancholy sighs of all, who came near her, could not discompose her. She then declared, ' That she felt the joys of a good conscience, and the power of religion, giving her supports, which even the last agonies could not shake.' She received the Sacrament with a devotion, that inflamed as well as melted all, who saw it; and then quietly concluded a life, that had been led through a great variety of accidents with a constant equality of temper. To sum up all, she was a tender Wife, a kind Friend, a gentle Mistress, a gracious Queen, a good Christian, and one of the best of women.

King WILLIAM, in 1701-2.

Address on the Queen's death.

UPON the Queen's death, the two Houses set an example, that was followed by the whole nation, of making consolatory and dutiful addresses to the King. The Lords led the way, and on the 31st of December, went in a body to Kensington, and presented the following address :

The Lords
address.
Pr. H. L.
I 443

WE your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in Parliament assembled, do with inexpressible grief humbly assure your Majesty of the deep sense we have of the loss your Majesty and the whole Kingdom doth sustain by the death of that excellent Princess, our Sovereign Lady, the Queen ; most humbly beseeching your Majesty, that you would not indulge your grief upon this sad occasion, to the prejudice of the health of your Royal person, in whose preservation, not only the welfare of your own subjects, but of all Christianity is so much concerned. We further beg leave, upon this sad occasion, humbly to renew to your Majesty, the hearty and sincere assurances of our utmost assistance against all your enemies, both at home and abroad, and of all other demonstrations of the greatest duty and affection, that can possibly be paid by the most faithful subjects.

To this address his Majesty answered : I heartily thank you for your kindness to me, but much more for the sense you shew of our great loss, which is above what I can express.

(1) This sermon gave great offence to the dissenters, who were extremely incensed at the Queen for her conduct towards her Father ; and Dr Thomas Kenn, the deprived Bishop of Bath and Wells, wrote a letter to Dr Tennison dated March the 29th 1695, upon the occasion of his sermon, re-

proaching him particularly, for not calling upon her Majesty on her death-bed to repent of the share she had in the Revolution. And this was a topic insisted upon in another pamphlet, printed at that time ; to both which an answer was published in 1696, under the title of A defence of the Archbishop's sermon on the death

On the same day, the King was attended by the House of Commons, with the like address, which was soon followed by addresses, from the City and Clergy of London ; and from most of the considerable Corporations throughout England. He was also addressed by the Dissenting Ministers, who had lost in the Queen a true friend ; in respect of her hearty desire of uniting to the Church as many of the Protestant Dissenters, as could be brought into the scheme of a comprehension. For few things ever grieved her more, than that the prospect of so desired an union entirely vanished by the proceedings of the Convocation, in 1689.

The Queen having lain some time in state in her bed-chamber at Whitehall, her funeral was performed on the 5th day of March, with such magnificence, as expressed the great affection, the nation had for her. Not only her Majesty's household servants, but all the Judges, Serjeants at Law, Lord Mayor and Aldermen of the city of London, and, which raised that mournful pomp to the highest pitch of splendor, both Houses of Parliament attended the Royal corps from Whitehall to Westminster-Abbey, where Dr Tennison, Archbishop of Canterbury, preached her funeral sermon (1). This circumstance of the two Houses attending could never happen before, since death had always dissolved our Parliaments. It is true, the Earl of Rocheester tried, if he could have raised a doubt of the legality of this Parliament's continuance, since it was summoned by King William and Queen Mary ; alledging, that, upon her death, the writ, that ran in her name, seemed to die with her.

proaching him particularly, for not calling upon her Majesty on her death-bed to repent of the share she had in the Revolution. 1694-5. her. This would have had fatal consequences, if, in that season of the year, all things must have stood still, till a new Parliament could have been brought together. But the act, which put the administration entirely in the King, though the Queen had a share in the dignity of Sovereign, made this cavil appear to be so ill-grounded, that no body seconded so dangerous a suggestion.

Remarks on the bill for frequent Parliaments.
The passing the bill for the frequent meeting of Parliaments, before Queen Mary's death, and even before her being taken ill, was a very reasonable step in the King, since he thereby dispelled the jealousies, which not only his enemies, but also many of his friends began to entertain of the present Parliament; whereas, had he not given his assent to that act, till after the Queen's death, people had not failed to say, that it had been extorted from him by the necessity of his affairs.

Account of the Lancashire plot. Boyer. Burnet.
Towards the beginning of this Session of Parliament, the Popish Lancashire Gentlemen, instead of acknowledging the lenity of the present Government, endeavoured to represent the legal prosecution of some of their party as a state-trick, and the contrivance of some Courtiers to enrich themselves by the ruin of others; and submitted the whole matter to the examination of the House of Commons. It will be proper therefore to premise a brief account of their design to subvert the Government, and of the proceedings against them, in order that a right notion may be formed of the grounds of the clamour against those proceedings.

Lunt's depositions.
On the 15th of June 1694, Lunt, an Irishman, (who has already been mentioned) made his discovery, and deposed before Sir John Trenchard, Secretary of State: 'That he had followed the late King James into France, and thence into Ireland: That from Ireland he was sent into England, with commissions from that King to certain Gentlemen in Lancashire, Cheshire, &c. to raise war against King William and Queen Mary: That he and George Wilson, his guide, delivered those commissions to whom they were directed; whose names he mentioned in his narrative. That, at the instance and proper costs of those Gentlemen, to whom he had delivered commissions, he bought arms, and lifted and subsisted many for the service of the late King James, in order to an invasion and insurrection in that county. That he was twice sent by those Gentlemen into France to the late King, to signify their readiness, and receive his further commands; and that, when he was at London, besides his employment of buying arms, and lifting soldiers, he helped some Jacobites over into France, and secured others, who came from thence, who, all of them, told him, that

'generally Sir John Freind furnished money for those expeditions, and paid subsistence-money to them as soldiers.' This evidence was confirmed by the testimony of George Wilson, who guided and assisted Lunt in the delivery of King James's commissions, and by the depositions and affidavits of several persons, (some at a great distance from, and utter strangers to one another) all agreeing in the most material circumstances of the Lancashire conspiracy.

The Government being fully informed of the plot, warrants were issued out to seize the conspirators; and though, for the greater secrecy, the names of the offenders were not put into the warrant at the Secretary's office by those who drew the warrants, but were afterwards put in by the Secretaries themselves, yet, by some treacherous correspondence, the Lancashire Gentlemen had notice given them of all proceedings at London. Upon this they burnt their commissions, buried their arms and other warlike equipage, under-ground, and most of them fled from their habitations. However, through the extraordinary care and diligence of Captain Baker, and others employed in that service, some of the plotters were apprehended, and arms enough found to convince the world, that there was a treasonable design on foot against the Government. There was likewise found in Mr Standish's closet, at the search made at Standish-Hall, on the 16th of July 1694, the draught of a remonstrance or declaration, to be printed and published at King James's landing; which, according to Mr Croft's papers, and Mr Robinson's depositions, was to be attempted very speedily.

As many of the persons accused, as could be apprehended, being brought up to London, and examined, were, some of them committed to the Tower, and others to Newgate, where they continued about a month. During this time, their friends and solicitors exerted all their skill and diligence to take off the King's evidence, both by offering them large sums of Money, as was attested by Mr Baker, Mrs Hearst, Mr Clayton, Mr Brown, and Mrs Elliot; and that failing, by finding out persons, who would represent the King's witnesses under heinous characters, that the Jury might give no credit to their depositions. Many persons were practised upon, some of whom refused so base an action; but others, through great importunities and promises of large rewards, were prevailed with to defame the King's evidences, both at Manchester, and in the Parliament-house. But that, which raised the great clamour against the discovery of the plot, was the gaining one Taffe, alias Thomas O Mullen, an Irishman, to the other side; which happened in this manner.

In

death of her late Majesty of blessed memory, and of the sermons of the late Archbishop, Bishop of Litchfield and Coventry, Bishop of Ely, Bishop of Salisbury, Dr Sherlock, Dr Wake, Mr Fleetwood, &c. preached upon that and several other solemn occasions: Being a vindication of the late Queen, his present Majesty, and the Government, from the malicious aspersions cast upon them in two late pamphlets, one intitled, Remarks on some late sermons, &c. the other, A Letter to the author of a sermon preached at the funeral of her late Majesty Queen Mary. The author of the remarks on some late sermons makes the following observations:

No. 17. Vol. III.

'That the Queen was taken sick and died, in the same month when her Father laboured under an natural rebellion, and about the same hour, that he went from Feverham; and was cut off in the middle of her days, according to the punishment threatened, to the breakers of the fifth commandment.' St. Tr. II. 534. So inveterate were the Jacobite Cleaggy against the Queen, for usurping (as they called it) her Father's throne, that one of them insulted her memory, with this text, Go now see this cursed woman and bury her, for she is a King's daughter.

(1) Taffe

1694-5. In December 1693, Lunt came from France, and being, as he afterwards pretended, troubled in conscience, for having engaged in the barbarous design of assassinating the King, resolved to atone for that crime, by discovering all he knew, that had been acted, or was then plotting against his Majesty. His coming over was made known to Mr Taffe, a familiar acquaintance of Lunt's wife, and who was represented to Lunt as a person, that had done some considerable service to the public (1). To him Lunt's wife had told, that her husband was lately come out of France; which made Taffe, who pretended to be zealous for the Government, enquire how matters stood at St Germain's? adding, that, if Lunt could discover any thing, that might be serviceable to their Majesties, he would introduce him to a person, that would receive his information. Lunt gives credit to Taffe, shews his willingness to make a discovery, and thereupon Taffe brings him to the Earl of Bellamont, and vouches for his honesty. After his Lordship had heard Lunt's relation, he commanded him to wait on him again in two or three days; which Lunt obeying, and his Lordship being somewhat indisposed, he sent Lunt with a letter to Sir John Trenchard. Taffe accompanied him thither, and the Secretary, hearing what Lunt had to discover, first sent him into Kent, and afterwards commanded him to put his depositions into writing, and bring them to him. Lunt performed it; Taffe heard all the information read, aggravated the crimes, and appeared the most forward of any to have the persons accused brought to justice; and, pretending to be serviceable in knowing the country and people there, he went down into Lancashire with Mr Aaron Smith and Mr Baker, and assisted the King's Messengers in searching at Standish-Hall, and other places.

Taffe shewed an extraordinary zeal in his Majesty's service, but might have been much more useful than he was in finding concealed arms and persons, if he had made more use of his head and less of his fingers. The managers of that affair, and the King's messengers, quickly perceiving his pilfering practices to be very injurious to the inhabitants, and no less scandalous to themselves, were forced to have as watchful an eye upon him, as upon the business they were employed in; though, notwithstanding all their care, he committed some gross felonies. Soon after he came to London, he waited on the Lord Bellamont, gave his Lordship an account of what persons and arms had been seized, that several Gentlemen had made their escapes, and that others absconded to secure themselves: Whereupon the Lord Bellamont asked Taffe, If this was the business, which Lunt had discovered? Taffe answered, it was, and that Lunt was the main evidence of the conspiracy; was very well known at the respective places, which he had mentioned in his depositions; and had done greater service at his being there, if the Lancashire Gentlemen had not received notice from London of their coming ten days before they came to Standish-Hall. This account being given to the Lord Bellamont, Taffe addressed himself to Mr Aaron Smith and Captain Baker, for the reward of his service; but, finding himself slighted and reprimanded for his scandalous behaviour, he grew angry, and resolved to revenge himself upon the Government, even to the spoiling of the plot. The friends, relations, and solicitors of the prisoners were no sooner acquainted with his design, but the bargain was struck, and his terms agreed to: Twenty pounds were paid him in hand, with assurance (as was afterwards sworn in the House of Lords) of a good annuity for life, to be settled in Lancashire; and, lest he should cool, he was immediately sent into the country to be their counter-evidence, when the trials should commence at Manchester.

Having thus gained Taffe, and got from unwary Lunt the names of the King's witnesses, and the whole matter of the evidence, the next attempt for defeating the whole plot was engaging Ferguson to write in defence of the Lancashire Gentlemen, and to asperse their accusers; and this stratagem had such a notable effect, that the Popish mob at Manchester animated by reading Ferguson's paper (which was almost in every hand in that county) had resolved to prevent the trials of the prisoners, by stoning the King's evidences to death. But those, who knew they would be acquitted, prevailed with the mob to forbear the execution of that inhuman resolution till the trials were ended. And indeed, no sooner were the trials over, and the witnesses leaving the town, but the mob endeavoured to stone them to death, and in such a violent and tumultuous manner, that not only the witnesses, but a Gentleman of Counsel for the King, the King's Prosecutor, and the King's Clerk in the Crown-Office, very narrowly escaped with their lives.

The trials began at Manchester the 16th of October 1694, where the King's evidence proved, 'That the prisoners at the bar had received commissions from the late King James, to raise war against the present Government; and to that end had bought arms, listed and subsisted soldiers at their own charge, &c.' It is affirmed, that Sir William Williams, though then one of the Counsel for the King, endeavoured to baffle and confound the King's witnesses, by asking them several frivolous questions; but, failing in that, he required Lunt to point at the several prisoners by name. In doing this, Lunt happened to point at a wrong man, which mistake might be occasioned by the crowd. However, this gratified the Popish mob, and raised a loud laugh. But their mirth continued

(1) Taffe was an Irish Priest, who had not only changed his religion, but had married in King James's time. He came into the service of the present Government, and had a small pension. He was long in pursuit of a discovery of the imposture in the birth of the Prince of Wales, and was engaged with more success in discovering the concealed estates of the Priests and the Religious Orders, in which some progress was made. These seemed to be sure evidences of the man's sincerity, at least in his opposition to those, whom he had forsaken, and whom he was provoking in so sensible a manner. This is mentioned chiefly to shew, how little that sort of men are to be depended on. He possessed those, to whom his other discoveries gave him access, of the importance of this Lunt, and was very zealous in supporting Lunt's credit, and in assisting him in his discoveries. Burnet, II. 142.

(1) By

1694-5. continued not long; for, another of the Judges commanding Lunt to touch and name all the accused Gentlemen with the Cryer's staff, he named them all right.

And acquitted.

Witnesses were afterwards produced for the prisoners, but nothing was alledged by them, that could invalidate the King's evidence, except Taffe's testimony, who boldly declared, 'That there was no truth in the pretended plot, the whole being a villainous contrivance between himself and Lunt;' which single declaration, without any oath, outweighed the testimonies of the ten positive witnesses for the King; and thereupon Sir William Williams, the chief manager of the trial, sat down in the court, and would examine no more witnesses against the prisoners. And so, without calling for the rest of the evidence, the matter was let fall; and, when the Judges gave the charge to the Jury, it was in favour of the prisoners; so that they were acquitted, and those, that were ordered to be tried after them, were all discharged without trial.

The whole party triumphed upon this as a victory, and complained both of the Ministers of State and of the Judges; and Sir William Williams, being returned to London, represented the plot as a wicked and horrible contrivance; upon which the Government, in abhorrence of such a design, immediately ordered the witnesses to be prosecuted for a conspiracy against the lives and estates of the Lancashire and Cheshire Gentlemen. This strange turn being given to the affair, many of the wiser sort of those, who were friends to the accused Gentlemen, and dreaded the consequence of a further inquiry, advised them to fit down quietly, and leave it to the Government to punish their accusers, if they saw fit; but some Lawyers over-ruled this advice, and so the Lancashire and Cheshire Gentlemen, on the 24th of November 1694, brought the affair into the House of Commons.

While this affair was depending, several witnesses were procured against the King's evidences in Parliament, by downright bribery, and by telling them, that they were not to be put to their oaths; and therefore, not being in danger of perjury, might safely and confidently tell all the stories, that were dictated to them (1). Indirect means were also used to asperse the Earl of Macclesfield, at that time Lord-Lieutenant of the county of Lancaster, who, being a professed friend to the Government, was, of consequence, thought by the Jacobites their mortal enemy.

Notes of the Commons about the Lancashire plot.

The House of Commons, after several hearings, strict examinations, and long debates, which continued at the several appointed times, the space of eleven weeks, on the 6th of February, 'proceeded farther in reading the information and papers delivered into the House by Mr Aaron Smith, touching the late proceedings and trials in Lancashire and Cheshire. Mr Lunt's information was read; as also Mr Wilson's and Mr Womball's; and other papers delivered into the House by Mr Aaron

Smith were likewise read; among which were several printed papers. Whereupon the House came to the following resolutions; first, That there did appear to the House, That there was sufficient grounds for the prosecution and trials of the Gentlemen at Manchester. And, secondly, That upon the informations and examinations before this House, it doth appear, That there was a dangerous plot carried on against the King and Government. At the same time the Commons ordered an act of the pretended Parliament of Ireland, held in the year 1689, recognizing the late King James, and two proclamations of that abdicated Prince, to be burnt by the hands of the common hangman. Besides this, the House, after having given an order for the taking Mr Standish of Standish-Hall in Lancashire into custody, and their messenger reporting, that he was not to be found, addressed the King to issue out a proclamation to apprehend him.

This disappointment in the House of Commons was no small mortification to the Jacobites; yet, in hopes of better success, they laid their complaints also before the House of Peers, where, after examining some witnesses, and many debates, the question being put, Whether the Government had sufficient cause to prosecute the Lancashire and Cheshire Gentlemen? It was carried in the affirmative; though the Earls of Rochester and Nottingham appeared with great zeal on the other side, and in conclusion protested against the vote, by which the Lords justified the proceedings against those Gentlemen.

The accused Gentlemen, notwithstanding these disappointments, at the next Lancaster assizes in August 1695, brought on trials upon an information of perjury against Lunt, Womball, and Wilson, three of the King's witnesses, who were all found guilty; and afterwards indicted for a conspiracy against the lives and estates of those Gentlemen. But, the Gentlemen refusing to furnish the King's Attorney and Solicitor-General with witnesses to prove the pretended perjuries, the prosecution was let fall, and Lunt, Womball, and Wilson discharged.

This design of throwing an imputation upon the Government failing, another was set up against the Bank, which began to have a flourishing credit, and had supplied the King so regularly with money, and that upon such reasonable terms, that those, who intended to make matters go heavily, tried what could be done to shake the credit of the Bank. But this attempt was rejected in both Houses with indignation; it being very evident, that public credit would signify little, if what was established, in one Session of Parliament, might be fallen upon and shaken in another.

The most remarkable business of this Session of Parliament was the inquiry into bribery, and the timely check given to the most scandalous and dangerous corruption, which had lately tainted, not only the Agents of the army, and several St. Tr. II. 476.

(1) By the late trial, it had manifestly appeared, how little the Crown gained by one thing, which yet was thought an advantage; that the witnesses for the prisoners were not upon oath: Many things were upon this occasion witnessed in favour of the prisoners, which were afterwards found to be notoriously false; and it is certain, that the terror of an oath is a great restraint, and many, whom an oath might over-awe, would more freely allow themselves the liberty of lying, in behalf of a prisoner, to save his life.

(1) The

1694-5. several Members of the House of Commons, but also the Speaker himself, and crept into his Majesty's Privy-council. The inquiry into these corrupt practices was as accidental as necessary.

The occasion of the inquiry

In the account of it, mention is made of the monstrous sums of thousands, and tens of thousands; yet, at the first, the payment of a petty sum of ten pounds, or less, had certainly prevented the discovery, the rise of which was from the just complaint of some inhabitants of Reydon in Hertsfordshire against the abuses of officers and soldiers in exacting subsistence-money.

Jan. 12.

This coming by petition, before the House of Commons, and the petitioners, and also Mr Tracey Pauncefort, Agent of Colonel Hastings's regiment, and the officers complained of, being heard and examined, it was unanimously resolved, 'That the officers and soldiers

Jan. 23.

'of the army demanding and exacting subsistence-money in their quarters, or upon their march, is arbitrary and illegal, and a great violation of the rights and liberties of the subject;' and thereupon ordered, 'That the Commissioners for taking and stating the public accounts do lay before the House their observations of the abuses and ill practices committed by the Agents of the regiments of the army; and that the Agent Pauncefort should forthwith lay before the House a particular account of all the monies received by him from the Earl of Ranelagh, and the times of such receipts since the 28th of May last; and how he had paid the sums, and when, and to whom, and what remained in his hands.'

Pursuant to this order, Mr Harley, from the Commissioners for taking and stating the public accounts, presented to the House their observations on the ill practices committed by the agents; which being taken into consideration, and Pauncefort, upon bringing in his account, being examined, as also Colonel Hastings, Major Montcal, and some other officers and agents, it was resolved by the House, 'That Agent Tracey Pauncefort,

'for neglecting to pay the subsistence-money

'to the officers and soldiers, that quartered at Reydon, having monies in his hands to do the same, be taken into the custody of the Sergeant at Arms attending the House.' About a fortnight after Pauncefort was again examined, and refusing to answer to several questions, tho' required upon pain of being proceeded against with the utmost rigour and severity, it was unanimously resolved, 'That, by his absolute refusal to answer to a matter of fact, demanded of him by the House, he had violated the privilege, and contemned the authority of the House, and the fundamental constitution thereof;' for which offence he was immediately committed prisoner to the Tower.

His brother, Mr Edward Pauncefort, was next brought upon the stage, who being summoned, and examined by the House, it was resolved, 'That he, for contriving to cheat Feb. 16. Colonel Hastings's regiment of five hundred guineas, and for giving a bribe to obtain the King's bounty, be taken into custody.' Then immediately followed Mr Henry Guy, a Member of the House, and Secretary of the Treasury, who, for having taken a bribe of two hundred guineas for procuring the arrears due to a regiment, to be paid, was sent to the Tower, and turned out of his place. Many were the more sharpened against him, because it was believed, that he, as well as Trevor the Speaker, were deeply concerned in corrupting the Members of the House of Commons. He had held his place both in King Charles's and King James's time: And the share he had, in the secret distribution of money, had made him a necessary man for those methods.

For the redress of these things the Commons aged upon a representation to be made to the King, setting forth the notorious abuses, ill practices, and intolerable exactions of the Colonels and their agents, upon the inferior officers and common soldiers, which the King promised to take all possible care to have redressed (1). Accordingly Colonel Hastings was immediately cashiered,

(1) The representation was as follows:

I. That some of the agents had detained the money due to the soldiers in their hands, and made use of it for their own advantage, instead of immediately applying it to the subsistence of the officers and soldiers, for whom they were intrusted. II. That by their intolerable exactions, and great extortions, upon the officers and soldiers, for paying by way of advance, and by their charging more for the discount of tallies, than they actually paid, it appeared, that those who served in his Majesty's armies, notwithstanding they had a greater pay, than is given in any other part of the world, they were yet reduced to inconveniences and extremities, which ought not to be put upon those, who venture their lives for the honour and safety of the nation. III. That in particular Colonel Hastings had compelled some officers of his regiment to take their clothes from him at extravagant rates, by confining and threatening those, that would not comply therewith; by which the authority, that might be necessary to be lodged in the Colonel over the inferior officers, in some cases was misapplied, and extended so as to promote a private advantage of his own, without any regard to his Majesty's service, or to the discipline of the army. IV. That Colonel Hastings's Agent had presumed fraudulently to detain five hundred guineas out of a bounty given by his Majesty to the officers of the regiment, under pretence of giving them as a bribe to obtain the same, to the dishonour of his Majesty, and injury to the officers; and had taken two-pence per pound out of the money due to the officers and soldiers, for which deduction there being no warrant, the Colonel, whose servant the Agent is, was answerable. V. That Colonel Hastings's Agent had refused or neglected to give an account of the pay due to the Captains of his regiment, and their companies, which tended apparently to the defrauding the officers and soldiers. VI. That some of the Agents assumed to themselves the liberty of making great deductions, which since they knew not how to justify, they endeavoured to cover, by putting them under the shelter of the uncertain head of contingences, which gave them the better opportunity of hiding the frauds and abuses, that would otherwise be more liable to be detected. VII. That Colonel Hastings had discharged an ensign, by putting another into his room, contrary to the true discipline of an army; from which the Colonels have no right to exempt themselves, to enlarge their own authority, to the prejudice of his Majesty's service, and of the officers, that serve under them. VIII. That Colonel Hastings had taken money for the recommending to commands in his regiment, to the great discouragement of the officers, who were to serve in his Majesty's armies, who ought to be such, as deserved their commands, and not such as paid for them.'

(1.) The

1694-5. shiered, and his regiment given to Sir John Jacob his Lieutenant-Colonel.

Feb. 19. Some time before, the King in Council was pleased to order the chief officers of the army to meet twice a week, at the Great Chamber at the Horse-Guards at Whitehall, to receive and examine all informations and complaints, that should be brought before them, of any wrong or injury done by an officer or soldier of his Majesty's land-forces, in order to redress the same. And on the 13th of March was published his Majesty's declaration for the strict discipline of the army, whereby in particular all officers and soldiers were forbid to exact or demand subsistence-money in their quarters, or on their march.

To get a further insight into the ill practices of the Colonels and their Agents, Mr James Craggs, one of the Contractors, for the clothing of the army, was summoned to attend the House of Commons; but upon his refusal to produce his books, and to be examined before the Commissioners for taking and stating the public accounts, thereby obstructing the enquiry of the House into the disposal of the public monies, it was resolved, 'That he be committed prisoner to the Tower of London.'

Mr Richard Harnage another Contractor, refusing also to be examined upon oath before the Commissioners, a bill was ordered to be brought in, to oblige Mr Edw. and Mr Tracy Pauncefort, Mr Craggs, and Mr Harnage, to discover how they disposed of the money paid into their hands, relating to the army. A few days after Harnage was likewise ordered to be taken into custody.

About the same time a loud clamour of bribery was raised against the Commissioners for licensing hackney-coaches; and the House of Commons having appointed a Committee to examine the matter, they made their report to the House, 'That several of the Commissioners had, by receiving bribes, and by other undue means, acted corruptly and arbitrarily, contrary to the authority and trust reposed in them by act of Parliament.' Upon which the House ordered the Committee to distinguish the Commissioners, which they accordingly did; and by their report of the 20th of March, Henry Albury and Walter Overbury, two of the Commissioners, were honourably cleared; and the others, Henry Killegrew, Henry Villers, and Richard Gee, declared guilty, upon which the House resolved, 'That an address be made to his Majesty, to remove them from the commission for licensing hackney-coaches;' which was accordingly done, and they were removed.

From these small beginnings, a common murmur arose, that an universal corruption had overspread the nation; that Court, Camp, and City were tainted, nay, the very Parliament itself infected. The House of Commons, being awakened by the alarm, resolved to search into the bottom of the reigning corruption. They began with appointing a Committee, to inspect the books of the Chamberlain of London, and of the East-India Company, and impowered them to send for persons and papers (1).

The inspection of the Chamberlain's books related chiefly to the Orphans affair. The City of London had several years solicited in vain, to have a bill passed, for payment of the debt due to the Orphans. This debt grew into a great burden on the City, during the Magistracy of Moor, Pritchard, Norib, Rich, and some others. Many hundred Orphans starved, for want of their portions, which had been put into the Chamberlain's hands, on the security of the City; but, as the Exchequer was shut up in King Charles's time, so the Chamber of London was also shut up, and bankruptcy pleaded to the demand of the distressed Orphans. When the management of the City-affairs fell into better hands, a Committee was appointed to enquire into this matter, who, finding that nothing had been done after three years troublesome solicitation, and that several bills had been brought into the House of Commons, for the relief of the Orphans, but they were always lost or so clogged, that a bill could not pass through the House in a Session, thought the most effectual way, to prevent the starving of these Orphans, would be to give some men of interest what they should require; and engage them to do for profit, what they would not do for justice.

Accordingly, by a proper application and disposal of several sums of money, a bill (as hath been related) passed in the last Session of Parliament, creating a fund for the repayment of the debt owing to the Orphans, by the Chamber of London *. Among the sums distributed * See p. 251. on this occasion, it was found that the Chamber had made Sir John Trevor, the Speaker, a present of a thousand guineas, for the service he did them in this affair. This was entered in their books, so that full proof was made of it. It was indeed believed, that a much greater present had been made him, in behalf of the Orphans: But no proof of that appeared, whereas what had been taken, in so public a manner, could not be hid. This was objected to Trevor, as corruption and a breach of trust, and, upon it, he was expelled the House; and Mr Paul Foley was chosen Speaker in his room, who had got credit by his integrity and constant complaining of the administration. Mr John Hungerford, a Member of the House of Commons, was also found to have received twenty guineas upon the same account, for which he was likewise expelled the House (2).

One discovery making way for another, the East-India Company's affair. Burnet.

(1) The Commissioners were, Mr Paul Foley, Sir Richard Onslow, Mr John Pollexfen, Sir John Thompson, Mr Foot Onslow, Mr Thomas Pelham, Sir Samuel Barnardiston, the Honourable Mr Thomas Wharton, and Mr Francis Gwin.

(2) The reader may see a large account of this matter in the collection of the proceedings in Parliament in 1694 and 1695, published in the second volume of State Tracts, p. 481. The substance of which is as follows:

The Committee reported, That, having inspected Numb. XVIII. Vol. III.

the Chamberlain of London's books, they found an order made by a Committee of the Common-Council for the City of London (appointed to consider of ways and means for satisfying the debts due to the Orphans of the said City) and dated the 12th of February 1693-4, by which the Chamberlain was directed to pay to Sir John Trevor, Speaker of the House of Commons, the sum of one thousand guineas, so soon as a bill were passed into an act of Parliament for satisfying the debts of the Orphans, and other creditors of the said City; which sum was paid and delivered to Sir John Trevor,

1694-5. Committee for inspecting the East-India Company's books found that there were entries made of great sums given, for secret service done the Company, that amounted to 170,000 l. and it was generally believed, that the greatest part of it had gone among the Members of the House of Commons; for the two preceding winters, there had been attempts, eagerly pursued by some, for breaking the Company, and either opening a free trade to the Indies, or, at least, erecting a new Company: But it was observed, that some of the hottest sticklers against the Company did, insensibly, not only fall off from that heat, but turned to serve the Company, as much as they had at first endeavoured to destroy it. Seymour was among the chief of these: And it was said, that he had 12000 l. of their money, under the colour of a bargain for their Salt-petre. Great pains and art was used to stifle this enquiry; but curiosity, envy, and ill-nature, as well as virtue, will on such occasions always prevail, to set on enquiries. Those, who have had nothing, desire to know who have had something, while the guilty persons dare not shew too great a concern in opposing discoveries. Sir Thomas Cooke, a rich merchant, who was Governor of the Company, was examined concerning that great sum given for secret service; but he refused to answer. So a severe bill was brought in against him, in case he should not, by a prefixed day, confess how all that money had been disposed of. When the bill was sent up to the Lords, and was like to pass, he came in, and offered to make a full discovery, if he might be indemnified, for all that he had done, or that he might say in 1694-5. that matter: The enemies of the Court hoped for great discoveries, that should disgrace both the Ministers and the Favourites; but it appeared, that, whereas both King Charles and King James had obliged the Company, to make them a yearly present of 10,000 l. that the King had received this but once; and that, though the Company offered a present of 50,000 l. if the King would grant them a new charter, and consent to an act of Parliament confirming it, the King had refused to hearken to it. There were indeed presumptions, that the Marquis of Caermarthen had taken a present of 5000 guineas, which were sent back to Sir Thomas Cooke, the morning before he was to make his discovery. The Lords appointed twelve of their body to meet with twenty-four of the House of Commons, to examine into this matter; but they were so ill satisfied with the account, that was given them, by the four persons who had been intrusted with this secret, that by a particular act, that passed both Houses, they were committed to the Tower of London, till the end of the next Session of Parliament, and restrained from disposing of their estates, real or personal. These were proceedings of an extraordinary nature, which could not be justified, but from the extraordinary occasion that was given for them. Some said, this looked like the setting up a court of inquisition, when new laws were made on purpose to discover secret transactions; and that no bounds could be set to such a method of proceeding. Others said, that, when entries were made of such sums, secretly disposed of,

on the 22d of June 1694, in the presence of Sir Robert Clayton and Sir James Houlton. That they observed, that the order of the Committee of the Common-Council, which now stood dated the 12th of February, was at first dated the 13th of February; and that the person named therein was put in a different hand. That examining, who first writ the warrant, Mr Barrett, the City Solicitor, owned it was his handwriting; and at first said, that he believed the blank at first left therein was filled up with the Speaker's name, before the Committee signed it, because he believed they would not set their hands to a blank. But all the Committee, who signed it, and who appeared upon summons, declared most of them positively, that there was a blank for the person's name, when they signed it; and the rest being doubtful, Mr Barrett then said, that the blank might be filled up afterwards, though he could not tell the time: However, he owned he filled it up with another pen. That they found another order of the said Committee dated the 26th of April 1693, directing the Chamberlain to pay to Paul Jodrell, Esq; the sum of a hundred guineas for his pains and service in assisting the Orphans bill to pass in Parliament; which sum was paid him the 22d of June 1694. That in the Chamberlain's books were entered several sums paid to Mr Barrett, to defray the charge of drawing the Bill, making copies thereof, and of the petitions and orders relating to the same; amongst which payments they found five guineas paid to Mr Solicitor-General for his advice therein, five guineas to Mr Harcourt, twenty guineas to Mr Hungerford, Chairman of the Grand Committee, for his pains and service, and 60 l. 9 s. to Mr Jodrell. That they understood, that the Orphans, for the procuring of this bill, had giving bond to Mr Smith and Mr Charles Neis, to allow them 12 d. in the pound, when the bill was passed, for their pains and charges in that matter; which contract being made void in that bill, the Court of Aldermen were impowered to satisfy them for their real expences. That upon this Smith and Neis applied themselves to the Court of Aldermen, and got a petition to be signed by many of the Orphans, that they were willing, notwithstanding the act of Parliament, they should be allowed 12 d. in the pound. That the said Neis and Smith brought in a bill to the Committee of the Common-Council of their charges, amounting to 3457 l. 16 s. but, as was alleged, they pretended to be more than 10,000 l. out of purse; by which argument they got subscriptions to the said petition; in which bill there was charged 1650 l. paid to Mr George Finch, for carrying on the said act. That, Mr Neis and Mr Smith being examined, they utterly denied, that they had given any money to any Member of Parliament on the account of the said bill, or knew of any to be given; but they were willing to get what they could, having taken a great deal of pains in long soliciting the same; and that they did say, that, notwithstanding they charged 1650 l. to be paid Mr George Finch, yet they had not paid him any money; but, having delivered up his bond for the 12 d. in the pound, they valued his share of the Orphans debt to amount to that sum. That Mr George Finch, being examined, denied to have received any thing from Mr Neis and Mr Smith, or his paying any money to any Member of Parliament; but wavering in his discourse, and being again asked, if he ever did distribute, or knew of any money distributed on account of the Orphans bill, he said, It was a hard thing to be asked such questions: That however he owned, that upon suggestion, that there were obstructions to the bill, which must be removed by money, he applied himself to several of the Orphans, and received 100 l. from Mr John Chadwick, 200 l. from Mr Harvey, 100 l. from Mr Scott, a 50 l. from Mr Horne, and had a promise of 100 l. from Sir John Smith, which was not yet paid. And lastly, they reported, that Mr Chadwick and Mr Horne proved the payment of the money to Mr George Finch, but could give no account what he had done with it.

The Commons, having debated and weighed the report,

1694-5. of, it was as just for a Parliament to force a confession, as it was common in the course of the law to subpoena a man, to declare all his knowledge of any matter, how secretly soever it might have been managed, and what person soever might have been concerned in it. The Lord President felt, that he was deeply wounded with this discovery; for, while the act, against Cooke, was passing in the House of Lords, he took occasion to affirm, with solemn protestations, that he himself was not at all concerned in that matter; but now all had broke out: One Firebrass a merchant, employed by the East-India Company, had treated with Bates, a friend of the Marquis of Caermarthen's; and for the favour that Lord was to do them, in procuring them a new charter, Bates was to have for his use five thousand guineas. But now a new turn was to be given to all this: Bates swore, that he indeed received the money, and that he offered it to that Lord, who positively refused to take it: But, since it was already paid in, he advised Bates to keep it to himself: though, by the examination, it appeared, that Bates was to have five hundred pounds for his own negotiating the affair: It did also appear, that the money was paid to one of that Lord's servants; but he could not be come at: Upon this discovery, the House of Commons voted an impeachment for a misdemeanour against the Lord President; he, to prevent that desired to be heard speak to that House in his own justification; when he was before them, he set out the services that he had done the nation, in terms that were not thought very decent; he assumed the greatest share of the honour of the Revolution to himself; he expressed a great uneasiness, to be brought under so black an imputation, from which he cleared himself as much as words could do; in the end, he desired a present trial. Articles were upon that brought against him; he, in answer to these, denied his having received the money. But his servant, whose testimony only could have cleared that point, disappearing, the suspicion stuck still on him. It was intended to hang up the matter to another Session; but an act of Grace came in the end of this, with an exception indeed as to corruption; yet this whole discovery was let fall, and it was believed, too many of all sides were concerned in it: For, by a common consent, it was never revived (1).

Whilst

ports, came to this resolution, 'That Sir John Trevor, Speaker of the House, receiving a gratuity of 1000 guineas from the City of London, after passing of the Orphans bill, was guilty of a high crime and misdemeanour.'

Sir John Trevor absented himself from the House, the Commons, on the 14th of March, resolved to proceed to the election of a new Speaker; and Sir Thomas Littleton and Mr Paul Foley were proposed. The majority inclined to choose Littleton; but Mr Wharton, Comptroller of the King's household, having spoken in his behalf, the Commons from thence presumed, that he was altogether in the Court-interest, and thereupon elected Mr Foley.

On the 16th of March the Commons proceeded upon the abovementioned reports, and resolved, 'That Sir John Trevor, their late Speaker, being guilty of a high crime and misdemeanour, &c. be expelled the House.' Two days after they passed another vote, 'That whosoever should discover any money or other gratuity given to any Member of the House, for matters transacted in the House, relating to the Orphans bill, or the East-India Company, should have the indemnity of the House for such gift;' and ordered, that Mr Charles Nois and several others should attend the House the next day. Mr Nois attended accordingly, and being examined, it was resolved, 'That he, having to several persons pretended he was out of purse, or engaged to give great sums of money to several Members of the House, in order to pass the Orphans bill, which, on his examination, he denied to have given or promised, had been an occasion of scandal to the House and the Members thereof.' And thereupon it was ordered, that the said Mr Nois be taken into the custody of the Serjeant at Arms attending the House.

On the 26th of March 1695, it was resolved by the Commons, 'That Mr Hungerford, one of their Members, having received twenty guineas for his pains and service as Chairman of the Committee of the House, to whom the Orphans bill was committed, was guilty of a high crime and misdemeanour; and that he be expelled the House.'

(1) In the collection of the proceedings in Parliament mentioned in the foregoing note, the reader may likewise find an account of the East-India Company's affair, from whence the following extract is taken.

On the 12th of March Mr Foley reported from the said Committee, that, as soon as they came to the East-India House, they called for an account of all monies paid for the special service of the Company; upon perusal of which observing, that the greatest payment was in the year 1693, they searched for the orders for the issuing of that money, the chief of which were, one dated the 13th of April 1693, another dated the 24th of November 1693, and another the 22d of January 1693-4; in pursuance of which the sums of 22275 l. 24983 l. and 30000 l. were severally paid out of the cash, amounting in all to 77258 l. besides several smaller sums, amounting in the whole to 10144 l. which, with the former sum, made 87402 l. all issued out in the year 1693, while Sir Thomas Cooke was Governor, and Francis Tysen, Esq; Deputy-governor, for the special service of the House, and obtaining a new charter. That they found by examination of most of the persons present at the Committees of the East-India Company, where the said orders were made. That the Governor in the said Committees did only, in general, inform what sums he had disbursed, without naming the particulars, to whom, or to what service; which several of them said was a new course, since Sir Thomas Cooke came to be Deputy-governor or Governor. That in a state of the Company's cash, dated at the East-India House the 7th of March 1694-5, and drawn up by several Members of the Company empowered for that purpose, near all the aforesaid sums were observed to be paid and placed to the Company's account of charges general, paid out of cash, viz. in 1688 and 1689, Sir Benjamin Bathurst Governor, and Sir Josiah Child Deputy-governor, 2230 l. 14 s. In 1690 and 1691, Sir Joseph Herne Governor, and Sir Thomas Cooke Deputy-governor, 13532 l. 9 s. In 1692 and 1693, Sir Thomas Cooke Governor, and Mr Tysen Deputy-governor, 87,402 l. 12 s. in the whole 103165 l. 15 s. That upon examination of the Company's cash-book, having found that the balance, the 31st of October 1694, was 124249 l. they demanded of Mr Portman the cashier, if he had the same in cash. That he replied, he had not, but instead thereof laid before them in writing, that 90,000 l. was lent upon Sir Thomas Cooke's notes (which he produced) with other particulars, which made up the abovementioned balance. That in this note Sir Thomas Cooke owned the receipt of 90000 l. which he had disbursed and paid for 99197 l. stock in the East-India Company for their account; though they did not find any warrant for the said sum, or any of the stock transferred in the Company's books for their account, exceeding 18300 l. stock the 16th of January 1694-5. The Committee of the House of Commons further reported, that they found a contract, dated the 26th of February 1693, for 200 tons of salt-petre, to be brought home in the ship Seymour from India,

May 3.

Whilst the Lords were debating on the Duke of Leeds's affair, and the Commons proceeding to impeach other persons concerned in this corruption, the King came to the House of Peers, and, sending for the Commons, put an end to the Session with the following speech:

My Lords and Gentlemen,

The King's Speech.
Pr. H. C.
II. 471.

I Am come to give you thanks for the supplies provided for carrying on the war, in which we are engaged, and at the same time to conclude this Session, which cannot be continued longer without manifest prejudice to the ends, for which these supplies are given; the season of the year making it so necessary for me to be abroad, that it were to be wished our business at home would have allowed me to have been there sooner.

'I will take care to place the Administration of affairs, during my absence, in such persons, on whose care and fidelity I can entirely depend; and I doubt not, my Lords and Gentlemen, but every one of you, in your

India, to pay 12000 l. for the same, and 25 l. freight per tun, besides all charges here. That 2000 l. which was the sum sent out to purchase the salt-petre, was actually paid out of the Company's cash; and that a bond for the remaining 10000 l. was given under the seal of the Company, payable the 31st of March 1695, whether the said ship arrived in safety or not, with this limitation only, that, if 200 tun of salt-petre be not laden upon the said ship, then to repay in proportion to the want thereof; so that the result of this contract was, that the Company ran the adventure of 12000 l. for that, which cost only 2000 l. and must consequently lose 12000 l. if the ship miscarried. And on the other hand, the seller got 10000 l. clear, without disburser or running the hazard of one penny; and, what is yet more, a certain loss of 9 or 10000 l. would attend it, if the ship arrived in safety. That the Committee, having examined the Members of the Company concerning this contract, they owned it to be true: That the 2000 l. was paid, and 10000 l. bond given to Mr Thomas Coston. That, about the same time this contract was made, so many of the interlopers, as would sell their shares in the interlopers to the East-India Company, were allowed their first cost, and 25 l. per cent. advance; which was done by giving them credit for so much in the East-India books. That the Committee found Sir Samuel Dashwood, Sir John Fleet, Mr John Perry, Sir Joseph Herne, and Sir Thomas Cooke, were present at the Court of Committees, when the orders abovementioned were made; but, they being all Members of the House of Commons, the Committee did not think fit to examine them. That the rest of the Committees, who were present at making those orders, and most of whom had been examined, could give no account of the disposal of the money issued out during the time of Sir Joseph Herne's and Sir Thomas Cooke's Government, but only that the same was paid for special service; and that a great part thereof was put into the hands of Sir Basil Firebrass: That one of them, viz. Sir Benjamin Bathurst, said, that Sir Joseph Herne had the greatest part of 13932 l. 9 s. to dispose of; and Sir Benjamin Bathurst would have called for an account thereof, but Sir Thomas Cooke desired he would not: That the Company's Committee of nine had often called upon Sir Thomas Cooke to give an account to whom he had distributed the money he received, which he had some time promised, and afterwards declined to do; so that the secret of that service, and the placing of that money, lay principally with Sir Thomas Cooke and Sir Joseph Herne. That, Sir Benjamin Bathurst finding so great a sum as 30000 l. charged for secret services, he had some warm discourse with Sir Thomas Cooke about it, to know how it was disbursed; but Sir Thomas refused to give him any particulars, and told him, he should remember he was bound by his oath to the Company to keep their secrets; to which Sir Benjamin replied, 'He was under the same obligation to be true to the interest of the Company.' Sir Benjamin Bathurst further said, that, about April 1694, understanding, that they were in want of money, he looked into the cash-book; which casting up, he found a considerable sum in cash, and, taking some persons with him, discoursed Sir Thomas Cooke about it, who said, 'The 90000 l. he had received was to gratify some persons, in case the bill should pass.'

As for the contract about salt-petre, Sir Benjamin Bathurst said, that it was made by Sir Thomas Cooke and Sir Basil Firebrass; but he knew nothing of it till it came into Court.

The Committee likewise reported, that Sir Basil Firebrass, being examined, owned he had received upwards of 16000 l. which was for buying shares of stocks, and of which the Company had allowed; but said, he knew no ground the Committee of nine had to say, that a great part of the other sums were put into his hands. He confessed, that he invited several persons to come into the Company, and offered to lay down money for several; and that, if they liked it not at the year's end, he would then take it off their hands, which offer he made to Members of the House of Commons among others; and gave an account to the Company of his doing so, who promised to indemnify him. That, concerning the accommodation with the interlopers, the Company had a letter from the Earl of Nottingham, 'That it was the King's pleasure, that they should come to an agreement with the interlopers.' That the proposal to them was 25 per cent. for bringing in their stock to the Company, and one half of the profit besides, which one half of the interlopers accepted; but, Mr Godfrey, and some others, standing upon 30 per cent. Mr Coston went off with them, and did not come into the Company. That Mr Ward said it was agreed by the interlopers, that only 2000 l. should be employed in buying of salt-petre: That Mr Coston was to have the advantage of it, which he believed was not for Mr Coston himself, but for some other Gentleman: And lastly, that the original inducement to the leave of the interlopers going out was that agreement with Mr Coston.

On the 26th of March, the Commons ordered, 'That Sir Thomas Cooke, a Member of the House, do give an account, how the 87402 l. mentioned in the report, was distributed; which he refusing to do, he was thereupon committed prisoner to the Tower of London, and a bill was ordered to be brought in, to oblige him to make the said discovery. On the 28th of March, the bill was presented, received, and read the first time; the Cashier of the East-India Company ordered to produce the warrants for the sums mentioned, in the report to be paid for special service or charges general; and the contract for salt-petre, offered to the House by Mr Coston, read and examined. The next day the bill was read a second time, and committed to a Committee of the whole House, and the Cashier of the East-India Company produced the warrants, according to order. On the 30th of March, Sir Basil Firebrass delivered in an account of monies by him paid, upon account of the East-India Company, which was examined, and Sir Thomas Cooke petitioned the House, that he might be heard by Counsel, before the Bill against him should pass; which was granted.

Upon the 2d of April, the Commons, in a Grand Committee, went through the bill, to oblige Sir Thomas Cooke to account, made several amendments to it, and ordered it to be reported the next day. Accordingly on the 3d of April, Mr Bridges reported the amendments made to that bill, which were agreed unto, and the bill, so amended, ordered to be engrossed. Upon the 6th of the same month, Sir Thomas Cooke's Counsel having been heard, the bill against him was read the third time, and passed, and sent up to the Lords for their concurrence.

At

1695. 'your several stations, will be assisting to them.
'This is what I require of you, and that you
'be more than ordinarily vigilant in preferring
'the public peace.'

Then the Lord-Keeper, by his Majesty's command, prorogued the Parliament to the 18th of June.

At the first reading of this bill in the House of Lords, the Duke of Leeds, Lord President of his Majesty's Privy-council, spoke vehemently against it, having introduced his discourse by a solemn protestation of his own innocence and disinterestedness in this matter; which anticipated apology for himself, together with the abhorrence of so necessary a law, began to raise great suspicions against his Grace. On the 13th of April the Lords sent a message to the House of Commons, to desire them, that Sir Thomas Cooke, a Member of their House, and now a prisoner in the Tower; might be permitted and ordered to appear at the Bar of the Lords, whereupon the Commons ordered, that he should attend their Lordships, as was desired. Sir Thomas Cooke being brought, upon his petition, to the bar of the Lords, declared himself ready and very willing to make a full discovery, and said, he would have done it before in the House of Commons, if he could have obtained there an indemnifying vote. Thereupon it being demanded of him, What he would be indemnified from? He answered, all actions and suits, except from the East-India Company, whom, if he had injured, he would be bound to suffer the severest punishment. He desired also to be indemnified from Scandalums; and it being asked him, Whether he meant Scandalum Magnatum? he said, Yes.

He being withdrawn, the Duke of Leeds stood up, and declared, 'That he was very glad, that Gentleman was come to such a temper, as to be willing to discover; whereby that bill was prevented, which his Grace esteemed of so pernicious a nature.' His Grace observed to their Lordships, 'how the Commons took care of the reputation of their House, in asking Sir Thomas Cooke, Whether he had distributed any money among any of their Members? Who purged them by a solemn protestation, that he had not.' His Grace therefore thought it reasonable, that the Lords should have some regard to themselves; and moved, That Sir Thomas Cooke might be called in, and asked, 'Whether he was willing, upon oath, to purge all that fat there?' This motion being rejected, the Lords resolved, that the bill sent up from the Commons against Sir Thomas Cooke should not be proceeded upon, but appointed a Committee to draw up a bill to indemnify him.

That Committee being withdrawn, and having made some progress, notice came from Sir Thomas Cooke, that he was afraid he might be misapprehended as to what he had said concerning a discovery, in that he said he was willing and ready; for by ready he only meant willing; and that he should need at least four months to make the discovery he promised. This was highly resented by some of the Lords of the Committee, who immediately moved, that the Committee might rise and report to the House this fresh matter, and the trifling of Sir Thomas Cooke; so that the bill designed to oblige him to give an account might now proceed. But some Lords softened this, and Sir Thomas Cooke begging a favourable treatment, and engaging to discover within seven days, the Committee went on with the bill, 'to indemnify him from actions, which he might be liable to, by reason of his discovery, to whom he had distributed several sums of money therein mentioned, to be received out of the treasure of the East-India Company, or for any prosecution for such distribution.'

This bill having passed both Houses by the 19th of April, his Majesty, on the 22d, came to the House of Lords, and gave his assent to it.

As soon as the act to indemnify Sir Thomas Cooke was passed, the Lords, by a message, acquainted the Commons, that they had resolved to nominate twelve

No. 18. VOL. III.

During this Session, a bill was passed for preventing the clipping and counterfeiting the current coin of the Kingdom. The state of the silver coin was now extremely bad. There were two sorts of it; the one was milled, and could not be practised on: But the other was not so, and was subject to clipping; and, in a course of

of their House to be of the Committee of Lords and Commons appointed by the said act, and accordingly nominated,

The Earl of Pembroke,	Earl of Monmouth,
Lord Privy Seal,	Earl of Marlborough,
Duke of Shrewsbury,	Earl of Torrington,
Earl of Manchester,	Lord Viscount Howe,
Earl of Bridgewater,	Lord Cornwallis,
Earl of Thanet,	Lord Godephuin,
Earl of Rochester,

Whereupon the Commons resolved, that twenty-four of their House should be nominated to be of that Committee, who were as follow:

Sir John Thompson,	Mr Harley,
Sir Richard Onslow,	Sir Walter Young,
Mr Bridges,	Sir Christopher Musgrave,
Mr Charles Montagu,	Sir Edward Abney,
Mr Henry Boyle,	Mr Chadwick,
Sir Henry Hobart,	Sir Herbert Croft,
Sir Thomas Littleton,	Sir Rowland Gwyn,
Mr Hutchinson,	Mr Papillon,
Mr Beccaven,	Sir William Cooper,
Sir Thomas Pope Blount,	Mr Brockman,
Mr Clarke,	Mr Gwyn,
Mr Pelham,
The Honourable Thomas Wharton, Esq;

On the 23d of April, Sir Thomas Cooke appeared before the Committee, and, being sworn, delivered to them in writing his Discovery of the disposal and application of the sums of 67000*l.* and 9000*l.* In the account of the 67000*l.* the sum of 10000*l.* was mentioned to be delivered to Francis Tyssen, Esq; 12000*l.* to Mr Richard Alton, 338*l.* to Mr Nathaniel Molyneux, 220*l.* to Sir John Chardin, 350*l.* to Paul Doctinque, Esq; 382*l.* to Captain John Germain, 1000 guineas to Colonel Fitz Patrick, 545*l.* to Charles Bates, Esq; and 40000*l.* to Sir Basil Firebrass; all which forementioned sums were said to be paid for special service of the East-India Company, to defray the charges, and acknowledge the pains and services of the aforementioned persons and their friends, on soliciting to prevent a new settlement of the East-India Company, and to endeavour the establishment of the old; or in consideration of losses they had by the East-India Stock. Besides 500 guineas paid to the Attorney-General, 200 to the Solicitor-General, and 200 more to Mr Sambrook, for the great trouble and charges in passing the Charter, and other affairs relating to the Company. As for the sum of 90000*l.* mentioned in the bill, the same was said to be laid out in buying East-India Stock of several persons, for account of the East-India Company.

The original being read by Sir Thomas Cook, and the Committee conceiving it to be imperfect, and not such as the act required, they acquainted him, that they expected a more particular account of those matters. Whereupon Sir Thomas Cooke said, 'That as to the first sum of 10000*l.* the same was paid to Mr Tyssen in tallies in November 1692: That he gave him no directions, how it should be disposed, but it was in expectation to have the charter of the East-India Company confirmed, and new regulations thereto made. That it was intended for the service of the King. That he could not say the King had it; but believed Mr Tyssen told him, that he delivered it to Sir Josiah Child, who delivered it to his Majesty; adding, that it was a customary present, and

that

1635. some years, the old money was every year so much diminished, that it at last grew to be less than the half of the intrinsic value; those, who drove this trade, were as much enriched, as the nation suffered by it: When it came to be generally observed, the King was advised to issue out a proclamation, that no money should pass for the future, by the tale, but by the weight, which would put a present end to clipping. But Seymour, being then in the Treasury, opposed this; he advised the King to look on, 1695. and let that matter have its course: The Parliament would in due time take care of it; but, in the mean while, the badness of money quickened the circulation, while every one studied to put out of his hands all the bad money; and this would make all people the readier to bring their cash into the Exchequer; and so a loan was more easily made. The badness of the money began now to grow very visible; it was plain, that no remedy that in King Charles's and other former reigns, the like had been done for several years; which by the books of the Company might appear. That, as to the 12000*l.* next mentioned in the account, that sum was paid to Mr Richard Alton about the same time, who declared, he had several friends capable of doing great service to the Company's affairs, and several of them would speak with Parliament-men. That he could not particularize who they were, but the end aimed at was to get an act of Parliament. That he knew no man besides Mr Alton who could give an account, who had that money: That he intrusted it wholly with Mr Alton, with the Privy of Sir Josiah Child, who recommended Alton as an honest and able man, and a person capable of doing the Company service; the Court having given him power as he conceived to dispose of the money by another hand as well as by his own. That the inducements for giving this money were fears of the interlopers going out, and subscriptions for a new Company going on; by which they apprehended the Company would be ruined. That there was a bill at that time for another East-India Company; and that the King had sent a message to the House of Commons to settle the East-India trade. That 10000*l.* was advanced by Alton himself, and not repaid him in some months after; which money he believed Alton paid away the same session; and that the other 2000*l.* to Alton was for interest, and his pains and expences, which were great. That Alton did say, He could tell some persons employed in that affair: That he did understand, that this money was to be laid out for promoting their affairs in Parliament: That he could not say to whom it was given, but understood it went no further than the House of Commons; and that he found no good fruit by such distribution. As to the 3284*l.* paid to Mr Molyneux, Sir Thomas Cooke said, that Mr Molyneux told him, this money was to be disposed of to the Lord Rivers; but since his confinement Molyneux had told him, that my Lord never had it, and he had made use of it himself. As to the thousand guineas paid to Mr Fitz-Patrick deceased, that Fitz-Patrick told him, he had a great interest with the Lord Nottingham; that he would try what he could do; and he did not doubt but he might accomplish great services, provided he might have such a sum of money. That he believed Fitz-Patrick kept the money himself; and that there was a promise of a farther sum, if the intended act of Parliament did not pass. That the 545*l.* was to be paid to Mr Charles Bates, when the charter was settled, and was paid accordingly in October 1693. That he himself had no acquaintance with him; but Sir Basil Firebrass told him, that Bates had acquaintance with several Lords, and named the Marquis of Caermarthen now Duke of Leeds. That, as to the first 10000*l.* paid to Sir Basil Firebrass, it was paid to him about November 1693. That it was always his apprehension, that Sir Basil Firebrass kept it for himself, to recompense his losses in the interloping trade. And as to the several other sums, which complete the further sum of 30000*l.* paid to Sir Basil, that they were paid at one time, tho' depending upon several contracts; and that the reason, why the 30000*l.* was in ten several contracts, might be because Sir Basil might have occasion to distribute it to several persons. That as the sums paid to Sir John Chardin and Mr Dominique, he believed they were expended in the Company's service; and as to the 3824*l.* to Captain Germain, that it was paid him to bring him off from the interlopers, and engage him in the East-India Company's interest. Lastly, as to the 90000*l.* Sir Thomas Cooke declared, that it was 99197 stock bought for 90000*l.* of several persons for the use of the Company, to make good the contracts with Sir Basil, if he should chuse to accept stock: That the stock was distributed to several persons to the Company's use; that he was accountable for it; that they had his own obligation for the same; that part of the stock was transferred to the Company; and that the other part was sold to their uses, and they had the money.

Mr Comptroller Wharton having, on the 24th of April, reported this examination to the House of Commons, some debates arose about the same; and one of the Members informed the House, that the Earl Rivers protested he never received a penny; and though he was now of another House, he had the same esteem for the Commons as heretofore; and that, according to his Lordship's motion, the Lords had had sent for Mr Molyneux to be examined. Another Member observed that, as to all the little sums, Sir Thomas Cooke knew well to whom they were given; but he could never learn to whom Sir Basil Firebrass distributed the monies he had received; for Sir Basil would not give him an account of that matter, though often asked by him to do it. That, on the other hand, Alton would have told Sir Thomas, but he would not hear him. A third Member said, that Sir Thomas Cooke's account contained nothing but Generals; not one date, not one time, &c. That, as to the ten thousand pounds to Mr Alton he offered to tell him the particulars, and he was unwilling to hear him, but did not doubt but Alton would give a particular and satisfactory account of all distributed by him. And yet, in the same moment being asked where and in what condition this Alton was, he declared, 'he was a distracted man, and not able to give the House any account at all.' A fourth Member said, 'No man is innocent, if every man be guilty. We cannot be innocent, if we do not lay our hands on these men, that have betrayed us and the Company; and, I hope, themselves.' Let us go as far as we can, and then we shall not be in fault.' And he moved, that Firebrass and Alton be ordered to attend the House the next day. Another Member seconded the motion; and likewise moved, that they forget not a Member of their own, who was accused for receiving a considerable sum.

In the midst of these debates there came a message from the Lords, desiring a conference, which was immediately held; and therein their Lordships acquainted the Commons, that they had sent for Mr Alton and several others, in order to have them examined; that they had intimation, that Sir Basil Firebrass was near at hand, and would appear; and that their Lordships were of opinion, that all future examinations of any of the persons mentioned in the report of Sir Thomas Cooke's account be had before the Committee of both Houses, appointed to receive Sir Thomas Cooke's examination; to which the Commons agreed. Accordingly, the Committee met the same day in the Exchequer Chamber, and Sir Basil Firebrass, being interrogated touching his receipt of 10000*l.* charged on him by Sir Thomas Cooke, and touching the distribution thereof, he deposed 'That the first 10000*l.* was given to him as a gratuity for his losses, some time before the charter of the East-India Company passed: That the sum of 10000*l.*

1695. remedy could be provided for it, but by recoining all the specie of England; and that could not be set about, in the end of a Session. The Earls of Rocheſter and Nottingham represented this very tragically in the Houſe of Lords, where it was not poſſible to give the proper remedy; it produced only an act, with ſtricter clauſes and feverer penalties againſt Clippers; this had no other effect, but that it alarmed the nation, and ſunk the value of our money in the exchange; guineas, which were equal in value to twenty-one ſhillings and fix-pence in ſilver, roſe to thirty ſhillings, that is to ſay, thirty ſhillings ſunk to twenty-one ſhillings and fix-pence. This public diſgrace, put on our coin, when the evil was not cured, was in effect a great point carried, by which there was an opportunity given to ſink the credit of the Government, and of the public funds; and it brought a diſcount of above 40*l. per Cent.* upon tallies.

1695.

After

was received by him, by virtue of a contract with Sir Thomas Cooke, for favours and ſervices done:
That the ſtock, at the time of the contract valued at 150*l. per cent.* falling afterwards to 100 per cent.
the difference was 3000*l.* which they made up to him. That the reaſon of the fall of the ſtock was the ſhips not coming in; and that, if that had not happened, he had gained as much as the 3000*l.* paid him. That he was poſitive, that the 1000*l.* and 3000*l.* were for himſelf, and for the uſe of no other perſon whatſoever, except 500*l.* paid to Mr Powell, becauſe he had good intereſt amongſt the interlopers, and was inſtrumental in reconciling differences. That he paid no part of the ſaid ſums towards a Charter or act of Parliament, nor made any promiſe ſo to do, though he had ſeveral diſcoursies with Sir Thomas Cooke about uſing his endeavours to procure a new Charter, it being his intereſt ſo to do, after the contracts were made. That he believed Sir Thomas Cooke might deſire him to acquaint him, how he diſpoſed of the money; but that the deponent told him, it was not fair, but contrary to agreement; and that Sir Thomas was not to aſk him what he did with his own. Afterwards the Committee aſked Sir Baſil, 'What particular ſer-vice he did, or was to do, for procuring a new Charter?' To which he answered, 'That he was unwilling to take too much upon himſelf; that he thought he did great ſervice to the Company in ſol-licitation; but willed he might answer to that at ſome other time, being then much indiſpoſed as to his health.'

The next day Sir Baſil Firebraſs, being again examined, farther depoſed, 'That, having had a treaty with Mr Bates, whom he thought able to do ſer-vice in paſſing the Charter, and to have acquaintance with ſeveral perſons of honour, he gave two notes for 5500 guineas to Mr Atwell, payable to Mr Bates, or bearer. That one note was for 3000*l.* and the other for 2500 guineas. That he put the notes into Bates's hands, who told the deponent, that he would deal with him for himſelf; and if the buſineſs were done, he would keep the notes, elſe deliver them again. That the 2500 guineas were paid after the Charter for reſtoring the East-India Company paſſed; the other for 3000 guineas after the Charter for regulation paſſed. That he had theſe notes from Sir Thomas Cooke, and was accountable to him for the ſame. That he believed Sir Thomas Cooke knew how theſe notes were to be diſpoſed of; and that he told Sir Thomas Cooke, that Mr Bates had acquaintance with ſeveral Lords, namely the Lord Preſident, and others. That the depo-nent could not tell whom this money was deſigned for, or what Bates did with it, for that Bates would not deal on ſuch terms of telling names. That Bates introduced him ſeveral times to the Lord Preſident, who made ſome ſcruples in point of law, which were removed by the Attorney-General. That one day laſt week the 5000 guineas were offered by Bates back again to him, Bates ſaying, that this might make a noiſe; that, if Sir Thomas Cooke thought it too much, he would give it him again; that on Tueſday laſt 4400 guineas was brought to this deponent, and that the other 500 guineas were ſtill in Bates's hands. That Sir Thomas Cooke ſcrupled to take back his money at firſt, but afterwards conſented to it the morning when he was brought up before this Committee.
That he believed Sir Thomas had a double account;

the one made up with this ſum, the other without
it. That Bates would have paid back the whole; but Sir Thomas Cooke ſaid, the account would not be even, if the 500 guineas were brought into that account. That this was no part of the 4000*l.* before-mentioned to be paid to this deponent; which ſum, he ſaid, he always underſtood to be wholly for his own uſe and benefit. That they found great tops in the Charters, which they apprehended proceeded ſometimes from my Lord Nottingham, and ſometimes from others. That Col. Fitz-Patrick received 1000 guineas on the ſame terms as was with others, if the Charter paſſed. That he pretended great in-tereſt with the Lord Nottingham, and that he could have information from the Lady Derby, how the Queen's pleaſure was. That Col. Fitz-Patrick ſaid,
He would try to prevail with Lord Nottingham for 5000 guineas upon paſſing the Charter, and 5000*l.*
on the act of Parliament; but that the Earl of Not- tingham abſolutely reſuſed to take it. That the deponent heard, that a note, ſigned by Sir Jyſſah Child and Sir Thomas Cooke, for 5000*l.* was lodged in Tyſſen's hands for about a year, to be paid in caſe the act paſſed; and that it was reſuſed, as he underſtood, by the Earl of Portland, to whom Tyſſen had offered it.

Mr Richard Aſſen being examined before the ſame Committee, depoſed, 'That he received the ſums of 10000*l.* and 2000*l.* of Sir Thomas Cooke. That he told Sir Thomas he had friends, who would take pains to do the Company ſervice; but they would have 10000*l.* That he had 2000*l.* for his trouble in attending two ſeſſions; and that, if the bill for a new Company had paſſed, he was to have had nothing. That he did not diſtribute the 10000*l.* to Members, but to thoſe, who had intereſt with Members. That ſome of them, to whom he gave money to be diſtributed, were Mr Craggs, with whom this deponent was concerned in clothing the army, (and who had acquaintance with Colonels in the Houſe, and ſome Northern Members) Mr Wallis, Mr Ridley, Mr Dominiqne, &c. and that Colonel Goldwell and Colonel Dean, who were ſince dead, were the only perſons, whom he himſelf gave money to.'

The next day, April 26th, the Committee of both Houſes proceeded upon the examination of the reſt of being ſworn, depoſed, 'That Sir Baſil Firebraſs did Consultations in the Council about the coin

Burnet.

After the Session was over, the affair of the coin was considered by the Council; and, as the late act against Clipping was far from affording a redress of that grievance, it was consulted what methods should be taken for remedying so great an abuse. Some proposed the recoining the money, with such a raising the value of the specie, as should balance the loss upon the old money, that it was to be called in. That so many, that it was not easy to correct an error, which must have had very bad effects in the conclusion; for the only fixed standard must be the intrinsic value of an ounce of silver; and it was a public robbery, that would very much prejudice our trade, not to keep the value of our specie near an equality with its weight and fineness.

four thousand four hundred guineas thereof back again to Sir Basil Firebrass, which, as he takes it, was upon Monday or Tuesday last. And, being examined again as to the same matter, he said, 'That these four thousand four hundred guineas paid back to Sir Basil were in four bags, with one thousand one hundred guineas in each, brought to him by Monsieur Robart, within a month last past. As to the 600 guineas remaining of the 5000, he at first said he had spent the same; and being afterwards examined as to the same matter, said, they were at home in his study, but he may have spent some. That the reason why he paid back the four thousand four hundred guineas was the noise, that it made, and that people might think he had not deserved them. That the whole five thousand five hundred guineas were for his own private use, and that he might have given them to his footman.'

Sir Basil Firebrass, being once more examined, deposed, 'That Sir Thomas Cooke and others observing him active, and to have interest enough among Noblemen, applied themselves to him to endeavour the procuring a new Charter. That Sir Thomas Cooke was apprehensive, that it stuck with the Duke of Leeds, and told the deponent, that some way must be found out to the Duke. That he thereupon applied himself to Mr Bates, who would not pretend to talk with the Duke, but said, the deponent must tell him what the Company would do. That he told Mr Bates, he thought a present might be made of 2 or 3000*l.* That Mr Bates told him, he went to St James's, and said, he had spoke with his friend, and that more had been offered by the other side; and that at another time Bates said, that 5000*l.* had been offered him by another hand on the same side. Upon which the deponent did not come up to the market. That he acquainted Sir Thomas Cooke with this proposal, who said, if it was insisted on, it must be done; and so it was agreed to offer 5000 guineas. That Bates then said, this was nothing to him; he ought not to be employed for nothing. That therefore the deponent was forced to go back to Sir Thomas Cooke for new orders; and so 500 guineas were given to him besides. That at first Bates said, He would undertake no farther than that the Duke should not oppose, but be silent, because he did not know but the Duke had engaged himself, by having spoke on the other side. That the deponent did except against this, because he would not let the Company's money go for nothing; and it would reflect upon him, if nothing appeared to be done for it. That it was then agreed, that, if the Duke did act in favour of the Company, he should have 2 or 3000 guineas, and Bates 500 guineas to himself. That the deponent would have put off Bates's 500 guineas to the last, to engage him to take the more pains; but Bates said, his friend would have him have the 500 guineas to himself first. Sir Basil produced a copy of Mr Bates's receipt of a note for 3000 guineas, which he thereby promised not to call for till the Charter should pass. The original Mr Bates had back, when the money was paid, and the deponent had not taken a copy of the counter-note for 2500 guineas. He further said, that, after the Charter was passed in October, he sent to Mr Bates, that he might call for the money; and he called for it in two or three days. That the other note was paid in a week after the passing the second Charter: That from the time the notes were given they had free access to the Lord President, and found him easy and willing to give the Company his assistance: That Mr Bates was shy, and called it his friend at St James's. That the condition of one draught of a counter-note, which Mr Bates brought, was worded, In case the Lord President did not assist the Company in passing the Charter; to which this deponent made an alteration, by putting out his Lordship's name, and making it not payable, in case the Charter should not pass, or to that effect. That, about a week before the money was brought back again, the deponent went to Bates about it, who then told him, it was all for himself. That on Sunday night last, or Monday, Bates being at his own house said, he had not the money by him, but he would fetch it; and that the money he thought was in silver; but afterwards told the deponent it was only a mistake, and he had brought it in gold, which by computation came to the same sum. That when this deponent told him, that Sir Thomas Cooke would not take the whole back, Bates said, he could give no answer to it till he had spoke with his friend. That on Monday last five hundred guineas were left at his house by Mr Gibb, a friend of Sir John Trevor's, who said, he had it from Sir John Trevor, to whom Sir Thomas Cooke had before paid it with his own hands, under colour of an arrear for four or five years, as he had been Commissioner of the Great Seal, and that the deponent was present, when Sir Thomas Cooke gave it; and that there was at another time two hundred guineas ordered to be given to the said Sir John Trevor, as a new year's gift, by Sir Joseph Jernyngham. That as to 2000*l.* of the 3000*l.* before mentioned, the same sums were not actually paid till since Lady-day. And as to the other 1000*l.* he hath it now in stock in the East-India Company. That, as to 5000*l.* part of the said 3000*l.* he did design one third thereof to Mr Edward Seymour, one third to Sir John Trevor, and one third to Mr Guy. That he offered the same to Mr Guy, but the latter told him, they did not desire to meddle with the stock, but would do any service they could to promote the getting of the Charter. And Sir Edward Seymour, afterwards meeting with the deponent, chid him for making that proposal, and told him, if he made any more such proffers, he would never have any thing more to do with him. That the deponent told Mr Guy, that the advantage to them in passing the Charter and act of Parliament would be worth 10000*l.* among them. That he intended a distribution of all the 3000*l.* in the manner following, viz. to Sir Edward Seymour, Sir John Trevor, and Mr Guy, 10000*l.* in case the Charter and act of Parliament passed; to the merchants interlopers 10000*l.* and to himself 10000*l.* That he thought himself obliged in honour to pay two thirds of the 5000*l.* when received to Sir John Trevor and Mr Guy; the other third, which he intended for Sir Edward Seymour, he kept for himself. That Sir John Trevor did some time afterwards give the deponent some hints of his expectation.

Sir Joseph Child, being examined, said, 'He never disposed of 40*l.* of the Company's money to his remembrance, always affecting ignorance in that manner: That he did recommend Mr Atten, as being an honest man, and thought he might do service to the Company in Parliament, because of his acquaintance. That he did recommend it, that a present of 50000*l.* should be made to the King, if his Majesty would so far waive his prerogative, that an act of Parliament might be passed for settling the

1695. fines in silver. So that the difference between the old and new money could only be set right by the House of Commons, in a supply to be given for that end. The Lord-Keeper Sommers did indeed propose that, which would have put an effectual stop to clipping for the future; it was, that a proclamation should be prepared with such secrecy, as to be published over all England on the same day, ordering money to pass only by weight; but that, at the same time,

Company; but Mr Tyssen told him, the King would not meddle in that matter. That he knew nothing of the 40000 l. paid to Sir Basil Firebrass. That there was a kind of Committee of twenty-five persons, who sat de die in diem; to destroy the Company; and that he told Sir Thomas Cooke, that he thought Sir Basil the fittest person to divide them.

Mr Atwell produced his cash books, by which it appeared, that, on the 9th of October 1693, Mr Bates had received 545 l. 6 s. 3 d.; on the 10th of that month 2181 l. 5 s.; and on the 16th of November 3275 l.; and he said, that the money was paid by order of Sir Thomas Cooke.

Mr Bates, being again examined, said, he believed the money might be paid as the books expressed; and further owned, that he had not 4400 guineas in his house on Sunday night last, but that the 4400 guineas, which he paid back to Sir Basil Firebrass, were brought to him by Monsieur Rehart on Tuesday morning last at eight o'clock.

Mr Tyssen, being again examined, said, That Sir Thomas Cooke and Sir Josiah Child gave him a note under their hands for 50000 l. which was intended to be presented to the King, if his Majesty would pass an act of Parliament as they should desire. That he acquainted the Lord Portland with the Company's intention to make such a present, who told this deponent, that the King would not meddle with it. And being asked, whether he had offered the same to the Lord Portland, he denied he had so done, saying, if he had, he must never have seen his face more. That, when he was examined before the House of Commons, he did not take it, that the 10000 l. given to his Majesty was included in the sum charged upon Sir Thomas Cooke, being before the date of any order for that money.

Mr Craggs, being examined, gave in an account how he had disposed of and applied 4540 l. with which he was charged by Mr Atten; and denied, that he had ever paid any money to any Members of Parliament.

Mr Comptroller Wharton, on Saturday the 27th of April, made a report to the House of Commons from the Committee of both Houses, of the examinations taken by them; which being read, one of the Members stood up, and urged the necessity of searching this matter to the bottom, and to provide laws for the future, to prevent the Members of the House taking money. That all imaginable endeavours had been used to suppress all discoveries. That 10000 l. had been pretended to be given to the King, and 50000 l. offered to buy an act of Parliament, or gain their Charter. That the facts proved themselves; and that Mr Bates appeared an unfortunate person, whom the care of his friend, (the Duke of Leeds) and the sense of his oath, had caused to make such contradictions. He moved the House therefore, that they would put the matter into such a method, as became their justice, and as the shortness of their time would allow. Another Member said, that there were never greater and more general instances of corruption; he insisted on the necessity of a speedy remedy, and that it was very fit, that the House should let the world see, that they were in earnest. He put them in mind of the practices and arts, that had been used to stop their discovery, so that what they had was got, as it were, by the utmost force and constraint; at which they could not wonder, when they now found so great a man at the bottom. 'But there is, added he, no person in a post so high, that this House cannot reach; no man's practice or art so deep, that this House cannot discover. Here have been all imaginable endeavours used to obstruct the inquiry. First, his Majesty's name was made use of at the Committees, with hopes, perhaps, that might stop any further search; and, if it were made use of there, you may reasonably expect it was made use of elsewhere. But that appeared to be so far from being a matter of reflection on the King, that Sir Josiah Child often complained of it, as a rudeness to his Majesty, that what other Kings had yearly as a present, they had not offered to his Majesty in three years. It was indeed, if not a matter of a right, a matter of custom. As for the Earl of Portland, who may be named for his honour on this occasion, when the great sum of 50000 l. was pressed upon him, he absolutely refused it, and told him, He would for ever be their enemy and opposer, if they offered any such thing to him. Having thus mentioned the innocent, I must, continued he, say somewhat of the guilty. A stop having been put, the Duke of Leeds must be applied to. Certainly there never was a more notorious bribery, and that in a person, whom we might have expected to have been free from such a crime, if you respect either the greatness of his place, or of his former obligation. It is fit to speak plainly on such occasions: The House ought to endeavour to remove such a person from the King's Council and Presence. What security can the nation have, when we are bought by and sold to one another? We have seen our designs defeated, our attempts betrayed; and what wonder is it? Can any man think it more strange, that our Councils should be sold abroad, than that Charters should be sold at home? Certainly, a man may reasonably believe, that he, who will sell the Subjects, will sell the Kingdom, if he can have a sufficient bribe. What Prince can be safe in such councils, which are given for private advantage? Several proposals, said he in the conclusion, may here be offered for remedy. One, that this House should address his Majesty to remove the Duke of Leeds; but, with submission, an address is too mean, too low a thing for the House to do at this time, and upon such an occasion. I therefore move, that we may lodge an Impeachment, viz. That Thomas Duke of Leeds, Lord President of his Majesty's Council, be impeached by this House: Or thus, That Thomas Duke of Leeds be impeached by this House of high crimes and misdemeanors, and particularly of corruption in taking a bribe of five thousand guineas, to obtain a Charter and regulation for the East-India Company.

Though this speech was approved of in the main, yet some expressions in it were thought too reflecting; and another Member stood up, and said, 'He wondered the Gentleman, who spoke last, should say that, which he hoped he did not believe, That that Lord should have sold our councils to France.' Upon this the other rose again, and said, 'It was with some uneasiness he stood up, for he did not take pleasure to rake into a dunghill. That he was far from saying the Duke had betrayed our councils, but argued only from the possibility. That it was as reasonable to believe one as the other; and that, when honour and justice were not the rule of men's actions, there was nothing incredible, that might be for their disadvantage.'

Several Members seconded the motion for an impeachment, adding, 'That such actions as these were a blemish, if not a scandal to the Revolution itself.' And it being demanded, By what law it was a crime to take money at court? It was answered, 'that, if there was not a law, it was time there should be a law to prevent it: That the law of God was against the Duke, and broke by him. That he had taken an oath as a Privy-counsellor, That justice is not to be sold by the common law. That there were Parliaments to punish such crimes.' It was again suggested, that it seemed doubtful, whether there was matter in this report for an impeachment; and therefore, before the House went to an impeachment, they ought 1695. time, during three or four days after the proclamation, all persons in every country, who had money, should bring it in to be told and weighed; and the difference was to be registered, and the money sealed up, to the end of the time given, and then to be restored to the owners; and an assurance was to be given, that this deficiency in weight should be laid before the Parliament, to be supplied another way, and to be allowed them in the following taxes. But, though to put the question upon the report, and see whether it be a crime? Thereupon some of the Duke's friends objected, That there was no law, and so no transgression; and moved for excusing him. But the question being put, 'that there did appear that there was in the report made from the Committee of both Houses sufficient matter to impeach Thomas Duke of Leeds, Lord President of his Majesty's Council, of high crimes and misdemeanors,' it was resolved in the affirmative; and Mr Comptroller Harton was ordered to go up to the Lords, and at their bar, in the name of the House, and of all the Commons of England, to lodge the said impeachment, which in due time they would make good.

About the same time, that Mr Comptroller made the report to the Commons from the Committee of both Houses, the Lord Privy-Seal made the report to the Lords; after hearing of which the Duke of Leeds said, 'That, as he had formerly protested himself to be clear in this matter, so he still denied upon his faith and honour, that he was guilty of any such corruptions, as were suggested against him; and that, if the whole truth were laid open, it would tend to his honour and advantage. That he would be very free in telling their Lordships, now beforehand, all that passed, in which he was any ways concerned. That Mr Bates introduced Sir Basil Firebrass to him, and that he had conferences with Sir Basil upon the subject of the East-India Company, which Sir Basil was concerned for. That some time after Mr Bates informed him, that he was to have a sum of money of Sir Basil Firebrass, and desired his Lordship to lend him one of his servants (Mr Bates keeping but a footman) to receive the money, and so he lent him Monsieur Robert. That he knew nothing of the sum, but afterwards Mr Bates came to him, and told him, he had received five thousand guineas; and that in acknowledgment of the many favours he had received from his Lordship's hands, he humbly desired him to accept the same; which he refusing, Mr Bates pressed him earnestly to take one half or a quarter; which he still refused, declaring he would not touch a penny of them. That however he told him, since he had taken them, he thought there was no need of returning them, that they were his own, and wished him good luck with them. And thus, concluded his Grace, I was but a shadow to Mr Bates.'

The Duke had scarce ended his speech, when private notice came to the House of Lords, that the Commons were proceeding to an impeachment against him. Whereupon he left the House in great haste, and, going to the door of the House of Commons, desired to be admitted to be heard. This being granted, and a chair placed for him within the bar, his Grace sat down, put on his hat, then rose, uncovered himself, and made a speech to the House, wherein in the first place, 'he thanked them heartily for this favour of hearing him; and then proceeded, declaring his innocence, and that he had attended sooner, if he had had the least intimation, what the House was upon. That the occasion of his coming was from the two votes upon the report from the Committee of both Houses. That he had done all he could to be informed of the particulars, but could not. That, hearing of a report, a monstrous long report, and finding himself concerned, he was earnest to be heard, to the end he might not lie under the displeasure of either or both Houses. He said, 'it is a bold word, but it is a truth, This house had not now been sitting but for me. That he had been formerly pursued by the House in two points, for being for the French interest and for Popery: That he had, then, if he might have been heard, justified himself and hoped he had since, and would by all the actions of his. That one Firebrass, by the means of Mr Bates, was introduced to him. That he had long known Mr Bates; and, if he was not much deceived in him, he could not believe that Gentleman would have transacted such a matter, if put upon it. That the evidence is but an hearsay, and he hoped they would not condemn on hearsay. That he would not take up their time by entering into particulars. That there was a money part as well as a treaty part. That, as to the money part, much of it was false, and what was true he made no secret. That he could and did say upon his faith and honour, that neither directly nor indirectly he never touched one penny of the money. That he observed a great deal of pains had been taken to hook him in this matter by a side-wind. That this Firebrass thought his merit would deserve 10000 l. and 30000 l. That these five thousand five hundred guineas were no part of the 40000 l. That the witnesses were called in by the Committee; but that Firebrass, after his first hearing, desired to be called in again himself, contrary to all rules; which shewed him at least a very willing witness. That he had a thread, which he hoped to spin finer, and make it appear, that this was a design laid against him long before the naming this Committee. That warning had been given him some time since, that this matter would be improved against him; and that Firebrass had been told, he should be excused, if he should charge the Duke. His Grace, in the conclusion, said, 'he asked no favour, but their favourable justice; and that no severe sense might be put on what would bear a candid one. That, if it might be, the House would reconsider what was done, or at least preserve him from cruelty, and not let him lie on the rack, and be blasted, until a Parliament should sit again; and that, if they would proceed, it might be speedily, for he had rather want Counsel, want time, want any thing, than lie under their or the nation's displeasure; and that, if they would not reconsider, the matter might be brought to a determination, and that he might at least have their speedy justice.'

This speech being ended, and the Duke withdrawn, Mr Comptroller, attended by many Members, went up to the Lords with the impeachment; and at the same time it was proposed in the House of Commons, that the articles should be forthwith drawn up; and thereupon the Committee, which were joined with the Lords, were ordered to withdraw to prepare the same.

Afterwards the House of Commons took the Duke's speech into consideration, and one of the Members stood up, and said, 'That by this noble Duke's speech the point was, whether the House would arraign the Committee of both Houses, or go on with the impeachment? That the Duke, when he came to the matter, would not enter into particulars, but passed it over with excuse of wanting time. That he made no excuse as to the facts. That his argument of a contrivance was, that the five thousand guineas charged on him was no part of the 40000 l. which Firebrass was to account for. That this was rather an aggravation of the crime; for Sir Thomas Cooke had a double account, one with, and another without the 5000 guineas; which was an indication, that, if there was a contrivance, it was not by the Committee, but with Sir Thomas Cooke, to stifle the inquiry, and conceal the corruption. That the speedy justice of the house was to be wished and desired; and that, if there was such a contrivance, such a thread, as was mentioned by the noble Lord, it was not to be doubted, but that House, where he was impeached, would clear him.'

1695. though the King liked this proposition, yet all the rest of the Council were against it. They said, this would stop the circulation of money, and might occasion tumults in the markets. Those, whose money was thus to be weighed, would not believe, that the difference between the tale and the weight would be allowed them, and so might grow mutinous. Therefore they were for leaving the matter to the consideration of the next Parliament. So this proposition was laid aside, which would have saved the nation above a million of money. For now, as all people believed, that the Parliament would receive clipped money by tale, clipping went on and became more visibly scandalous, than ever it had been. For which reason an effectual stop

‘him.’ Another Member moved, ‘That a Committee might be appointed to withdraw, and consider what was to be done in order to gratify the noble Duke by speedy justice; and observed that his friend Mr Bates’s contradicting himself was more than the evidence of Firebrass. That Monsieur Robart was a servant of my Lord President’s, and was fled: That Mr Bates said he kept the money in his house: That sometimes he had spent it, sometimes it was in his closet. That he did own the money was not in his house on Sunday, but on Tuesday morning Monsieur Robart brought it to him, but he would never declare from whom he brought it.’

In the midst of these debates a message was sent from the Lords, to acquaint the House of Commons, that it was the opinion of their Lordships, that the discovery made by Sir Thomas Cooke was not satisfactory, nor so full as to intitle him to the benefit of the act to indemnify him; and that their Lordships desired the concurrence of the Commons. They thereupon passed a vote, as the Lords had done, and sent it up by the Lord Comingsby.

On Monday the 29th of April, the Lords acquainted the Commons, that they had passed a bill, intitled, An act for imprisoning Sir Thomas Cooke, Sir Basil Firebrass, Charles Bates, Esq; and James Craggs, and restraining them from alienating their estates; to which they desired the concurrence of the Commons. After the reading of this bill, Mr Comptroller reported the articles of impeachment against the Duke of Leeds, ‘for contracting and agreeing with the Merchants trading to the East-Indies, or their agents, for five thousand five hundred guineas, to procure them a Charter of confirmation, and a Charter of regulations; which sum was actually received by the said Duke of Leeds, or by his agents and servants, with his privity and consent.’ These articles being agreed to by the Commons, and by their order sent to the Upper-House, and read, the Duke of Leeds repeated several things to the same purpose as formerly, adding, ‘That this storm, which was now fallen upon him, was some time in gathering, and promoted by a faction and a party, who had only a pique against him; and that the King’s business had been delayed on purpose. That he had an original letter, which gave him an account of this some time before it broke out, and it appeared only levelled against him, because none else were prosecuted. That there appeared a joy, that they could catch at this, for then they stopped; and that Sir Basil Firebrass was treated with to discover only this part, and so he should be excused from any farther discovery.’ His Grace concluded, with praying for a copy of the articles of impeachment, and of the report of the Committee of both Houses; which was readily granted.

The next day, April 30, the Commons were acquainted by a message from the Lords, that the Duke of Leeds had put in his answer to the articles exhibited against him, of which their Lordships sent a copy to them. Whereupon the House of Commons ordered, that the Committee, who were appointed to prepare the articles against the Duke, should consider of and prepare a replication to his answer.

Upon the 1st of May, the Commons read a third time, and passed the ingrossed bill from the Lords, for imprisoning Sir Thomas Cooke, &c. and sent it up to the Lords by Sir Herbert Craggs, who was ordered to acquaint their Lordships, that they had agreed thereto with some amendments. On the other hand, the Lords acquainted the Commons, that they themselves were obliged, in justice, to put the House in mind of the impeachment against the Duke of Leeds; to which the Duke’s answer having been transmitted to them, the Lords desired to know, when the Commons could be ready with their articles, to the end a certain day might be appointed by the Lords for that purpose. Thereupon the Commons ordered, that the Duke’s answer might be referred to the consideration of the Committee, and that they likewise consider what was to be done in that matter, according to the course of Parliaments.

The Duke, upon the 2d of May, complained to the Lords of the delay of the House of Commons, in not replying to his answer, alledging, ‘That the impeachment was only to load him with disgrace; and that they never intended to try him. And added, that the party used great partiality towards him, and did not intend to inquire after others; and that they shewed their partiality and spleen in their amendment to the bill for imprisoning Sir Thomas Cooke, Sir Basil Firebrass, and others, wherein Sir Basil Firebrass was to be bailed, because he was the witness against his Grace.’ The same day the Commons resolved, ‘That the offer of any money, or other advantage, to any Member of Parliament, for the promoting of any matter whatsoever, depending, or to be transacted in Parliament, was a high crime and misdemeanor, and tended to the subversion of the English Constitution.’ Afterwards Mr Comptroller reported from the Committee of the House of Commons, ‘That it was their opinion, that the proper method to compel witnesses to come in, and give their evidence upon impeachments, is, in the first place, to issue out summons from the House to such witnesses for their attendance; and that it appeared to them, that Monsieur Robart, who is a material witness for making good the articles against the Duke of Leeds, had been summoned to attend the Committee, but could not be found: And, it not being yet known where he is, they are of opinion, not to make any farther progress in the matter referred to them, until they have the farther direction of the House.’ This resolution was agreed to by the House, and an order made, that Monsieur Robart should attend the House forthwith, and that he be summoned by the Serjeant at Arms.

Upon Friday the 3d of May, a motion being made in the House of Lords, to read the bill for granting to the King a duty upon glass, &c. the Duke of Leeds rose up, and told the Lords, ‘That it grieved him, that he, who was as much as any man for the dispatch of the money-bills, and never opposed any, should now do it. But he hoped the Lords would consider his case, not only as his, but as the case of any of their Lordships; for it was in the power of a winker to accuse at the end of a Session, and one might lie under it without any remedy. And since the Commons, by mismanagement, had delayed this money-bill for six weeks, it would not be of mighty ill consequence, if it should lie a day or two longer. His Grace likewise pressed very earnestly, that, if the House of Commons did not reply, the impeachment might be discharged; for, if it were not, he might lie under the reproach thereof all his life; adding, that he believed the Commons would do nothing in it; for, though they had appointed a Committee to meet, yet they met but once, and that for form.’

The same Day the Speaker of the House of Commons acquainted them, that the Serjeant at Arms had informed

1695. was put to this mischief in the next Parliament, by recoining all the current cash of the Kingdom (1).

The same day, that the Parliament was prorogued, the King declared in Council, that he had appointed,

Government in the King's absence.
Kennet.
Burnet.

The Archbishop of Canterbury,
Sir John Sommers, Lord-Keeper of the Great-Seal,
Thomas Earl of Pembroke, Lord Privy-Seal,
William Duke of Devonshire, Lord Steward of his Majesty's Household, Charles Duke of Shrewsbury, one of his Majesty's Principal Secretaries of State, Charles Earl of Dorset, Lord Chamberlain of his Majesty's Household, Sidney Lord Godolphin, First Commissioner of the Treasury, to be Lords Justices of England, for the administration of the Government, during his absence.

In this a great error was committed, which had some ill effects, and was like to have worse. Though the breach was, in appearance at least, made up between the King and the Princess of Denmark, she was not now, when the King was going beyond sea, set at the head of the Councils, nor was there any care taken to oblige those who were about her. This looked either like jealousy and distrust, or a coldness towards her, which gave all the secret enemies of the Government a colour of complaint. They pretended zeal for the Princess, though they came little to her; and they made it very visible on many occasions, that this was only a disguise for worse designs.

At the same time that the Lords Justices were appointed, Sir William Trumbal was made Secretary of State in the room of Sir John Trenchard, deceased. Trumbal was a very eminent Civilian, and had been by much the best pleader in those courts, and was a learned, diligent, and virtuous man. He was sent Envoy to Paris upon the Lord Preston's being recalled. He was informed him, that his messenger had been at the Duke of Leeds's, and inquired for Monsieur Robart, who was not to be found, and had not been seen in his Grace's House for three days past. Whereupon the Commons desired a conference with the Lords; which being agreed to, their managers delivered a paper to the Lords, importing, 'That the Commons would make good the charge against the Duke of Leeds, and were desirous, that justice be done without any manner of delay; but that, in the preparation of the evidence against the Duke, their Committee met with an obstruction. That Monsieur Robart, who appeared, by the depositions before the Committee of both Houses, to be a material witness, was withdrawn since the impeachment was carried up; which had been the reason the Commons had not yet acquainted their Lordships, when they could be ready to make good the said impeachment.'

This paper being read in the House of Lords, it was moved and agreed to without any debate, or any opposition made by the Duke of Leeds, that an address should be made to the King to issue out a proclamation for stopping the ports, and seizing Monsieur Robart; which was accordingly done, though the proclamation was not published till about nine days afterwards.

The Duke then rose up, and blamed the Commons for doing an unheard of and unprecedented thing, to charge a man with crimes, before they had all the evidence to make it good. That it was strange they should say they wanted a material witness, and lay it upon him to produce this witness; as if a person were obliged more to produce evidence to accuse himself, than to answer such questions, by which he accuses himself. He then acquainted their Lordships, that in truth he had sent Monsieur Robart to see his daughter Leinster, who went into the country big with child; and ordered him to call at Minns to see his daughter Plymouth, it being in his way to his daughter Leinster's, whither the messenger of the House might have known he was gone, if he had asked. That he had sent a messenger on purpose for Robart; that his footman waked him about two of the clock on Sunday morning, to let him know, that Robart was come, and was in the house, which was as soon as he could possibly return. That his Lordship told the footman he would go to sleep, and would speak with Robart in the morning, when he usually called him. But, when he asked for him in the morning, the footman said he was gone; and upon inquiry he found Robart did not lie or pull off his boots in his chamber. That the footman said, he asked whether the news was true, that his Lord was impeached, and Mr Bates in prison; which the footman owned to be true; and that his Grace believes, that had frightened Robart. That his Chaplain had shewn him a letter from Robart, with a desire to acquaint his Grace, that he designed for his own country, Switzerland, through Holland; from whence he would write to his Grace a true account of all the matter of the five thousand five hundred guineas to Mr Bates. That he knew by the manner of his writing, by the temper of the man, and by a particular knowledge he had of him and of the thing, that he would not be seen here again in haste. So that, my Lords, said his Grace, if this man be insisted upon as a material evidence, and that my trial is to be delayed till this person is forthcoming, when am I likely to be tried? I humbly move your Lordships, that you will come to some resolution, if this matter be not immediately proceeded upon, so that I may be tried before the ending of this Session, that this impeachment shall fall. To which some few Lords cried, Will you?

[The collector of these proceedings inquires here, whether Monsieur Robart might not have been delivered from the fright he was put into, by hearing the Duke was impeached, and Mr Bates imprisoned, and been wrought upon to come in, and, for his Grace's honour and advantage, lay open the whole truth. If the Duke had been pleased, to put an advertisement into the Gazette, that he would interpose with his Majesty, to obtain a pardon for him (if any was criminal) and give him five thousand guineas to beseech him, (or something to that effect) and whether such a course would not have been of more avail, for securing Robart's forthcoming, and the manifestation of the truth and his Lordship's vindication, than the proclamation, for apprehending him, has hitherto been.]

However, the Lords read and passed the bill upon glass, &c. and the King came to the House, and gave the Royal assent to several bills, and amongst the rest to the bill for imprisoning Cooke, Firebrass, Bates, and Craggs, and also to an act for the King's most gracious free and general pardon, but with the exception of all persons, who have been or shall be impeached in Parliament, during this Session. On the same day, the Commons, having read the report from the Committee of both Houses, were proceeding to impeach other persons therein mentioned, particularly Sir John Trevor, when they were interrupted by the Black Rod, and commanded to attend the King, in the Lords House, where after a short speech, the King put an end to these affairs, by a prorogation to the 18th of June.

(1) There were few remarkable acts passed this Session, besides what have been mentioned, an act to exempt Apothecaries from serving offices, or upon Juries.

He had orders to put in memorials, complaining of the invasion of the principality of Orange, which he did in so high a strain, that the last of them was like a denunciation of war. From Paris he was sent to Turkey, where the French Ambassador informed him of the secret alliance between King James and Lewis XIV. He returned to England in 1692, and was now made Secretary of State. A few days after William de Nassau, Seigneur de Zulfstein, son to the King's natural uncle, was created Baron of Enfield, Viscount Tunbridge, the Earl of Rochford; and Ford, Lord Grey of Werke, was created Viscount Glendale, and Earl of Tankerville. The next day, May the 9th, Duke Sebmberg, the Earl of Tankerville, and Peregrine Bertie, Vice-Chamberlain to his Majesty, were sworn and admitted of the Privy-Council.

Burnet.

The Marquis of Halifax died in April this year; he had gone into all the measures of the Tories; only he took care to preserve himself from criminal engagements; he studied to oppose every thing, and to embroil matters all he could; his spirit was restless, and he could not bear to be out of business; his vivacity and judgment sunk much in his last years, as well as his reputation; he died of a gangrene, occasioned by a rupture that he had long neglected; When he saw death so near him, and was warned, that there was no hope, he shewed a great firmness of mind, and a calm that had much of true Philosophy at least; he professed himself a sincere Christian, and lamented the former parts of his life, with solemn resolutions of becoming in all respects another man, if God should raise him up.

The King
goes abroad
May 12.

On the 12th of May the King went in the morning from Kensington to Gravensend, and went aboard the William and Mary Yacht about six in the evening, attended by the Duke of Ormond, the Earls of Essex and Portland, and other persons of Quality; but, there being little wind, the Yacht got no further that night than the Buoy in the Nore. The next morning they joined their convoy under the command of Sir George Rooke, and on the 14th the King safely landed at Orange Polder, and arrived in the evening at the Hague, where he was received with great acclamations of joy.

The seven Lords Justices had no character nor rank, except when four of them were together; and they avoided assembling to that number, except at the Council-board, where it was necessary; and, when they were together, they had the Royal authority vested in them. They were chosen by the posts, which they were in; so that no person could think he was neglected by the preference. They were not envied for this titular greatness, since it was indeed only titular; for they had no real authority trusted with them. They took care to keep within bounds, and to do nothing but in matters of course, till they had the King's orders, to which they adhered exactly; so that no complaints could be made of them, because they took nothing on them, and did only keep the peace of the Kingdom, and transmit and execute the King's orders. The summer went over quietly at home; for, though the Jacobites shewed their disposition on some occasions, but most signally on the Prince of Wales's birthday, yet they were wiser than to break out into any disorder, when they had no hopes of assistance from France.

The King having thought fit to call a Parliament in Scotland, they met according to their summons on the 9th of May. The Marquis of Tweeddale was his Majesty's Commissioner. For not only Duke Hamilton, but his brother-in-law, the Duke of Queenberry, died the last winter. They had been long great friends; but they became irreconcilable enemies. Duke Hamilton had more application, but the other had the greater genius. They were incompatible with each other, and indeed with all other persons; for both loved to be absolute, and to direct every thing. The Marquis of Tweeddale was early engaged in business, and continued in it to a great age. He understood well all the interests and concerns of Scotland; had a great stock of knowledge, with an obliging temper, and was of a blameless, or rather exemplary life. He had loose thoughts both of civil and ecclesiastical Government; and seemed to think, that what form soever was uppermost was to be complied with. He had been in Cromwell's Parliament, and had abjured the Royal family, which lay heavy upon him. He was, in all other respects, the ablest and worthiest of the Nobility, only he was too cautious and fearful. He was made a Privy-Counsellor in England in 1667, and in 1692, Chancellor and Marquis of Scotland, Juries. Several bills were set on foot, but not finished; namely, A bill touching free and impartial proceedings in Parliament; which was begun in the House of Commons, and there rejected after the third reading: A bill for regulating trials in cases of high-treason; which, having passed the Lower-House, was amended by the Lords, and occasioned several further conferences and debates between both Houses: Another bill for registering memorials of deeds, conveyances, and wills, which was obstructed by the Lawyers in the House of Commons: A fourth, for the encouragement of privateers: A fifth, for the encouragement of seamen: A sixth, to disable persons from voting in elections of Members to serve in Parliament, who should refuse to take the oaths to the Government, which never came to the second reading: A seventh, for the better discovery of bankrupt estates, No. 18. Vol. III.

which was only read twice: An eighth, to vest the forfeited estates in Ireland in his Majesty, wherein as little progress was made: A ninth, to regulate printing presses: A tenth, requiring certain persons to take the oaths to his Majesty, which, having passed the Upper-House, and been sent down to the Commons, was by them rejected after the second reading: An eleventh, sent down also by the Lords, for naturalizing foreign seamen, which the Commons refused to pass: A twelfth, to ascertain the assize of bread: A thirteenth, to oblige James Craggs and Richard Harnage to discover how some of the monies for clothing the army had been disposed of: And, lastly, a bill for punishing Tracy Pauncefort and his brother Edward Pauncefort, for corrupt practices, which, having been read three times by the Commons, was ordered to lie upon the table.

1695. lord, and now the King's High-Commissioner. He came to the Parliament attended in the usual manner; and, his Commission being read, the King's letter to the Lords Temporal and Commissioners of the shires and burghs was read also, setting forth, 'That the continuation of the war still hindered him from pursuing his resolution of being amongst them in person, and so obliged him to call them together once more in his absence. That therefore he had appointed the Marquis of Tweeddale to be his Commissioner, and to represent his person and authority among them. That the Marquis had given proofs of his capacity and experience in business, as well as of his fidelity and zeal, by his many and long services to the Crown and Nation, particularly since his being Lord Chancellor; which would render him very acceptable to them. That his Majesty had fully entrusted him with his mind, and given him powers to pass all such laws for the good of that his Majesty's ancient Kingdom, as had been proposed to his Majesty at this time. That the Marquis was to ask nothing of them in his Majesty's name but that, which the interest of the country made necessary to be done. That therefore his Majesty need not to mention to them, that the subsidies for paying the forces were now expired, and that their peace and safety required the renewing of them during the war. That his Majesty was glad of any appearances of a disposition to moderation and union about Church-matters; and hoped they would encourage and promote it, by removing the subjects of differences as much as they could. That he was not unmindful of the letter to him, in the close of the last Session. That the known interruptions, which he had had in business this winter, had been a great hinderance to him; but he was resolved to do whatever he might for the security of the Government, and the satisfaction of his good subjects. In the conclusion, his Majesty recommended to them calmness and unanimity in their proceedings, not doubting but they would act suitably to the confidence he had put in them, in calling them again in his absence.' This letter was seconded by the High Commissioner's speech, who told them, 'That his Majesty's tender care and concern for their safety and welfare did evidently appear, in minding every thing, that might contribute thereto; particularly as to the Church, that all differences might be composed, it being his Majesty's purpose to maintain the Presbyterian Government in the Church of Scotland, and that the peace and security of the Kingdom against foreign invasion and intestine commotion be provided for. That if they found it would tend to the advancement of trade, that an act should be passed for the encouragement of such, as should acquire and establish a plantation in Africa or America, or any other part of the world, where plantations might be lawfully acquired, his Majesty was willing to declare, That he would grant to the subjects of this Kingdom, in favour of these plantations, such rights and privileges, as he granted in like cases to the subjects of his other dominions. And that the Judicatories, higher and subaltern, be so regulated in their proceedings, as that justice might be administered with the greatest dispatch and least charge to the people. That these things had taken up some part of his Majesty's time and thoughts these months past, and had been frequently discoursed by him, and then put in the method of instructions and directions for his Grace's behaviour. That therefore it only remained for them to take these weighty affairs into consideration, and to consult of the best ways and means to enable his Majesty to perfect so good designs, by granting him supplies for maintaining the present land-forces, and for providing and entertaining a competent naval force, for the defence of the coast, and securing of trade. In order to which his Majesty had granted a Commission of Admiralty for managing the affairs thereof; not omitting to take care for the other unavoidable contingencies of the Government, wherein the Civil List came short. Concluding, that the dispatch of these great affairs with cheerfulness and alacrity would perfect a good understanding, and perpetuate a confidence between the King, and them.' The Earl of Annandale, Lord President of the Parliament, made likewise a speech to them on this occasion. He acknowledged his Majesty's gracious letter, wherein he asked nothing for himself, but only prevented their necessary cares for the peace, welfare, and advantage of this Kingdom. He took notice of the fresh assurances they had of his Majesty's firm resolution, to maintain the Presbyterian Government of this Church; and said, he hoped the moderation and calmness, that should at this time appear in all their proceedings in Church-matters, would satisfy the world, that this is the Government most agreeable to the temper and inclination of this people, and most suitable for the interest and support of their King, the civil Government, and peace of this Kingdom. And in the conclusion he enforced all that had been said, by one thing, which did justly challenge a more than ordinary zeal and vigour in their duty at this time, which was the sad and irreparable loss they had sustained of the best of Queens; wishing they might all of them make this use of it, that as now the whole sovereignty was lodged in his Majesty, it might appear by their actions, that they had doubled their forwardness and endeavours to serve him; which was the only way now left them to shew their just sense of their inexpressible loss, and to make it, in some measure, more supportable to his Majesty.

These speeches had the desired effect. The Parliament ordered an answer to his Majesty's letter, and an address of condolence for the death of the Queen, to be drawn up, and sent to his Majesty; and they appointed a Committee for the security of the Kingdom, and another for trade. The first of these Committees having made their report concerning the supplies to be given to the King, it was unanimously resolved, that the sum of 1,440,000 pounds Scots be granted for the maintenance of the land forces, and for providing and maintaining cruisers and convoys for defence of the coasts and trade; towards the raising of which sum they made an act for a general poll, another for 1695. for a supply of six months cess out of the land rents, a third for an additional excise, and a fourth for three months cess more.

An act for a new Company. Barret. The Committee of trade, after several sittings, prepared an act, which produced the West-India and African Companies, and the Darien enterprise. This act was passed, but proved (as will hereafter be seen) very fatal to Scotland. It was occasioned in this manner: The interlopers in the East-India trade, finding that the Company was like to be favoured by the Parliament, as well as by the Court, were resolved to try other methods to break in upon that trade: They entered into a treaty with some merchants in Scotland; and they had, in the former Session, procured an act, that promised Letters Patents to all such, as should offer to set up new manufactures, or drive any new trade, not yet practised by that Kingdom, with an exemption for twenty-one years from all taxes and customs, and with all such other privileges, as should be found necessary for establishing or encouraging such projects. But here was a necessity of procuring Letters Patents, which they knew the credit, that the East India Company had at Court, would certainly render ineffectual. So they were now in treaty for a new act, which should free them from that difficulty. There was one Patterjon, a man of no education, but of great notions; which, as was generally said, he had learned from the Buccaneers, with whom he had consoled for some time. He had considered a place in Darien, where he thought a good settlement might be made, with another over-against it, in the South Sea; and, by two settlements there, he fancied a great trade might be opened both for the East and West Indies; and that the Spaniards in the neighbourhood might be kept in great subjection to them; so he made the Merchants believe, that he had a great secret, which he did not think fit yet to discover, and reserved to a fitter opportunity; only he desired, that the West-Indies might be named in any new act, that should be offered to the Parliament: He made them in general understand, that he knew of a country, not possessed by Spaniards, where there were rich mines, and gold in abundance. While these matters were in treaty, the time of the King's giving the instructions to his Commissioner for the Parliament came on; and it had been a thing of course to give a general instruction, to pass all bills for the encouragement of trade. Johnston told the King, that he heard there was a secret management among the Merchants for an act in Scotland, under which the East-India trade might be set up; so he proposed, and drew an instruction, empowering the Commissioner to pass any bill, promising Letters Patents for encouraging of trade, yet limited, so that it should not interfere with the trade of England: When they went down to Scotland, the King's Commissioner either did not consider this, or had no regard to it; for he gave the Royal assent to an act, that gave the undertakers, either of the East-India or West-India trade, all possible privileges, with exemption of twenty-one years from all impositions: And the act directed Letters Patents to be passed under the Great-Seal, without any further warrant for them: When this was printed, it gave a great alarm in England, more particularly to the East-India Company; for many of the Merchants of London resolved to join stock with the Scotch Company; and the exemption from all duties gave a great prospect of gain.

But this Session of the Scots Parliament was chiefly remarkable for it's strict enquiry into a passage, that made a great noise in the world. The Earl of Broadalbin formed a scheme of quieting all the Highlanders, if the King would give twelve or fifteen thousand pounds for doing it, which sum was remitted down from England; and this was to be divided among the heads of the tribes or clans of the Highlanders. He employed his emissaries among them, and told them, that the best service they could do King James was to lie quiet, and reserve themselves to a better time; and, if they would take the oaths, the King would be contented with that, and they were to have a share of this sum, that was sent down to buy their quiet. But this came to nothing; their demands rose high; they knew, that the Earl had money to distribute among them; they believed, that he intended to keep the best part of it to himself. They asked therefore more than he could give. Amongst the most clamorous and obstinate of these were the Macdonalds of Glencoe, who were believed guilty of much robbery and many murders, and so had gained too much by their pilfering war, to be easily induced to give it over. The head of that valley had so particularly provoked the Earl of Broadalbin (whose cows were said to have been stolen by Macdonald's men) that, as his scheme was quite defeated by the opposition, that Macdonald raised, so he designed a severe revenge. The King had by a proclamation offered an indemnity to all the Highlanders, who had been in arms against him, upon their coming in, by a prefixed day, to take the oaths. The day had been twice or thrice prolonged; and it was, at last, carried to the end of the year 1691, with a positive threatening of proceeding to military execution against such as should not submit by the last day of December. All of them were so terrified, that they came in; and even Macdonald himself went to Colonel Hill, Governor of fort William at Inverlochie, on the last of December, and offered to take the oaths. But the Colonel, being only a military man, could not or would not tender them; and Macdonald was forced to seek for some of the legal Magistrates to tender them to him. The snows were then fallen, so that five or six days passed, before he could come to a Magistrate; but on the sixth of January 1691-2 he took the oaths before Sir Colin Campbell of Ardkinlar, Sheriff-deputy of Argyle, at which time, in the strictness of law, he could claim no benefit by it. The matter was signified to the Council at Edinburgh; and Sir Colin had a reprimand for giving him the oaths, when the day was passed. This was concealed from the King, and the Earl of Broadalbin came to Court, to give an account of his diligence, and to bring back his money, since he could not do the service, for which it was received. He informed against Macdonald, as the chief person who had defeated that good design; and, that he might gratify his own revenge, and render the King odious to all the Highlanders, he proposed, that orders should be sent for a military execution

1693. execution on the men of Glencoe. An instruction was drawn by Secretary Stair (dated the 11th of January 1692, and directed to Sir Thomas Livingstone) to be both signed and countersigned by the King, that such, as had not taken the oaths by the time limited, should be excluded the benefit of the indemnity, and be destroyed by fire and sword; but with this express mitigation in the fourth article, 'That the rebels may not think themselves desperate, we allow you to give terms and quarter, but in this manner only, that chieftains and heritors, or loaders, be prisoners of war, their lives only safe, and all other things in mercy, they taking the oath of allegiance; and the community, taking the oath of allegiance, and rendering their arms, and submitting to the Government, are to have quarter and indemnity for their lives and fortunes, and to be protected from the soldiers.' After these instructions there were additional ones given by the King to Sir Thomas Livingstone upon the 18th of the same month, supersigned and countersigned by his Majesty, and the date marked by Secretary Stair's hand, which bear orders for giving passes, for receiving the submission of certain of the rebels; wherein his Majesty judged it much better, that those, who took not the benefit of the indemnity in due time, should be obliged to render upon mercy, they still taking the oath of allegiance; and then added, 'if Macklean of Glencoe and that tribe can be well separated from the rest, it will be a proper vindication of the public justice to extirpate that sect of thieves.' The King signed this without any enquiry about it; for he was apt to sign papers in a hurry, without examining the importance of them. This was one effect of his slowness in dispatching business; for, as he was apt to suffer things to run on till there was a great heap of papers laid before him, so then he signed them a little too precipitately. But all this while he knew nothing of Macdonald's offering to take the oaths within the time, nor of his having taken them soon after it was passed, when he came to a proper Magistrate. As these orders were sent down, Secretary Stair wrote many private letters to Livingstone, giving him a strict charge and particular directions for the execution of them. In a previous letter of the date 7th of January, he wrote thus: 'You know in general, that these troops posted at Inverness and Inverlochie will be ordered to take in the House of Invergairie, and to destroy entirely the Country of Lochaber, Locheal's lands, Kippoch, Glengarie's, and Glencoe;' and then added, I assure you, your power shall be full enough, and I hope the soldiers will not trouble the Government with prisoners. And, by another letter of the 9th of that month, which was written before the instructions, he had this expression, 'That those, who remain of the rebels, are not able to oppose; and, their chieftains being all Papists, it is well the vengeance falls there. For my part I could have wished the Macdonalds had not divided; and I am sorry, that Kippoch and Macklean of Glencoe are safe.' In another letter of the 11th of January sent with the first instructions to Sir Thomas Livingstone, he hath this expression: 'I have no great kindness to Kippoch nor Glencoe; and it is well that the people are in mercy.

1695. Just now my Lord Argyle tells me, that Glencoe hath not taken the oath, at which I rejoice. It is a great work of charity to be exact in rooting out that damnable sect, the work of the Highlanders. In his letter of the 16th of January of the same date with the additional instructions, though he writes in the first part of it, that the King does not at all incline to receive any after the day but on mercy, yet he afterwards adds, But, for a just example of vengeance, I intreat the thieving tribe of Glencoe may be rooted out to purpose. And to confirm this, by his letter of the same date, sent with the duplicate of the first, and additional instructions to Colonel Hill, after having written, 'that such as render on mercy might be saved;' he adds, 'I shall intreat you, that, for a just vengeance and public example, the Tribe of Glencoe may be rooted out to purpose. The Earls of Argyle and Broadalbin have promised, that they shall have no retreat in their bounds; the paper to Ronach would be secured, and the hazard certified to the Laird of Weems to retake them. In that case Argyle's detachment, with a party, that may be posted in Island Stalker, must cut them off; and the people of Appin are none of the best.' But, as the execution of the Glencoe men did not immediately take effect, Secretary Stair, on the 30th of January, wrote two more letters; one to Livingstone, wherein he said, I am glad, that Glencoe did not come in within the time prefixed. I hope what is done there, may be in earnest, since the rest are not in a condition to draw together to help. I think to hurry [that is, to drive] their cattle, and burn their houses, is but to render them desperate lawless men to rob their neighbours; but I believe you will be satisfied it were a great advantage to the nation, that thieving tribe were rooted out and cut off. It must be quietly done, otherwise they will make shift for both their men and cattle. Argyle's detachment lies in Lotrickeel to assist the garrison to do all of a sudden. The other letter was to Colonel Hill, in which he wrote: 'Pray when the thing concerning Glencoe is resolved, let it be secret and sudden; otherwise the men will shift you, and better not meddle with them than not to purpose, to cut off that nest of robbers, who have fallen in the mercy of the law, now when there is force and opportunity, whereby the King's justice will be as conspicuous and useful as his clemency to others. I apprehend the storm is so great that for some time you can do but little; but so soon as possible I know you will be at work; for these false people will do nothing, but as they see you in a condition to do with them.'

In February 1691-2, a Company was sent to Glencoe, who were kindly received there, and quartered over the valley, the inhabitants thinking themselves safe, and looking for no hostilities. After they had staid a week among them, they took their time in the night, and killed about six and thirty of them, the rest taking the alarm, and escaping. This raised a great clamour, and was published by the French in their Gazettes, and by the Jacobites in their libels, to cast a reproach on the King's Government as cruel and barbarous, tho' in all other instances it had appeared, that his own inclinations were gentle and mild, rather to an excess. The King 1695. King sent orders to enquire into the matter; but when the letters, writ upon this business, were all examined, it appeared, that so many persons were involved in the matter, that his gentleness prevailed on him to a fault, and he contented himself with dismissing only Secretary Stair from his service. The Highlanders were so inflamed with this, that they were put in as forward a disposition, as the Jacobites wished for, to have rebelled upon the first favourable opportunity. And indeed the not punishing this with a due rigour was the greatest blot in this whole reign, and had a very ill effect in alienating that nation from the King and his Government.

The Glencoe affair inquired into.

As this affair still made a great noise, and it was repented to the King, that a Session of Parliament could not be managed without high motions and complaints, in so crying a matter; and that his ministers could not oppose these, without seeming to bring the guilt of the blood, that was so perfidiously shed, both on the King and on themselves: To prevent which, the King ordered a Commission to be passed under the Great Seal, for a precognition in that matter, which is a practice in Scotland of examining crimes, before the persons are brought upon their trial. This was looked upon as an artifice, to cover that transaction, by a private inquiry. However, when it was complained of in Parliament, not without reflections, on the slackness in examining into it, and the Committee for the security of the Kingdom made a motion about it, the King's Commissioner assured them, that by the King's order, the matter was then under examination, and that it should be reported to the Parliament. Accordingly, the King's Commission for that purpose being produced, read, and agreed to, it was unanimously voted, that the High Commissioner should be desired to transmit their humble thanks to his Majesty for his care to vindicate the honour of the Government, and the justice of the nation, by granting such a Commission.

The Commissioners appointed by the King to inquire into the slaughter of the Glencoe men, having spent some weeks in that affair, on the 10th of June presented to the Parliament private articles agreed in July 1691, between the Earl of Broadalbin and Major-General Buchan with several of the Highland clans; as also the depositions of the Laird of Glengarie and Colonel Hill, containing informations of High-treason against the Earl of Broadalbin; which being read, after some debate, an order was made for his prosecution before the Parliament, and for his commitment to the castle of Edinburgh. In the progress of the inquiry, it seems, a new practice of the Earl of Broadalbin's was discovered; for the Highlanders deposed that, while he was treating with them, in order to their submitting to the King, he had assured them, that he still adhered to King James's interest, and that he pressed them to come into that pacification, only to preserve them for his service, till a more favourable opportunity. This, with several other treasonable discourses of his, being reported to the Parliament, he covered himself with his pardon; but these discourses happened to be subsequent to it; so he was sent a prisoner to the castle of Edinburgh: He pretended, he had secret orders from the King, to say any thing that would give him credit with them; which the King owned so far, that he ordered a new pardon to be past for him.

On the 24th of June, the Commissioners gave into the House their report of the case of the Glencoe men, with their opinion upon it, which was as follows:

'First, that it was a great wrong, that Glencoe's case and diligence, as to his taking the oath of allegiance on the 6th of January 1692, and Colonel Hill's letter to Ardrinlas, and Ardrinlas's letter to Colin Campbell, Sheriff Clerk, for clearing Glencoe's diligence and innocence, were not presented to the Lords of his Majesty's Privy-council, when they were sent into Edinburgh in the said month of January; and that those, who advised the not presenting thereof were in the wrong, and seemed to have had a malicious design against Glencoe. And that it was a further wrong, that the certificate, as to Glencoe's taking the oath of allegiance, was delate and obliterate after it came to Edinburgh; and that, being so obliterate, it should neither have been presented to, or taken in by the Clerk of the Council without an express warrant from the Council. Secondly, That it appears to have been known at London, and particularly to the master of Stair, in the month of January 1692, that Glencoe had taken the oath of allegiance, though after the day prefixed; for he saith in his letter of the 30th of January to Sir Thomas Livingston, I am glad that Glencoe came not in within the time prescribed. Thirdly, that there was nothing in the King's instructions to warrant the committing of the aforesaid slaughter, even as to the thing itself, and far less as to the manner of it, seeing all his instructions do plainly import, that the most obstinate of the rebels might be received into mercy upon taking the oath of allegiance, though the day was long before elapsed, and that he ordered nothing concerning Glencoe and his tribe, but that, if they could be well separated from the rest, it would be a proper vindication of the public justice to extirpate that sect of thieves; which plainly intimates, that it was his Majesty's mind, that they could not be separated from the rest of these rebels, unless they still refused his mercy by continuing in arms, and refusing the allegiance; and that even in that case they were only to be proceeded against in the way of public justice, and no other way. Fourthly, that Secretary Stair's letters, especially that of the 11th of January 1692, in which he rejoices to hear, that Glencoe had not taken the oath, and that of the 16th of January of the same date with the King's additional instructions, and that of the 30th of the same month, were no ways warranted by, but quite exceeded the King's instructions, since the said latters, without any innovation of any method to be taken, that might well separate the Glencoe men from the rest, did, in place of prescribing a vindication of public justice, order them to be cut off and rooted out in earnest and to purpose, and that suddenly, and secretly, and quietly, and all on a sudden; which are the express terms of the said letters, and, comparing them and the other letters with what ensued, appear to have been the only warrant and cause of their slaughter, which in effect was a barbarous

And this is yet farther confirmed by two more of his letters, written to Colonel Hill after the laughter committed, viz. on the 5th of March 1692, wherein, after having said, that there was much talk at London, that the Glencoe men were murdered in their beds after they had taken the oath of allegiance, he continues, For the last, I know nothing of it; I am sure neither you, nor any body empowered to treat or give indemnity, did give Glencoe the oath; and to take it from any body else, after the day was past, did import nothing at all. All that I regret is, that any of the sort got away, and there is a necessity to prosecute them to the utmost. And another from the Hague, the last of April 1692, wherein he says, For the people of Glencoe, when you do your duty in a thing so necessary to rid the country of thieving, you need not trouble yourself to take the pains to vindicate yourself by shewing all your orders, which are now put in the Paris Gazette. When you do right, you need fear no body. All that can be said, is, that, in the execution, it was neither so full nor so fair, as might have been.

The King is vindicated.

This report being read, on the 24th of June, together with the depositions of the witnesses, the King's instructions, and the Master of Stair's letters, it was voted, namine contradicente, that his Majesty's instructions to Sir Thomas Levingston and Colonel Hill contained no warrant for the execution of the Glencoe men: That the said execution was a murder: That the Master of Stair's letter did exceed the King's instructions; and that Sir Thomas Levingston had reason to give the orders he had given. On the 2d of July they proceeded upon the same affair, and Colonel Hill and Lieutenant-Colonel Hamilton were called. The former appeared, was examined, and cleared; but the latter not appearing was ordered to be apprehended, and on the 8th of that month voted guilty of the murder of the Glencoe men. Then the House proceeded against the other persons, who were actors therein; and agreed upon an address to his Majesty, that he would send them home to be prosecuted, or not, as his Majesty should think fit; and that he would take into his princely consideration the case of the Glencoe men. This address was, on the 10th of July, recommended to the King's Commissioner, to be transmitted to his Majesty, with duplicates of his Majesty's instructions, and the Master of Stair's letters. At the same time the King's Commissioners received the unanimous thanks of the Parliament, for laying the discovery of the matter of Glencoe before them, and for their careful procedure in their Commission of inquiry; and a new protection was granted to the Glencoe men.

On the 1st of July, the Earl of Broadalbin, being brought to the bar of the Parliament, in order to his trial, delivered in a petition, praying, that he might be allowed some competent time for bringing of witnesses from remote places, and for recovery of such documents, as he was to make use of for his vindication, both from the Secretary's office at London, and his house in the country. The Advocates on both sides having been heard upon this petition, it was put to the vote, whether the day for his Lordship to give in his defence should be the 8th or 15th of the current month, and it was carried for the 15th; and that in the mean time he might raise letters of exculpation. Then the indictment against him was read, and he remanded to prison. The same day the process of treason, at the instance of the King's Advocate, against the Earl of Melfort, and others in France, being called, the King's Advocate, produced his warrant from the Privy-Council for raising this process against them, and desired, that it might be recorded. Afterwards the indictment was read, and the King's Advocate declared he insisted at that time only against the Earls of Middleton and Melfort, and Sir Adam Blair, and on that part of the indictment, which recited, that, by the act of Parliament in 1693, it was declared treason to be in France after the 1st of August 1693, and therefore craved the indictment might be found to be good in law; which being put to the vote, it was carried in the affirmative. The next day the House passed sentence against the Earls of Middleton and Melfort and Sir Adam Blair, to forfeit life and fortune, and ordered the rest, who adhered to his Majesty's enemies, and were then in France, to be prosecuted before the Lords of the Judiciary. On the 15th of July, the Earl of Broadalbin, being again brought to the bar, begged more time to make his defence, which was granted him till the 25th of the same month; but, all the public affairs being happily concluded by the 17th, it was moved and agreed to, that the process of treason against him should be continued till the next Session of Parliament. After which his Majesty's Commissioner gave the Parliament thanks for their real and hearty compliance with his Majesty's demands, recommended to them the preservation of the public peace in their several countries, and adjourned them till the 7th of November following.

It was observable, that a great party came to be formed in this Session of a very odd mixture. The High Presbyterians and the Jacobites joined together to oppose every thing; however, it was not so strong as to carry the majority; but great heats arose among them.

In this Session, an act passed, in favour of such of the Episcopal Clergy, as should enter into those engagements to the King, that were by law required; that they should continue in their benefices under the King's protection, without being subject to the power of Presbytery. This was carried with some address, before the Presbyterians were aware of the consequences of it; for it was plainly that which they call Ereftianifm. A day was limited to the Clergy for taking the oaths; and, by a very zealous and dextrous management, about seventy of the best of them were brought to take the oaths to the King; and so they came within the protection promised by the act.

In Ireland the three Lords Justices did not agree long together. The Lord Capel studied to render himself popular, and espoused the interests of the Englifh against the Irifh, without any nice regard to justice or equity. He was too easily set on by those, who had their own end in it, to do every thing, that gained him applause. The other two were men of severe tempers, and studied to protect the Irifh, when they were oppressed; nor did they try to make themselves otherwise popular, than by a wife and just administration. For which reason Lord Capel

Lord Capel undertook to manage a Parliament so, as to carry all things, if he was made Lord Deputy, and had power given him to place and displace such as he should name. This being agreed to, a Parliament was held there, after he had made several removes. It was opened at Dublin on the 27th of August, when his Lordship made a speech to both Houses, wherein he told them, 'That many and great were the obligations they owed to his Majesty. That his Majesty had appeared himself in their cause, fought their battles, and, at his own personal hazard, had restored them to their religion and estates. And, that every thing might concur to make them happy, his Majesty had now called them together in Parliament, that by reasonable and necessary laws they might prevent the like dangers for the time to come, and secure themselves and their posterity upon the best and surest foundations. That he doubted not, but they would make suitable returns of loyalty and affection to his Majesty, by shewing a perfect and forward zeal in such things as tended to his honour and their own advantage.' His Excellency then acquainted them, 'That his Majesty's revenue had fallen short of the establishment, which had occasioned great debts to the civil and military lists. That it was with difficulty, and stopping of all manner of payments, but what were absolutely necessary, that the army had hitherto been subsisted. That there were also several other debts due from the Crown, a state whereof he had ordered to be laid before the Commons, by which they would see, what supplies were necessary for discharge of those debts, and for the support of the Government. That, for raising some part of this money, his Majesty had sent them a bill for an additional duty of excise, and he expected from the Gentlemen of the House of Commons, that they would consider of ways and means for raising such other sums, as were requisite for his service; assuring them, that what money they gave, should be applied to the uses, for which it was given.

'He recommended to them, that they would take some care for the rebuilding and repairing of churches in several parts of their country, that the people, having decent public places of worship, might be better instructed in their duty to their God, and obedience to their King; urging, that it was a tribute due to Almighty God, for their late preservation and deliverance; and that it would be one of the best means they could think of to preserve the true established religion, and to provide against future rebellions.' He likewise informed them, 'that the Lords Justices of England had, with great application and dispatch, considered and re-transmitted all the bills sent to them. That some of these bills had more effectually provided for their future security, than had ever heretofore been done.

'That, in his Excellency's opinion, the want of such laws had been one of the great causes of their past miseries; and it would be their fault, as well as misfortune, if they neglected to lay hold on the opportunity now put into their hands by their great and gracious King, of making such a lasting settlement, that it might never more be in the power of their enemies to bring the like calamities again upon them, or to put England to that vast expence of blood and treasure, which it had so often been at, for securing this Kingdom to the Crown of England. Concluding with the usual acknowledgment of his unfitness for his great station, and of the great difficulties, which attend it; and assurance, that he would discharge his trust with steadfast loyalty to his Majesty's interest and service, and with a perfect sincerity to theirs.'

The Lords and Commons returned their thanks in their addresses to his Excellency for his speech, and passed this vote, 'That they would, to the utmost of their power, stand by and assist his Majesty and his Government against all his enemies foreign and domestic.' After this both Houses proceeded with great unanimity and dispatch to the consideration of the matters before them; so that the supply of 163,325 l. that was asked for the support of the Government, was granted; all the proceedings and attainders in King James's Parliament were annulled; and the great act of settlement was confirmed and explained as they desired (1). But, tho' things went on thus smoothly in the beginning of the Session, this good temper in the Parliament was quickly lost by the heat of some, who had great credit with the Lord Deputy. Complaints were made of Sir Charles Porter, the Lord Chancellor, who was beginning to set on foot a Tory humour in Ireland; whereas it was certainly the interest of that Government to have no other division among them but that of English and Irish, and of Protestant and Papist. The Lord Deputy's party moved in the House of Commons, that the Lord Chancellor should be impeached; but the grounds, upon which this motion was made, appeared to be so frivolous, after the Chancellor was heard by the House of Commons in his own justification, that he was voted clear from all imputation by a majority of two to one. This set the Lord Deputy and the Lord Chancellor, with all the friends of both, at so great a distance from each other, that it put a full stop, for some time, to all business.

Thus factions were formed in all the King's dominions; and he, being for so much of the year at a great distance from the scene, there was no pains taken to quiet these, and to check the animosities which arose out of them. The King studied only to ballance them, and to keep up among the parties, a jealousy of one another, that so he might oblige them all to depend more entirely on himself.

Such was the state of affairs in the British dominions. It is time now to turn to the military proceedings abroad, and consider how matters 1695. flood on both sides before the campaign was opened. When the King of France law in 1691 King William disengaged from the war in Ireland, and the following year the Elector of Bavaria possessed of the government of the Spanish Netherlands, he turned the strefs of his arms that way, in order to break their measures, and in two successive campaigns made himself master of the important places of Mons and Namur, before those two Princes could collect a sufficient force to prevent it. But the two next campaigns the French met with more difficulties and a stronger opposition than they expected from the Allies. King William, early possessing himself of the camp of Park in 1693, dissipated the sanguine hopes of their Court, defeated their designs upon Brabant, and forced their King to a speedy return to Versailles; and the victory they obtained the same year at Landen cost them so dear, that by it they lost in 1694 the superiority, which they had the preceding years over the Allies. And, though this last campaign was wholly spent in observing one another, like enemies, whose forces, being almost equal, endeavour to overmatch the opposite party by the advantage of the ground, yet it was concluded to the honour of the Confederates by the retaking of Huy, a place, which in time proved of more importance than was at first apprehended.

King William being sensible, that the power of France was in it's decline, and that the Allies on the other hand increased daily in strength, resolved to form some considerable enterprize the following year, either in Flanders, or on the Maese, according as the enemy would give him opportunity to put it in execution on either side. In order to this, before his Majesty left Holland, he gave directions for the setting up and storing of great magazines in several places, and for the making all other necessary preparations; and ordered two armies to be early in the field, to keep the French in awe on both sides, and draw their whole strength on that, for which their jealousy should be greatest, and afterwards fall on the other with more probability of success. A siege in Flanders seemed to be attended with less difficulty than on the Maese, where the only place, that could be attempted, was Namur, the strongest of all the Low-Countries; and therefore, as most people looked upon such an undertaking as altogether impossible, so the French themselves turned their greatest precautions towards Flanders, where they drew a new line from the Lys to the Schelde, before the Allies could form a body of troops to oppose them. By these motions of the enemy, and their not increasing their forces, it was easy to judge, that they would content themselves to act defensively this summer; not to mention the loss of their best General, the Duke of Luxembourg, who died towards the beginning of this year, and whose place was but ill supplied by the Marshal de Villeroi.

While the French were perfecting their lines, the Confederates, who were superior to them by near twenty thousand men, formed two great armies in Flanders and Brabant. The first, which consisted of seventy battalions of foot, and eighty-two squadrons of horse and dragoons, most English and Scots, and the rest Dutch, incamped at Aerssele, Comeghem, and Woucreghem, between Thibault and Deynse, and was to be commanded by the King in person, 1695. and under him by the old Prince of Vaudemont, to whom the King had given last winter the command in chief of his infantry, he being the best General he had, after the death of Prince Waldeck. The Lieutenant-Generals of the foot were the Count of Nassau, Sir Henry Bellesjse, and Count de Noyelles; and the Major-Generals were Colonel Churchill, Ramsay, La Motiere, and the Marquis de Miremont; Monsieur Overkirk was General of the horse, having the Marquis de la Forest Lieutenant-General, and Major-General Eppinger under him. Colonel Gore commanded the English artillery; Quarter-Master General Doffy was to attend the King's person; and the general officers, who had accompanied his Majesty from England, were likewise to serve in this army; which, upon occasion, was to be reinforced by twenty battalions and ten squadrons, that lay near Dixmude, under the command of Major-General Ellemberg. The other army consisting of sixteen battalions of foot, and a hundred and thirty squadrons of horse, incamped at Zellich and Ham, on the road from Brussels to Dendermond, and was to be headed by the Elector of Bavaria, and under him by the Duke of Holstein-Ploen, the Spanish and Bavarian Generals, the Earl of Aiblone, General of the Dutch horse, and Monsieur Tetteau, General of the ordnance. There was also another little army, which was called the body of the Maese, which lay incamped towards Brest and Talais on the Meuse. This body consisted of eighteen battalions of Brandenburgers, and seven Dutch; and of seventeen squadrons of Brandenburg, and fifteen of Liege; the whole commanded by the Baron de Heyden, Lieutenant-General of Brandenburg, and Count de Berlo General of the Liege cavalry, who were to be joined by the rest of the Brandenburg horse, which came down along the Rhine. On the other hand, the Marshal de Villeroi, who, after Luxemburg's death, commanded the French forces in chief, had drawn his army together at Leuze between Condé, Tournay, and Aeth; Marshal de Boufflers and Count Guiscard, with a body of about twelve thousand horse and foot lay incamped about the Sambre; and Monsieur Montal, with another small body, lay between Ypres and the fort La Kneque, to observe Major-General Ellemberg.

This was the posture of both parties, when The King the King left Loo, and came to Breda in his comes to Ghent. way to Ghent; where he was received both by the Governor and Burghers with the like respects, that are usually paid to a King of Spain. The Elector of Bavaria and the Duke of Holstein-Ploen waited upon him at his arrival, being come to Ghent some hours before from their army, which by this time had marched to Ninove; and the same evening the King went to his army at Aerssele. Two days after, upon intelligence, that Boufflers had passed the Sambre, and that Villeroi was come to Escauffe on the Schelde, to destroy the forage on this side; the King sent orders to the Earl of Aiblone to march with forty squadrons from the Duke of Bavaria's camp at Ninove, to observe Boufflers, who was now advanced to Flerus; and, having bestowed the three following days upon the review of his forces, which he found in very good condition, he detached three brigades of horse commanded by the Marquis de la Forest to reinforce the E-lector

1695. leſtor of Bavaria; and the next day marched his army from Merſele, and having ſent all the heavy baggage to Bruges, came and incamped at Beelaer, from whence a party was ſent out, that routed two of the enemies parties, and purſued them to the very walls of Ypres. Villeroi marched at the ſame time from Elcanaffe, and retired behind the lines between Menin and Ypres, having detached ten thouſand men to reinforce Boufflers, who was advanced to Pont Elpierre. The ſame day in the evening the King went to view the enemies lines, and found the main body of their army incamped within them, ſtanding to their arms, as expecting to be attacked. But, though there was little probability of ſucceſs in attempting to force the lines, yet it was highly convenient for the King's project to give the French ſuch umbrage, as to oblige them to bring all their forces to defend them. Therefore the body of the Maefe advanced towards Namur, and the Eleſtor of Bavaria marched from Ninove, paſſed the Schelde, poſted himſelf at Kerkboven near Hauterive facing the new lines, and forced Boufflers to retreat within them.

The King, being informed of the Eleſtor of Bavaria's arrival at Kerkboven, detached General Courcill with eight battalions to join General Ellemberg; and the Duke of Wurtemberg marched in the night with Colonel Gore, Colonel Brown, ten pontoons and eight hundred pioneers, to take upon him the command of that army, and to make an attempt upon fort Knoque, to increaſe the enemies jealouſy for Flanders, and draw their forces more on that ſide. The ſame day the Eleſtor of Bavaria made a feint of attacking the new line, and the King went to an eminence to view the enemy; and it being confirmed on all hands, that all their forces were within their lines, he ſent orders to the Baron de Heyden, to advance towards Flanders, with the troops under his command. Upon theſe motions Villeroi detached two brigades from his army, one towards Courtray, the other towards fort Knoque, in attacking which Prince Wurtemberg met with great difficulties; and at the ſame time the King ſent freſh orders to the Earl of Atblone and the Baron de Heyden to confer together, and concert meaſures towards the ſiege, which he had in his thoughts; which ſtopped the march of the latter towards Flanders.

Hitherto the King had not declared his deſign, but had artfully purſued his ſtratagem of drawing all the enemies forces on one ſide, that he might attack the other with leſs oppoſition. This having ſucceeded according to his wiſhes, he directed the Earl of Atblone and the Baron de Heyden to inveſt Namur; and by an expreſs communicated the whole ſcheme of the ſiege to the Duke of Bavaria, who highly applauded the ſame. According to the King's orders, the Earl of Atblone, being joined by the Brandenburg troops, left a good body of horſe at Faliſe, and marched with the reſt towards Charleroy. At the ſame time the King, having marched back his army to Rouſſelaer, left them there under the command of Prince Vaudemont, and attended by a ſtrong guard advanced himſelf towards the Maefe. Theſe motions, together with the great preparations, which were making at Maeftricht, Liege, and Huy, put the French in ſuſpence, whether the Confederates deſigned to attack Namur or Charleroy; and the Marquis d'Harcourt, who had paſſed the Maefe near Dinant, and who feared moſt for Charleroy, marched again down that river towards Namur; ſo that the Earl, being by this time reinforced by a body of horſe and dragoons from the Eleſtor of Bavaria's army, commanded by Count Tilly, took all the poſts from the Sambre to the Maefe; whiſt the Baron de Heyden with the Brandenburg and Dutch forces inveſted the place between the Maefe and the Sambre. Another detachment was ordered to ſurround Namur on the Condroz ſide; but their not coming in time, by reaſon of the difficulty of the ground, and the vaſt extent of the circumvallation, gave Marſhal Boufflers an opportunity to throw himſelf into the place with ſeveral regiments of dragoons, inſomuch that with this reinforcement the gariſon conſiſted of near fifteen-thouſand men, and moſt of them the beſt troops of France. The King came to the caſtle of Faliſe on the 2d of July, and the next day the Eleſtor of Bavaria having brought up the reſt of his army with prodigious expedition, the town and caſtle of Namur were intirely inveſted, and the King diſpoſed the troops into their reſpective quarters, and assigned each General his poſt. The Sambre and the Maefe did naturally divide the army into three general quarters, which were ſubdivided into ſeveral others. The King's quarters reached from the Sambre to the Maefe towards Brabant; and here encamped twenty-three battalions and a hundred and twenty ſquadrons, under the command of the Duke of Holſtein-Ploen, the Earl of Atblone, Baron Opdam, Monſieur Telleau, Count de Tilly, the Marquis de la Foreſt, and Meſſieurs Warfuzey, Hubert, Interſum, Salijch, and Fogel. The Duke of Bavaria was poſted between the Sambre and the Maefe, with twenty-four battalions, twenty ſquadrons, the Spaniſh and Bavarian Generals, General Coeborn, and a Major-General of Brandenburg. And in the Condroz along the Maefe, both above and below the town, were incamped the Baron de Heyden, with the other Brandenburg Generals, and Count de Berlo, General of the cavalry of Liege, having ten battalions and ſixty ſquadrons under them. For the communication of theſe quarters three bridges were immediately laid, one on the Sambre, and two on the Maefe; and of theſe one was above, the other below Namur. The ſame day the King received intelligence, that Villeroi had ſent ſome detachments towards the Maefe: That Prince Wurtemberg, having amused the French for ſome time, and finding at length it was impoſſible to hinder the communication of fort Knoque, with the body under Monſieur Montal, was retired from before that fort with eleven battalions of foot, and one regiment of horſe, and had joined Prince Vaudemont: That the latter, being thus reinforced, had detached Major-General Ramſey with fourteen battalions to attend his Majeſty: That Count de Naſſau was gone the ſame way with eight battalions more; and that he would be followed by the Lord Cutts with ten others. The next day the King viewed the avenues to the town, and ordered trees to be cut down in the foreſt of Marlagne, to ſtop the paſſages on that ſide, and cover the retrenchment made on the road. The 5th and 6th of July, both horſe and foot being encamped, the beſiegers worked on the circumvallation under the direction of General Coeborn; and the Earl of Atblone, having repaſſed the Maefe with a hundred 1695 hundred squadrons of horse, marched towards Pieton, in order to consume the forage there, and observe the motions of the enemy. The Count de Berlo followed him with the horse of Liege, so that there remained but little cavalry before the place.

On the other hand the French prepared themselves for a vigorous resistance, and having lately been so considerably reinforced, expected no less than to defeat all the attempts of the besiegers. And indeed it must be confessed, that their presumption was not altogether groundless, if it be observed, that Namur has ever been accounted one of the strongest towns in the Low-Countries, both by the advantage of its situation, and the addition of its fortifications, which give it the command over two great rivers, and make it the best bulwark of Brabant. Besides this, the place had very much changed its condition, since it fell into the hands of the French King, who never spared expence to put his frontiers and conquered cities into the best defence they were capable of receiving from art and nature.

French

The town then was quite overlooked by a steep hill from the Porte de Fer or Iron Gate, to that of St Nicholas; so that, the French having the liberty to bring down their batteries at first, to the descent of that hill, and to open their trenches at the foot of it near the Masse, they made themselves masters of it in five or six days. But now, to add a very considerable strength to this weak part of the town, the French had made a detached bastion on the ascent of the hill before St Nicholas's Gate, all of stone-work, with a casemot upon it bomb-proof; the counterscarp of free-stone, as also the covered way, which pointed just upon the top of the hill, so that no cannon from the plain could bear upon this work; and the Allies were necessitated to batter it in reverse from the other side of the Masse. This was not all; for, upon the right towards the Iron Gate, the besieged had made three detached bastions of the same work, just upon the brow of the hill, and at the foot of the same, before the gate; and between the hill and the brook of Werderen they had a fourth, which hindered the avenues between the hills to this gate; The plain upon these hills was fortified with a double covered way, both palissadoed to defend these detached bastions towards the village of Bouge. And, when the Allies began to invest the place, the French were working at a third, nearer to the brow of the hill, just before these works; so that the town, which before was but weak, was now by the new fortifications rendered so strong, that it held out longer than the castle.

This castle, the principal strength of Namur, was built upon an hill, in an angle formed by the confluence of the Sambre and the Masse, and consisted of an irregular fortification, such as the ground could admit of, divided into the old and new castle of Terra Nova, and Coeborn, or William's Fort; and this likewise received such additions from the French, as to leave it almost impossible to be attacked the same way they took it before. Coeborn Fort fell into their hands, by carrying their trenches round it along the bottom, between it and Terra Nova; which work, being thus embraced, and all manner of communication cut off, was soon forced to surrender. To prevent the like for the future, the French built a strong stone redoubt, just upon the top of the hill, between the Coeborn and Terra Nova, with a casemot upon it bomb-proof; and, as this redoubt commanded all the bottom to the Sambre, so it had likewise a good covered way, palissadoed from the angle of the gorge of the Coeborn, to the brink of the hill upon the Masse. Add to this, that they had raised a very good half-moon before the curtain of the horn-work of the Terra Nova; besides their fortifying the Devil's House, that flanked the sides of the Coeborn towards the Masse, with a strong stone redoubt; which place, when the Spaniards had it, had but a simple retrenchment about it; and yet it held out four or five days. From the upper part of the Coeborn on the side of the Masse they had made a good covered way, which embraced the abovementioned redoubt, to the edge of the hill upon the Masse; and had undertaken a prodigious line cut into the rock all along the top of the hill, near an English mile in length, terminating upon the edge of the hill towards the Sambre, with two redoubts at each end. The line was finished, and the redoubt towards the Masse very forward; but, that towards the Sambre being but just begun, they made it up with fascines, upon the arrival of the Allies before the place. In short, the castle was so well fortified on the top of the hill, that it would have been a very tedious piece of work to attack it that way; but the weak side of the castle and Coeborn fort was towards the Sambre and the town, which the French had not so much regarded; being so confident that the place was impregnable, that they had set up this inscription on one of the gates, Reddi quidem, sed vinci non potest, intimating, that this town might indeed be rescued, but not retaken.

Namur being thus fortified, and provided besides with all necessaries for many months, with good store of ammunition, one hundred pieces of cannon, twelve mortars, ten thousand muskets to spare, and a garrison of twelve thousand men, commanded by a Governor, equally esteemed by his King and beloved by his soldiers, seemed to defy the attempts of the best appointed and most numerous army. But, when Boufflers had thrown himself into it with seven chosen regiments of dragoons, a great number of volunteers, Major-General Megrigny another Vauban, followed by the most skilful engineers, gunners, miners, and bombardiers of France, and had composed an army to defend these ramparts, which were thought impenetrable, it was then, that the French and their favourers looked upon the King's enterprise as an unparalleled temerity, and doubted not but Namur would be the rock, on which the Grand Confederacy should split. But all these great, and, in appearance, invincible obstacles were not able to shake the King's resolution; they served only to make him concert effectual measures to surmount all difficulties, which he did to his immortal glory, the astonishment of his enemies, and the admiration of all Europe.

The lines of circumvallation being finished, the King, attended by the Elector of Bavaria, went, on the 10th of July, early in the morning to the Baron de Hoyden's quarters. Here he was met by all the general officers, with whom having viewed the place, all were of the King's opinion, that the attack upon the town ought to be made against St Nicholas's gate; and therefore it was resolved, that the trenches

Accordingly, the heavy cannon being come up, the trenches were opened the next day without any great disturbance from the enemy; and the same day the Lord Cutts arrived in the camp with six battalions of foot. The 12th the batteries began to play, and the trenches were successfully carried on. On the 13th, Prince Vaudemont informed the King, that the French seemed to have some design in Flanders, and that Aeth was most in danger. The next day, upon advice, that the Marquis D'Harcourt and Lieutenant-General Ximenes were in motion, and might easily fall upon our convoys on the side of the Condroz and Liege, which was unguarded, his Majesty detached twenty squadrons of horse and dragoons towards the plain of St Severin between Huy and Liege, to observe the enemy; and in the afternoon a battery of four pieces of cannon was raised from the eminence of Bouge against the old tower of Coquelet, which very much incommoded the besiegers.

The same day the King received two letters from Prince Vaudemont. By the first he was informed that Villeroy had passed the Lys at Courtray and Harlebeck; and that, according to common report, he marched against the Prince; and by the second, that the French General was advanced as far as the river Mandel, and that, the head of his army having been discovered towards the mill of Dentreghem, Vaudemont had drawn his forces in battalia, posted his left near Grammen, the right towards Aersfele and Caneghem, and began to fortify his camp. The imminent danger, that the Prince found himself in on this occasion, and the admirable conduct, with which he extricated himself out of it, are passages too remarkable to be passed over in silence, and will therefore justify the following digression.

Vaudemont was informed on the 12th of July at night, by a signal from the Governor of Oudenard, that the head of the enemies army bent their march towards Cordes; which was confirmed to him by an express from the Governor of Aeth; and almost at the same time he received advice from Courtray, that the day before the French had laid bridges over the Lys both above and below that town. On the 13th early in the morning, he had positive intelligence, that they were actually passing that river; and on the other hand the Commanders of the castles, which he had garrisoned on the river Mandel, gave him notice, that the enemy was marching directly against him. These advices, though different, were yet both true; for twelve thousand of the enemies horse made towards Cordes, while the rest of their army passed the Lys, and advanced towards Mandel.

Upon these informations Vaudemont gave orders to his army to be in readiness, by a signal of two guns. But, before he made any motion, he resolved to have a confirmation of the designs of the enemy. For as their marching towards Cordes with the greatest part of the forces might be in order to relieve Namur, whilst another body advanced towards the river Mandel, only to amuse him; so, if their whole army marched in one body, there were two inconveniences to be feared; either that they should fall on the Maritime towns of Flanders, in case he marched to the left to prevent the relief of Namur; or that they should gain two days march before him in their way to Namur, if he made too quick a motion to the right to cover the places of Flanders. These reflections obliged him to spend the whole day, being the 13th of July, in observing the enemy. He suffered them to attack the castles of Ingelmunster and Mulenbeck, which were, each of them, defended by an hundred and forty men, who obliged the enemy to bring down cannon, before they would surrender; which made them lose time, and gave the Prince reason to judge, that their whole army was marching to attack him. Their vanguard, appearing in the evening at Dentreghem, where his right was posted, confirmed him in that opinion. He thought fit immediately to change the disposition of his camp, placing his right at Aersfele, and his left at Grammen next the Lys; and at the same time ordered the retrenchments to be made on both sides. The Count de Noyelles, who had the command of these works for the center, and the whole left wings, caused the General's orders to be executed with such extraordinary diligence, that on the 14th by break of day he had made a very defensible line. The rising grounds upon the right of Aersfele were also fortified by ten of the clock in the morning; which done, the artillery was placed in the right flank and in the whole front of the line.
